[Text] Bucharest, 11 Nov -- During its visit to Romania, the Italian Socialist delegation composed of [PSI Secretary Bettino] Craxi, Foreign Section Chief Senator Boniver and AVANTI editor Intini, had a lengthy meeting with Ceausescu, in which connection we report separately on the positions expressed by the Romanian leader. The Socialist delegation later attended a dinner also attended by President Ceausescu, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Trade Burtica, Deputy Prime Minister Constantin, Foreign Minister Andrei, chairman of the RCP academy Popescu and RCP Secretariat members Banc and Casacu.

Craxi, who gave a press conference for Romanian journalists this afternoon, will have further meetings tomorrow morning and will then leave for Italy. The final communique on the meeting with Ceausescu confirms a stance recently adopted by the Romanian president, which coincides with that of the Socialist International, namely, the demand for the withdrawal of the Soviet missiles and for the nondeployment of NATO's missiles. A balanced and constructive line that could develop positively with the resumption of negotiations scheduled for the end of the month.

Craxi-Ceausescu Accord Noted

[Text] To achieve peace it is not enough to hold marches to invoke it, still less if the demands are made not for something but against somebody -- not against all instruments of war but only against those belonging to one side. One very useful step in this direction was the meeting that Craxi has had with Romanian President Ceausescu who, though within the Warsaw Pact, has always maintained a balanced and open-minded stance, with patient initiatives of mediation. Within the framework of a more general action by the Socialist International aimed at sounding out all the possibilities of negotiation, rapprochement and compromise, the Socialist secretary frankly expounded the PSI's position and noted in Ceausescu a similarity of viewpoints on the basic issues.

First and foremost on missiles, in which connection the Romanian Government is aiming -- like the Socialist International but unlike some Italian demonstrators -- not at unilateral disarmament, which would be a dangerous and unrealistic hypothesis, but at the restoration of a balance at the lowest possible level, down to the level of the so-called "zero option." In a word, out with all missiles on both sides; out with the SS-20's already deployed by the Soviets and out with the missiles programmed by NATO.

It is very important that pressures are being exerted in this direction on both major powers and that more flexible and optimistic stances are emerging not only within NATO but also within the Warsaw Pact. These are the positions of European countries that feel their European identity deeply and want, in both alliances, to carry out their own action and to be represented in the negotiations.

Apart from the military aspects of the negotiations, the problem is still that of trust between the sides, which is jeopardized by a number of dangerously unresolved crises in the world. Romania's stance seemed very open-minded in connection with these points -- ranging from Afghanistan to Kampuchea and the Middle East -- the area of crisis which most alarms the Europeans -- Ceausescu showed himself to be far removed from the polemics that have been conducted against the EEC countries over the past few days. The evacuation of Sinai, to which the Europeans are willing to contribute with their presence, and therefore the complete implementation of the Camp David agreements between Egypt and Israel, are viewed not as an obstacle to but as a precondition for broader accords, such as the ones envisaged by the Fahd plan, to resolve the Palestinian problem. As can be seen, this line is not dissimilar to the Socialists'.

To examine the elements of tension one by one, to round off the rough edges and to develop points of contact -- this is the way to work effectively to build peace, each according to his possibilities and his roles. And this is what happened at the meeting between Craxi and Ceausescu, which will certainly have a constructive effect in the efforts that have been stepped up on various sides in recent weeks with the aim of creating a less tainted international climate better suited to the positive conclusion of the negotiations that will begin at the end of the month.

PCI DENIES ALLEGED DIRECTIVES ON TIES WITH PSI

PM131239 [Editorial Report] Rome AVANTI in Italian on 7 November carries a commentary, headlined "Interesting Contradictions," on "reports" that "regional and provincial PCI organizations have been sent important political directives with a view to their imminent congresses," "stressing the need to restore unitary relations with the PSI starting from the grassroots and from the social struggle against the government's deflationary policy." AVANTI welcomes "opportunities to improve relations on the left" but condemns the PCI directives' exhortation for local bodies to pursue "the diligent and profitable battle" on the morality issue against not only the DC but also "Craxi-ite socialists."

Rome L'UNITA in Italian on 7 November responds with a commentary under the headline "AVANTI Comrades Misled." L'UNITA states that "neither the secretariat nor any other central body of our party has issued any directives," declining to comment further on the content of AVANTI's remarks.

VISITING SWEDISH PRIME MINISTER ON AREA SECURITY

LD191804 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 19 Nov 81

[Excerpt] Swedish Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin has arrived on an unofficial visit to Finland. Falldin will deliver a lecture on the international political situation in the north at a meeting organized by the Finland-Sweden Society in Helsinki this evening. Nordic security matters were also raised at Falldin's press conference at the airport this afternoon. (Paavo Haltsonen) reports:

During the past 3 weeks the Swedish prime minister has had to answer questions time and again on the grounding of the Soviet submarine. Falldin, who arrived in Finland this afternoon for a brief lecture trip, could not escape the subject this time either. At Helsinki-Vantaa airport Falldin was asked once again whether the strategic balance in the north had been shaken as a result of the submarine incident. Falldin's reply was [word indistinct]. He said there have been no changes in the strategic balance. According to Falldin, it is significant for the north that the various countries have chosen their own security-political lines since World War II, and this has actively strengthened the stable relations in the north. Falldin pointed out that the stable conditions in the north have also had a favorable influence on the whole of Europe.

According to Falldin, the grounding of the submarine is an indication of the fact that the strategic importance of the north has increased. As examples Falldin mentioned the USSR's armament in the Murmansk area, the increase in NATO forces on the Norwegian coast and finally the factor that suddenly came to light this autumn -- that submarines cruising in the Baltic may carry, in addition to nuclear missiles, torpedoes equipped with nuclear charges. For this reason, Sweden maintains that the Baltic must also be included in the debate on a nuclear weapons-free zone.

Falldin asserted that each country has freely and independently chosen its security-political line, and each must freely and independently adopt a stand on the matter of a nuclear weapons-free zone. He stressed at the same time that although Sweden would like to include the Baltic in the Nordic nuclear weapons-free zone, each Nordic country independently will adopt a stand on what this zone should be like.

USSR OIL AGREEMENT -- The national oil company and the Soviet Soyuznefteksport have just signed an agreement on the new price of Soviet crude oil and conditions of payment and delivery. The price of the Soviet crude up to now has been a little under $36 a barrel. The new price, as far as is known, will be roughly the same. The price increase is thus so small that it will not cause any additional pressure on the consumer prices of oil products. [Excerpt] [Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1900 GMT 19 Nov 81 LD]

MINISTER RAPS SOVIET ATTITUDE ON ARMS PROPOSALS

LD201054 Helsinki International Service in English 0930 GMT 20 Nov 81

[Text] In Norway, Norwegian Defense Minister Anders Sjaastad described the Soviet attitude toward the forthcoming talks on medium-range missiles as unacceptable. He said that (?it is been a mistake) [word indistinct] NATO to give up plans for the modernization of the medium-range missiles and perhaps also remove the outdated Pershing land missiles from U.S. bases in NATO countries.

He sees no reason why the Soviet Union would need its SS-4, 5 and 20 missile systems that are targeted at Western Europe. The Norwegian defense minister expressed the hope that the zero option raised by President Reagan would be implemented.

PRESS GIVES VIEWS ON REAGAN DISARMAMENT STAND

LD191302 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1130 GMT 19 Nov 81

[From "Radio Magazine"]

[Excerpts] Reagan is bluffing, says the communist NORRSKENSFLAMMAN about the offer made by Reagan in his speech yesterday that the United States would not deploy new medium-range missiles in Western Europe if the Soviet Union promises to withdraw its missiles. Reagan's offer seems to be neither realistic nor acceptable, the paper says. If it were to be implemented, it means that the present balance will be replaced by a massive U.S. and NATO superiority. This would only result in the United States, with its long-dreamed-of position of strength, dictating the future fate of the world. Reagan's move does not seem to be anything but a pure propaganda bluff, says NORRSKENSFLAMMAN.

The moderate NORRBOTTENS-KURIREN says that Reagan, through his proposal, has undeniably placed the Soviet Union in an awkward negotiating situation, and has also aroused a flicker of hope that the superpowers will be able to reason between themselves and agree on a reduction, or at least a freeze, of medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe. This would be a significant step forward on a path on which the threat of nuclear weapons is growing greater, says NORRBOTTENS-KURIREN.

The Social Democratic VAERMLANDS FOLKBLAD says that Reagan's move shows that even he is not unaffected by the violent West European reaction to the proposal for the deployment of new U.S. nuclear missiles. It may be a public relations trick, but it would be crazy just to shrug one's shoulders at it, says the paper.

DEFENSE COMMITTEE BACKS DISBANDING OF REGIMENTS

[Excerpt] The Defense Committee has given its support to the proposal for the closing down of 15 military regiments and schools commencing in the mid-eighties. This became clear at the meeting Thursday. The so-called Death Patrol will commence work again and will report directly to the government on how the unit closings are to be implemented. The members of the Defense Committee did not consider that they could make detailed decisions about the various proposals for unit closures. Thus the committee in principle will back the so-called Death Patrol's earlier proposals for closures of around 15 units with the proposed objective of savings totaling 8 billion kronor.

All the nonsocialist and Social Democratic members of the Defense Committee gave their support to the proposal.

THATCHER, FOOT WELCOME REAGAN ARMS PROPOSAL

LD191632 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1600 GMT 19 Nov 81

"Most of us unreservedly welcome President Reagan's initiative, and we still hope for a Russian response," she said during Commons question time. "If that does not come, then I think it is very serious for the amount of money we have to spend in future on armaments." Although Mrs Thatcher welcomed what she called Mr Foot's conversion to multilateralism she clashed with him later. Mrs Thatcher told the Labour leader, "You have been arguing for the surrender of our security regardless of what the Soviet Union did.

"I believe in multilateral disarmament and I am anxious to see it. I hope it finds a ready response from the Soviet Union."

Mr Foot had told her: "We have a good deal better a right to welcome it than you, since we have been arguing for it in Moscow, Washington, Europe and everywhere else -- and the last person to support the zero option has been you."

During exchanges, Mrs Thatcher told Tory backbencher Mr Peter Bottomley (Woolwich West), "I formally welcome the great initiative of President Reagan in proposing not merely a limitation of nuclear armaments, but an actual reduction in nuclear armaments and a reduction in conventional forces as well. He has seized the initiative, and I hope we shall find a response from the Soviet Union." The prime minister went on, "I hope President Reagan's initiative will go ahead to negotiations which, I do not conceal from MPs, will be long and difficult, but very well worthwhile."

Mr Foot had pointed to Labour's campaign for nuclear disarmament and drew a contrast between the initiative and White House statements on the possibility of a "limited" nuclear exchange in Europe.

Mrs Thatcher replied: "I would have hoped you could have welcomed the speech in an unqualified way." And she added to Tory cheers, "I am delighted you are converted to multilateral disarmament."

CND WARNS REAGAN ON NUCLEAR MISSILE OFFER

PM191111 London MORNING STAR in English 19 Nov 81 p 1

[Sam Russell report: "CND Exposes Reagan's Nuclear Fraud"]

[Excerpt] Britain's Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament [CND] warned yesterday that President Reagan's much-boosted nuclear missile offer "was mainly about propaganda and not about disarmament." Pointing out that the president's offer of some sort of reduction of medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe was "in large part due to the activities of CND and other European peace movements," CND said it could only be "welcomed with reservations." In a statement from its London headquarters, CND said: "The essential point is that President Reagan has not offered to remove one single nuclear weapon from Europe. He has offered to stop the siting of an entirely new generation of weapons (cruise and Pershing), neither of which are yet in existence," CND said, adding that the Soviet Union was unlikely to respond by dismantling all its existing European missiles. "The President," CND said, "did not mention the already mighty American and NATO 'Euro-strategic' force, including F-111 longer range bombers based in East Anglia and West Germany, U.S. Navy nuclear submarines based at several locations, including Holy Loch in Scotland, or British and French nuclear missiles."

PAPER ON GOVERNMENT REPLY TO WALDHEIM DOCUMENT

[Excerpts] It has been learned that the document which the Greek Cypriot side has prepared with its "reservations" toward the "Waldheim ideas" is lengthy. At the beginning, it emphatically stresses that, for the Greek Cypriot side, the Waldheim document is not a document with "ideas" or "proposals" but an "evaluation document" by Mr Waldheim "on the course of the talks until now." Further on, the reservations document criticizes Mr Waldheim for his choice to entitle the document as "Guidelines," a thing which, according to the Greek Cypriot side, tends to scale down or neutralize the Makarios-Denktas and the Kiprianou-Denktas summit agreements.

According to the [Greek Cypriot] document, the only authoriative guidelines for the interlocutors are those which are included in the two summit agreements. In another point, the "reservations" document "notes" that, in essence, the Waldheim proposals abandon the "priority" for the question of Famagusta. Authoritative diplomatic observers expressed surprise, because the Greek Cypriot side has confined itself solely to "noting" the abandonment of the priority for the question of Famagusta and has failed to strongly criticize or protest aginast Mr Waldheim's violation [of the agreement on Famagusta].

The document also speaks about the presence of "positive and negative points" in the "Waldheim ideas," but does not cite the so-called "positive elements." According to the same authoritative observers, the adoption of such a stand is due to the fact that in reality there are no such "positive elements" which would be either substantive or be mentioned for the first time as "new positive elements" in the "Waldheim ideas." Generally speaking, the Greek Cypriot side's "reservations" tend to prove not that the "Waldheim proposals" provide for and aim at the establishment of "confederation" but that they tend to create "a federation which cannot survive."

The absence of substantive authorities for the "central government."

The economic arrangements which actually deprive the "central government" of any economic influence, power or authority on the economic affairs of the new state.

The fact that the Waldheim proposals avoid any reference to essential and constituent points for the new state, such as the "safeguarding of the territorial integrity and the unity of the state."

The fact that for the first time the "Waldheim proposals" define as criteria for the solution of the territorial aspect "the economic viability and the security of the Turkish Cypriot community," a thing which was strongly rejected by Makarios.

Finally, the document suggests that the two sides should submit a comparative study on the "Waldheim ideas."

Authoritative observers, who are aware of conditions and of off-stage activities, have stressed that the Greek Cypriot side's document is generally considered -- particularly by the United Nations and the Turkish Cypriot side -- as "very anemic," because it actually fails to criticize or reject the partitionist character of the "Waldheim ideas." The same observers added: This is why the Turkish Cypriot side has decided not to submit a document on the Turkish "counter ideas" which would undermine Waldheim's proposals.

NORTH'S ATAKOL CRITICIZES PAPANDREOU STATEMENT

[Text] Interior, Foreign and Defense Minister Kenan Atakol has said that Greek Prime Minister Papandreou is continuing to make damaging and dangerous statements and that the Turkish Cypriot side is preserving its sedate attitude in the face of these statements. In a statement to a TURKISH NEWS AGENCY correspondent, Atakol said that Papandreou made negative and damaging statements during his election campaign and that he continued to make statements in the same line also after his election. Atakol said: The Turkish Cypriot side will preserve its sedate attitude despite all these damaging and negative statements and despite developments. However, we will not make the slightest concessions of our rights and freedoms. We will continue to take very possible measure aimed at securing our rights and freedoms.

Commenting on the intercommunal talks, Atakol stressed that the Cyprus problem can only be solved through negotiations between the two communities. Atakol said: The Turkish Cypriot side favors the continuation of the intercommunal talks. We support these talks and we will continue to do so. However, we would like to point out that Papandreou's statements and recent developments cannot be taken light'y. We hope that world public opinion and the concerned UN officials have assessed these statements and developments.

TURKEY TO RELEASE TWO DETAINED FISHING BOATS

[Text] As announced by deputy minister to the prime minister Maroudhas, Greek Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos invited the Turkish ambassador to Athens to the Foreign Ministry and, in a demarche, requested the release of two Greek fishing boats and their crews which were detained by a Turkish patrol boat, even though there was no agreement as to the exact area where the two fishing boats were detained. Late in the afternoon, the Turkish ambassador to Athens informed the Foreign Ministry that the Turkish Government, responding to the demarche of the Greek foreign minister, has issued instructions to the Turkish authorities for the release of the two ships and their crews.

According to news agency reports, the Greek side considers the two Greek fishing boats as having sailed in international waters at a distance of over 10 miles from the Turkish coastline. The Turkish side, by contrast, maintains that the two fishing boats were inside Turkish territorial waters. According to the same reports, the two Greek fishing boats, after being detained, were escorted to the Gulf of Enez in the Evros area, from where it is expected that they will be released.

TURKMEN ASKS END TO VISA REQUIREMENT ON TURKS

[Text] The Council of Europe Ministerial Committee meeting is continuing in Strasbourg. The imposition of visas on Turkish citizens by certain Council countries was discussed during the first part of the meeting, which was attended by the foreign or deputy foreign ministers of 21 Council of Europe countries. Addressing the session, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said that the visa imposed on Turkish citizens is not compatible with the spirit and cooperation agreement of the Council of Europe.

Turkish radio and television correspondents Nusret Ozgul and Emre Aygen report from Strasbourg that during the meeting, Turkmen asked that the visa requirement be lifted as soon as possible.

The Council of Europe Ministerial Committee meeting will end this evening. A joint statement is expected to be issued at the end of the meeting. Meanwhile, the program of the delegation to visit Turkey was determined at the joint meeting in Strasbourg of the Council of Europe Consultative Assembly political and legal committees. The delegation, consisting of parliamentarians of member countries, will arrive in Turkey on 7 December.

Evaluates Council Session

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that the calendar that Turkey will follow in its return to democracy has nothing to do with a calendar which the EEC or other organizations might imagine. Turkmen added that the calendar which Turkey will follow will enable it to make the necessary preparations for the establishment of a stable democracy. Turkmen made an assessment of Turkish-Greek and Turkish-European relations after the Council of Europe Ministerial Committee Meeting ended in Strasbourg.

A joint communique issued at the end of the Ministerial Committee has two articles concerning Turkey. These articles referred to Turkmen's statements at the committee on activities in Turkey aimed at a return to democracy. Furthermore, attention was drawn to Turkmen's statement to the effect that principles such as respect for basic freedoms and human rights and abidance by laws will be fully observed during the period of transition to democracy.

On the other hand, the Greek representative at the committee, (Georgides), yesterday expressed the wish that an article be included in the communique calling for an immediate return to democracy in Turkey. However, Turkmen opposed this article. The Greek representative consulted his government following Turkmen's opposition and withdrew his request.

Following the conclusion of the Ministerial Committee meeting, Turkmen assessed Turkish-Greek and Turkish-European relations. He said that the Greek attitude at the committee was not approved and expressed the wish that this would encourage Greece to be more careful and logical in the future. Recalling that there are disagreements between Greece and Turkey, Turkmen noted the benefits of having a dialogue between the two countries. Turkmen added that, however, there was no clear idea as to what kind of a dialogue could be maintained with the new Greek Government. He said that most European governments had optimistic expectations concerning Turkey, noting that besides those representing Turkey there are those who support and understand Turkey in establishments of the European Parliament. Turkmen added the rejection of two motions that were submitted to the General Council confirmed this fact. He said: Given the situation, it is necessary to say that relations between Turkey and Europe have been strained.

ECEVIT TRIAL TO BE HELD BEFORE CIVILIAN COURT

NC200721 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 17 Nov 81 p 1, 9

[Text] Ankara (CUMHURIYET news desk) -- The Ankara Martial Law Command has ruled that former leader of the abolished Republican People's Party Bulent Ecevit will be tried by a civilian court on four charges -- which have been amalgamated -- of insulting the government. The dossier regarding the four amalgamated charges on which Ecevit was tried by the 4th Criminal Court for insulting the moral identity of the government in speeches he delivered in 1975 and 1976 was referred to the Ankara Martial Law Command in October for a ruling on whether Ecevit, in view of the recent amendments made to law No 1402, should be tried by a military or a civilian court.

Having examined the dossier, the Ankara Martial Law Command has ruled that Ecevit's trial should be continued at the Fourth Criminal Court.

Ecevit, who has already been sentenced to 4 months imprisonment for having violated decision No 52 of the National Security Council, will again appear before the 4th Criminal Court under charges of "insulting the moral identity" of the government.

OUR RADIO CRITICIZES U.S. MIDDLE EAST EXERCISES

TA181108 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0500 GMT 18 Nov 81

[Excerpts] Dear listeners: As of 14 November, the United States is holding its biggest show of force in the Middle East jointly with reactionary regimes such as Egypt, Somalia, Sudan and Oman. This military show of force by the United States is a preparation for an open military attack in the Middle East. The (?aims) of this military maneuver in the form of preparations for attack conducted by the Washington administration, which has declared this region as an area where it has vested interests, are evident.

Through this military show of force, the United States wants on the one hand to intimidate the Palestinian people and the progressive Arab countries that are struggling against imperialism, Zionism and the Israeli aggressors, to strengthen the position of the reactionary Arab countries in the region, which are its satellites, and to embolden Israel for new attacks. As a matter of fact, as soon as this military show of force was launched, Israel began amassing large quantities of troops and military equipment on the Lebanon border. On the other hand, through this military show of force, the United States is trying to enhance its military presence in the Middle East, locate new attack bases in this region and establish sovereignty over the countries in the region.

Furthermore, through this military show of force, Washington is attempting to impose the Camp David betrayal agreement -- which has ended in a fiasco -- on the Arab peoples. In other words, the United States is conducting an experiment to spark a new war in the Middle East.

These dangerous games played by U.S. imperialists in this most tense region in the world closely concern Turkey as well. Our country is located in this tense region. Therefore, the attitude to be adopted by Turkey regarding the situation in the region is very important. How can Turkey be [word indistinct] and contribute to regional peace? The answer to this question is evident. The Turkish Government must firmly oppose every stand that can exacerbate the tension in the Middle East. It must support the just struggle of progressive Arab countries and the Palestinian people. It must openly condemn Israel's aggressive policy and the U.S. imperialist moves to incite a new hotbed in this region. Failure to act in this manner will be tantamount to collaborating with the perilous plans by U.S. imperialists, Israeli aggressors and the Arab reactionaries.

Moreover, Turkey will not be able to remain outside any war which occurs in the Middle East. In view of the U.S. and NATO bases in our country and Turkey's membership in NATO, it is possible to see this fact [word indistinct]. In a future military attack in the Middle East, the United States will use Turkey as a springboard. The continuous pressure applied by the United States on Turkey on the subject of deploying the RDF in our country is not coincidental. The reactionaries in our country are ready for such an adventure and are doing their utmost to prepare the grounds for this. For example, in its 14 November issue, TERCUMAN writes that through the military show of force in the Middle East, the United States is supposedly trying to prove that it is not abandoning its allies and will not do so in the future. In other words, are these mouthpieces of reactionism and imperialism trying to say that if we engage in an attack in the region, the United States will never abandon us?

EEC APPROVES MEMBER PARTICIPATION IN SINAI FORCE

[Text] Paris, 23 Nov (AFP) -- Four European countries -- Britain, France, Italy, the Netherlands -- announced today that they would participate in a future multi-national military force in the Sinai. The four governments have informed Washington, Cairo and Jerusalem. This move has been approved by the other six members of the 10-nation European Common Market (EEC).

The EEC, in a communique, said that "The Ten consider that the decision of Britain, France, Italy and the Netherlands to participate in the Sinai multi-national force is an answer to the wish expressed many times by member countries of the EEC to facilitate all progress towards a Middle East settlement on the basis of a mutual acceptance of the right to exist and the security of all states in the region and the need for the Palestinian people to enjoy their full rights of self-determination."

The announcement of the four-nation participation was given in Amsterdam, London, Paris and Rome in almost identical communiques. They made clear that the decision was made following requests made by the U.S., Egyptian and Israeli Governments.

The conditions were: 1. The force exists only to maintain peace in the Sinai after the Israeli withdrawal (next April 26). It has no other role. 2. The force is established in its present form in the (?absence) of any United Nations decision to create an international force, and this position will be revised if such a decision is made. 3. The participation of the four governments in this force must not be understood as a commitment, nor in preventing them [from] participating in other international accords to maintain peace which have been, or might be, taken in the region. 4. The participation of the four governments in the force does not in any way affect their well-known policy on other aspects of problems in the region.

The statement as published in Paris said the four "considered their support to the agreements relative to carrying out the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty as totally separate and independent from the rest of the Camp David process. Their participation is "a symbol of the determination of the four to reach a solution of comprehensive peace, consequent to negotiations among the parties, which would ensure justice for all people and security for all the states in the region.

"They have greeted with favor the peace concluded between Israel and Egypt, (which is) a first step towards that objective," the statement said. "At the same time, they have expressed satisfaction over the evacuation of the Sinai by Israel, which constitutes in their eyes the first step in carrying out the withdrawal request contained in Resolution 242 of the (United Nations) Security Council.... They (the four) believe that the international community has the duty to play a role...in the conclusion of peace agreements in the Middle East," the statement said. "They are prepared to participate as well in such agreements concerning the occupied territories, in the context of an Israeli withdrawal."

The four also "express their support for the Egyptian people and government, and their conviction that Egypt needs stability and continuity," the statement said. Their decision to participate was a result of their Middle East policy, as defined in a June, 1980 statement after the Venice summit, it added. "This policy, while insisting on guarantees for the security of Israel, insists just as much on justice for the Palestinian people and their right to self-determination," the statement said. "It also implies that the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization) be associated with the process leading to a comprehensive pleace."

The statement also said the four would continue "with their (EEC) partners, to work for the realization of a comprehensive peace in the Middle East, with all our tasks (remaining) compatible with the principles to which they are attached."

SCHMIDT, BREZHNEV BEGIN OFFICIAL TALKS IN BONN

[Excerpts] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- Accompanied by their government delegations, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Soviet party and state head Leonid Brezhnev began their official political talks in the federal chancellor's office this morning.

Yesterday evening, when Schmidt accompanied the Soviet guest on the journey from the airport to his residence at Gymnich Castle, the two statesmen discussed the "central topic" of European medium-range weapons and their mutual interest in the continued development of German-Soviet relations. Bonn government circles said today that Brezhnev had himself broached the subject of arming with SS-20's, and had made it clear that it is difficult for the Soviet Union to understand Western concern about these weapons. During the car journey and then at Gymnich, there had been a discussion lasting approximately 1 hour.

Pointing to Schmidt's lengthy telephone conversation with President Reagan on Saturday evening, government sources said Schmidt, as presenter of the West's security position, has the U.S. President's unconditional agreement for everything that he says to Brezhnev.

SCHMIDT URGES QUICK COMPROMISE ON ARMS QUESTION

That takes much time, "and basically we do not have much time," Schmidt emphasized, because in the autumn of 1983 the second half of the NATO dual decision will have to be realized with the stationing of American medium-range missiles. The Federal Government wants to influence the medium-range missiles negotiations to that there is quick progress with both sides aiming for a compromise," This compromise should be looked for initially with the land-based missiles, in the opinion of the chancellor. The inclusion of air-and sea-based missiles would complicate the negotiations to such an extent "that there would be no hope of success."

Schmidt expects explanations of the Soviet position from Brezhnev, who is arriving in Bonn on Sunday evening for his long-planned visit to the FRG. On the other hand, the FRG was "naturally prepared to answer questions in turn, to explain what the West meant with this or that position."

It is certain that Brezhnev as well as Reagan wants peace. However, both are mistrustful of one another and are limited by all kinds of pressures and political considerations, Schmidt said. "But it is my concern that both the top men of East and West understand each other. To this we are contributing, and we will try and persuade them both to meet personally in the course of next year, so that they can see for themselves that the other is not a warmonger."

The chancellor stressed again that the FRG cannot play the role of intermediary and mediator between both the superpowers, because it is a part of the Western alliance. "What we can do and what we have to do is to try and work towards both of them talking to one another."

"With great moral emphasis" Schmidt wants to raise with Brezhnev the question of the ethnic Germans in the Soviet Union who want to emigrate. The number of exit visas has decreased drastically recently. The Soviet Union has an overall population of approximately 250 million people, the chancellor said. "These several tens of thousands cannot really be that significant."

Schmidt considers it to be realistic to expect that the natural gas pipeline contract signed on Friday will result in a considerable number of subsidiary agreements in its wake. This contract will not only revitalize economic relations, but will also be of influence on political relations. The Soviet Union is no longer in a position to withdraw from economic relations with the FRG with a light heart. "We have become a very important delivery partner," the chancellor said.

KOPL QUESTIONS SCHMIDT ROLE AS EAST-WEST MEDIATOR

[Text] Bonn, 20 Nov (DPA) -- A controversy has arisen today between the opposition and the Federal Government about Chancellor Schmidt's role in the talks and negotiations between the great powers on disarmament questions. The CDU/CSU stepped up its warnings to Schmidt against acting as a mediator between East and West. Immediately before the visit by the Soviet state and party leader, Leonid Brezhnev, to the Federal Republic the leader of the opposition, Kohl, said that Moscow and Washington have managed to maintain a dialogue without the mediation of third parties even in times of political tension, nor will this change in future. On the same day, the federal chancellor emphasized that neither he nor his government want to act as a mediator in the negotiations between the United States and the USSR on medium-range missiles.

Kohl's deputy, Zimmermann, said that it is not the chancellor's job to be "either interpreter or translator." He would be well advised to confine himself in his talks with Brezhnev to a clear-cut exposition of the West's negotiating position.

Kohl, who will also have a meeting with Brezhnev, said in an interview with STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN (Saturday edition) that on the disarmament issue he will explain to the Soviet visitor that the only chance for the counterarming part of NATO's dual decision being made redundant would be if the USSR were to withdraw its arms lead by the end of 1983. Kohl emphasized that a CDU/CSU government would also be ready to cooperate with the East.

The head of the CSU Bundestag group, Zimmermann, said in an interview with NORDWEST-ZEITUNG (Saturday edition) that of all the capitals of the major industrial countries Bonn is perhaps the only place where Brezhnev can go for talks in an attempt to improve his position. It is often overlooked in the West that Brezhnev too has problems. The fact that he is ready to make this physically strenuous visit is connected with his hope to intensify the pressure from the SPD and the so-called peace movement against NATO's dual decision on Western counterarming. Moreover, he is faced with considerable economic difficulties in his own country. Brezhnev's visit is strongly welcomed in CDU Secretary General Geissler. He hopes that it will make an important contribution to international understanding and the safeguards of peace.

Becker Denies Mediator Role

Becker said that reports quoting the chancellor as saying that the Federal Government wanted to act as a kind of mediator were inaccurate.

Schmidt had emphasized on several occasions that the Federal Government was anxious to contribute to bringing about the negotiations between Washington and Moscow and to ensuring their success. But as the chancellor had also emphasized, as a member of the North Atlantic alliance the place of the Federal Government was at the side of the United States and its other allies. The Federal Government could therefore not play the role of an intermediary between the two sides at the negotiations.

GENSCHER CITES SIGNIFICANCE OF BREZHNEV VISIT

[Excerpt] Bonn, 21 Nov (DPA) -- The significance of German-Soviet relations for East-West relations as well as for peace and stability in Europe was stressed by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn on Saturday. One day before the arrival of the Soviet head of state and party, Leonid Brezhnev, for a visit to the FRG which will last several days, the FDP chairman emphasized that FRG policies had been consistently aimed at using all opportunities for improving East-West relations, detente and disarmament as well as for a development in German-Soviet relations.

Genscher underscored that the forthcoming talks with Brezhnev gained their special significance from the fact that they are taking place immediately prior to the start of negotiations between the USA and the USSR on medium-range missil , and in a decisive phase of the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference. He said that the Federal Government has the full support of all the alliance partners in its demands for a mutual renunciation of medium-range missiles and for a European disarmement conference on confidence building measures for all of Europe.

BRANDT: BREZHNEV VISIT UNLIKELY TO YIELD RESULTS

[Excerpt] Bonn, 22 Nov (AFP) -- The Soviet Union may well bring up the military problems caused by a double front, one in Europe and the other in the Far East, during next week's tactical missile talks with the United States in Geneva, former West German chancellor Willy Brandt said today.

Hours before Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev was to arrive for a four-day official visit here, Mr Brandt said in an exclusive interview with AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE that West Germany could be the first allied government to get a glimpse of Soviet positions for the Geneva talks.

"If I understand correctly," said the current head of the ruling Social Democratic Party, "there are SS-20 rockets stationed in Europe and others on what is generally called the Far East theater. Will the Americans, while negotiating on the weapons based in Europe, be prepared to discuss weapons of the same type based on that theater? I have no idea," he said. "But I can well imagine that the Russians will say in Geneva that they have on one side a European theater and on the other a Far Eastern one," he said. "Concerning the SS-20 missiles," Mr Brandt said, "I believe that for once, the USSR preceded the West and that the Soviet military convinced the political leadership of the necessity of this decision."

Concerning the talks between Mr Brezhnev and West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Mr Brandt expressed doubt that there would be "any concrete results." But he added that they should allow the West to reassure Moscow about "the seriousness of its intent to negotiate," the former chancellor said. He also said the four-day trip would give Chancellor Helmut Schmidt a better idea of the Soviet positions, just a week before the opening of U.S.-Soviet Euromissiles talks November 30 in Geneva.

"This meeting could allow us to tell the Americans...the direction in which these talks will be headed," Mr Brandt said. He also minimized the importance of West Germany's stated intention to deploy medium-range North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) weapons on its soil by late 1983, unless the Geneva talks show a Soviet move towards withdrawal of its European SS-20's.

"If we have indications that lead us to think we are headed towards a result," he said, "NATO will not follow a firm deadline, because the NATO decision of December 1979 calls for deployment only in the light of the evolution of negotiations."

Mr Brandt also rejected Western analysts' speculation that Moscow would not negotiate seriously until the NATO deployment had begun. "If one looks at the past," he said, "one notices that concerning armaments, the Soviets have always made their decisions without taking into account whether or not negotiations were taking place." Mr Brandt also said the Soviets would come to Geneva armed with statistics on British and French nuclear power. "I will not tell you the conclusions I have reached from all this," he said, "because I do not want to weaken the West before the negotiations by giving easy arguments against the zero option."

Asks SPD To Submit Arms Proposals

[Text] Hanover, 22 Nov (DPA) -- With reference to the visit of the Soviet head of state and party, Leonid Brezhnev, to the Federal Republic, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has asked his party to submit disarmament proposals. Speaking at the congress of the Hanover region branch of the SPD, Brandt said today: "All German Social Democrats must join in formulating their expectations and demands on the great powers around the conference table." Whether or not the Federal Republic should maintain its endorsement of the NATO dual decision was a "superfluous quarrel. For the present stage this is not a relevant question," Brandt stressed.

The chairman of the Hanover region, Peter von Oertzen, warned against the military course pursued by U.S. President Reagan. Speaking at the same congress, the member of the SPD Federal Executive said that it was the essence of current U.S. policy "to behave as if one wanted to negotiate but at the same time make conditions causing the negotiations to fail." The Federal Government had the right "to make it clear to the United States that if it was not prepared to engage in serious negotiations it would destroy the political basis of the alliance." At the same time, Von Oertzen defended the continued endorsement of the NATO dual decision. Although new Eurostrategic weapons were "dangerous also for us" it was a fact that the USSR was ready to negotiate only under this threat.

MISCHNICK SEES U.S. OFFER ON DISARMAMENT AS HELPFUL

[Excerpts] Bonn, 20 Nov (DPA) -- The chairman of the FDP lower house group, Mischnick, has described the coincidence of the U.S. offer of a zero option for medium-range missiles with Brezhnev's visit to Bonn as helpful for the Geneva disarmament talks due to start at the end of this month. In an interview with DPA today, Mischnick said it was no accident that on the supreme question of arms control and arms reduction, Bonn should have become a by-word for positive initiatives and necessary contacts. This was the result of the persistent efforts of Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher who had done useful preliminary work for the resumption of the U.S.-Soviet dialogue both in Moscow and Washington.

The FDP welcomed that its demand for the total renunciation of the production and stationing of nuclear medium-range weapons in Europe was not the avowed aim of the U.S. Government. It was of the utmost importance for the stability and effectiveness of the Western alliance "that it should be clearly seen by everyone that the content and prospects of the peace policy were becoming one."

Mischnick affirmed his party's aim to achieve security agreements for Europe as a whole through a European disarmament conference. This could however only be achieved step by step over a long period and required much effort, courage and imagination. Without constant consultations within the Western alliance this road could not be followed.

FORUM SPEAKERS REJECT REAGAN MISSILE PROPOSALS

[Text] Dortmund, 21 Nov (DPA) -- Sharp criticism of the new proposals by President Reagan on reducing medium-range missiles in Europe was expressed by the main speakers at the second "Krefeld Forum" on Saturday to some 15,000 people at the Westphalia hall in Dortmund. They rejected the "false zero solution" of Reagan as a "destructive ambiguity."

"We do not believe that the zero solution propagated by Reagan will lead to the abandonment of nuclear weapons in Europe, because it demands the removal of existing medium-range weapons solely by the Soviet Union, not however offering the reduction of nuclear weapons already deployed on the Western side," Maj Gen [retired] Gert Bastian explained.

The organizer of the "Krefeld Initiative", Josef Weber, described the "apparent about-face by Reagan" as a "diversionary move of the first order. There is no doubt that with his propaganda coup Reagan intends first and foremost to mislead the peace movement rather than to begin serious negotiations."

Both the SPD lower house deputy Manfred Coppik and Petra Kelly of the National Executive of the "Greens" believe that the main danger of war lies in the policy of the Reagan government. Coppik: "It is the U.S. Government which is not only stoking up the arms race in the world through ever new measures, but is apparently well-nigh seeking regional conflicts." Yet most of the speakers did stress that the Soviet arms potential had to be reduced as well.

OFFERGELD CHALLENGES SOVIET THIRD WORLD POLICY

In the opinion of the minister, this subject could also play a role in Brezhnev's talks in Bonn. The problems of the developing countries were today no longer only a problem for specialists, but rather all responsible politicians realized clearly that the future of the world depended not only on the solution of the East-West problem but also on the solution of the problems of the Third World.

Offergeld criticized the "one-sidedness" of American development policy toward private initiative. This could not lead to results in such developing countries where the required prerequisites did not exist. Where people were vegetating at the minimum level of existence and no trained workers were available, the prerequisites for further progress had initially to be created by government aid.

An advance text of the interview was made available to DPA.

AGREEMENT TO PURCHASE SOVIET GAS CONCLUDED

[Excerpts] Essen, 20 Nov (DPA) -- The new, big German-Soviet natural gas deal is in the bag.

According to Ruhrgas AG, the agreement, which was signed in Essen today, provides that the Soviets will from 1984 onwards deliver for the duration of 25 years, 10.5 billion cubic meters of natural gas annually from new reserves in Western Siberia to the Federal Republic. The tough negotiations took over 12 months to complete. During their final stage in Essen, the price of the gas was the point at issue. The volume now agreed is lower by 1.5 billion cubic meters annually compared with the delivery plans mentioned earlier. According to these, the Federal Republic was to have received only a part, although the major part, of a total of 40 billion cubic meters of natural gas which the Soviets intended to send to West Europe via a new 5,000 kilometer long pipeline. The other recipients were to have been France (8 billion cubic meters), Italy, Austria, the Netherlands and Belgium.

Details of the German-Soviet and possibly of a West European-Soviet agreement have not been made known for the time being. Agreement on a guaranteed minimum purchase price for the gas was already reached yesterday as part of the French-Soviet negotiations. Afterwards, it was stated that the basic price and possible surcharges could be fixed only after the talks with the German leader of the consortium, Ruhrgas, have been concluded. Pipes, pumping stations and other materials required for the mammoth pipeline from Siberia to West Europe are to be supplied by Western, including German, firms like Mannesmann and AEG, on credit and against future payment by gas deliveries.

In connection with the conclusion of the German-Soviet natural gas deal, the Soviet side has also declared its readiness to supply 700 million cubic meters of natural gas to West Berlin annually, and to start negotiations shortly with those concerned.

Klaus Liesen, head of Ruhrgas, explained the reduction of the volume from the long-quoted 12 billion to 10.5 billion cubic meters by new market analyses, and the latest estimates of energy consumption developments which had led to lower values.

The agreed price, which had been intensely negotiated right up to the end, "is tied mainly to the price development in heating oil," according to Liesen. All parties [to the agreement] could demand at specific intervals a reexamination of the pricing formula, which was based, however, on preserving the competitiveness of nautral gas on world markets. Payment will be made in Deutschemarks. Liesen only quoted one figure in this connection: the delivery of approximately 250 billion cubic meters of natural gas up to the year 2000 would entail payments of over 100 billion DM -- calculated at present prices.

Liesen stressed that it is not an isolated Soviet-German deal, but "on the import side is really a West European joint project," in which Ruhrgas is only playing a special role in so far as it is buying the largest single quantity. About the criticism that the FRG could become too dependent on the USSR as regards energy, he said: "We can prove that the deal will not cause the alleged dependance." Even in the case of a total interruption of the old and the new deliveries, the shortfall could be made up by switching supplies, the use of other sources and the use of the grid system of the partners so that no serious supply difficulties would arise.

Soviet Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Nikolay G. Osipov said about the fears that there might be interruptions in deliveries, as there had been in the past: "We will stick exactly to the negotiated delivery plan." The pipeline which is to be built for the project is for export only and will have no connection to the internal Soviet supply. Therefore, interruptions were not to be feared.

LAMBSDORFF, ARKHIPOV TO DISCUSS ECONOMIC RELATIONS

[Text] Federal Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff will meet on Monday with First Deputy Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers Ivan Vasilyevich Arkhipov to discuss the state of and prospects for German-Soviet economic relations in connection with Brezhnev's visit to Bonn. This was announced today by the Federal Ministry of Economics in Bonn.

A spokesman pointed out that German-Soviet trade has doubled in the last 5 years compared to 1971-75. The natural gas pipeline deal, signed today, together with the already concluded or still expected agreements on construction of the pipeline, will contribute to the long-term stabilization of economic relations. The improvement in the energy supply to Berlin, connected with the project, is also welcomed.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH SALVADORAN FOREIGN MINISTER

[Text] Bonn, 20 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Government hopes that the Latin American country of El Salvador, marked by heavy internal conflict, will find the path to democracy in peace and without violence. This was expressed by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today in a talk with El Salvador's foreign minister, Fidel Chavez Mena. According to the FRG Foreign Ministry, he informed the federal foreign minister on the situation in his country and on the elections planned by the government for January next year.

Normalizing Relations

STRAUSS COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH PRC LEADERS

[Excerpt] Beijing, 20 Nov (DPA) -- The forthcoming Brezhnev visit to Bonn and the military situation in Europe were the main subjects of the talks which CSU Chairman and Bavarian Minister-President Franz-Josef Strauss had in Beijing today with high-ranking functionaries.

Strauss said after his meeting with Deputy Foreign Minister Zhang Wenjin and Defense Minister Geng Biao that the Chinese leadership had advised the West European states and the United States to stay with the NATO dual decision. It is, in the Chinese view, the prerequisite for military balance in Europe and thus for world peace.

Asked about Brezhnev's visit to Bonn, Strauss said later in a DPA interview that Bonn should not see itself as the Soviet Union's negotiating partner. Only the Americans are this. "If the FRG were to abandon the joint NATO position, then that would be the beginning of the end," Strauss said. The Soviets and the Americans had also negotiated without the efforts of the FRG, if it was in their interest.

Speaking about his meetings with Chinese functionaries, Strauss said that unlike before, the thesis of the inevitability of a new world war is no longer current in Beijing. On the other hand, the states of West Europe, Japan, the United States and China would have to remain vigilant and oppose Soviet hegemonistic strivings, in the view of the Chinese.

Deputy Foreign Minister Zhang Wenjin, Strauss said, had emphasized again that nothing had changed in China's stance toward the Soviet Union. Negotiations with Moscow on border problems which were begun some years ago and which are currently interrupted had not made any progress according to Zhang. Already on Thursday another leading Beijing functionary had rejected speculations that an improvement in the climate of relations with Moscow was imminent.

Talks With Deng Xiaoping

[Text] Beijing, 21 Nov (DPA) -- The Chinese leadership is more optimistic today than previously that world peace can be preserved. The CSU chairman and Bavarian minister-president, Franz Josef Strauss, said that this was the impression he gained on Saturday in Beijing in talks with the deputy party leader, Deng Xiaoping. Strauss told journalists in the Great Hall of the People after his hour and a half meeting that the Chinese side no longer talked of the inevitability of war.

The foundations of Soviet policy remain hegemonistic and expansionistic, Deng said, but this is being recognized by a growing number of peoples, among them the Poles and the Afghans.

Strauss held a comprehensive exchange of ideas on world political affairs with Deng, whom he last met in 1975 during his first trip to China. The forthcoming visit by Brezhnev to Bonn and the situation in Europe were also discussed, as was economic cooperation between China and the FRG. Strauss said that a clear statement on the country's economic course will emerge in the coming months. Originally it was thought it would be made at the time of the presentation of the new 5-year plan at the Chinese National People's Congress session. The Beijing press on Saturday announced that the People's Congress would reconvene on 30 November in the Chinese capital.

Holds Press Conference

[Excerpts] Beijing, 21 Nov (DPA) -- At the finish of his 3-day political talks with the Chinese leadership, the CSU chairman and Bavarian minister-president was received today in Beijing by Prime Minister Zhao Ziyang. The meeting, which was concerned above all with Chinese internal political developments, took place in the so-called Violet Light Temple in the normally inaccessible government quarters of the Beijing city center. Observers assess this to be a gesture with which the Beijing leadership wants to mark the visit of the CSU politician.

Strauss said at a press conference at the end of his China visit that the forthcoming Brezhnev visit in Bonn had also been discussed in his talks. The Chinese leadership had inquired with interest about the visit but had refrained from any assessment from their point of view.

To the question of what he personally expected from the Brezhnev visit, Strauss said at the press conference that he had no expectations. The Soviets were only concerned with the public relations effect of the visit. Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt was too level-headed to allow himself to be overexcited or to be gullible about the visit, Strauss said. It was the intention of Moscow "to push the American President into the sinister role of the capitalist destroyer of peace" and to get for Brezhnev "the white garment of an angel of peace."

Strauss said that he would meet for a talk with Brezhnev on Tuesday in Bonn.

Dealing with economic cooperation between the FRG and China, Strauss said that in the talk Prime Minister Zhao Ziyang had expressed China's interest in expanding trade. The economic situation of his country, Zhao stressed, had considerably improved recently.

CHEYSSON CRITICAL OF HIGH U.S. INTEREST RATES

[Excerpt] Before the deputies, but like them, [External Relations Minister] Mr Cheysson deplored the "small improvement in funds for our diplomacy." Moreover the external relations minister's role is not "to define a foreign policy" but "to provide the government and the nation with the means of carrying out its external action." Reviving Europe, he said, means, in particular, "developing the community of workers and not making do with the community of traders and big business." In addition all the EEC countries must join together to denounce "the disastrous nature" of some aspects of U.S. policy. "Especially the dollar's unpredictable fluctuations and high interest rates. Nothing could justify policies which would push some European countries beyond the threshold of suffering and indignation for those who would thus be deprived of any hope of overcoming unemployment."

Mr Cheysson: We Stand by the Humiliated

Cooperation with the Third World in seeking growth, Mr Cheysson continued, should not make us lose sight of "the fundamentally political nature of the commitment to stand by the weak and oppressed, those who have been kept on the fringes in recent decades, the proletarian nations, to cite a famous expression. The underprivileged people in French society made a decisive contribution to bringing the left to power. We are proud of that and are therefore concerned about their fate under all circumstances. For the same deep-seated reasons we stand by the humiliated, and people who are emigres and exiles in their own land, those who are gagged, persecuted, tortured, those who are in detention, have disappeared, been murdered, tortured priests, imprisoned trade unionists, workers without any rights, peasants wtihout land, unarmed resistance fighters, all those who simply want to live in freedom."

France, Mr Cheysson stressed, "does not accept orders or mandates even from its closest allies and friends." Each people, he stated, "has the right to self-determination: all foreign occupations should be condemned and denounced whatever the color of the uniforms and doctrines." In the Near East peace can only be brought about by "free negotiations relating to all subjects, among all the peoples in the region including the PLO." France, for its part "cannot be nonaligned. It stands alongside those who share the values of its civilization."

There are "areas of agreement" between "France and the Soviet Union on many subjects, Mr Cheysson stated. "People in Moscow are saying that the Soviet Union is threatened by infiltrations through that neighboring country [Afghanistan]. That cannot justify the pursuit of military actions in a foreign country." The Soviet Union's "considerable" effort in the arms sphere "clearly jeopardizes the balance of force between East and West. For France, as for all its European allies, there is only one response: to negotiate everywhere and constantly to restore and guarantee the balance at the lowest possible level. Terrifying advances have been made on the Soviet side" in the sphere of medium-range nuclear weapons. Unless the SS-20s "are withdrawn and destroyed, the desire for a balance will require that they be countered with equivalent weapons. The decision made in December 1979 by our NATO allies was therefore necessary." Mr Cheysson stressed "the danger of separating, if only for demonstration purposes, American defense and European defense.

"Now what would West Europe be in the face of the East's gigantic conventional and nuclear arsenal if there were no strategic nuclear forces? And yet at the same time the various demonstrations in Europe reflect a certain unrest which is the result of the anxiety many people feel at the buildup of weapons and dangers. Anxiety and fear are bad advisers. Isolation does not protect you against continental or worldwide threats.

Resignation in the face of the superpowers is not the way to be heeded. Pacificism and neutralism must not be confused with the desire for peace and independence. Fear of war must be replaced by this desire for peace, national egoism must be replaced by the search for joint action, and resignation must be replaced by the resolute assertion of principles. We must not flee from the danger of war, we must tame peace."

AGREEMENT TO PURCHASE SOVIET NATURAL GAS NEAR

[Excerpts] (?Paris) 19 Nov (AFP) -- West Germany and France are each apparently on the verge of signing agreements with the Soviet Union on the supply of natural gas from Siberia, a move viewed with concern by the United States.

The Soviet Union has been holding talks on gas contracts with several West European countries for a year. The talks concern the delivery of 40,000 million cubic metres of Siberian gas per year from the late 1980's of which 12,000 million would go to Germany, with France and Italy each taking 8,000 million.

The project would require the construction of a gas pipeline 5,000 kms (some 3,000 miles) long with the help of Western industrial firms. Meanwhile informed sources in Paris said that France and the USSR appear to be about to conclude an agreement for Siberian gas supplies from 1984 as a result of four days of talks here between Gaz de France and the Soviet Soyuzgas company. Gaz de France sources said that "very serious progress" has been made but the agreement will not be signed before the Soviet delegation chief Nikolai Osipov, vice minister for external trade, leaves for West Germany tomorrow.

Authoritative French circles noted that the two sides' points of view have "come much closer together." They did not rule out that an agreement on the delivery of 8,000 million cubic metres from 1984 might be signed at the meeting of the Franco-Soviet Grand Commission in Moscow on December 14 and 15.

France's External Trade Minister Michel Jobert said an agreement might be signed at the meeting of the grand commission, and he described U.S. attempts to dissuade European countries from signing the gas contract as "simplistic."

Soviet diplomatic sources expressed satisfaction with the "constructive atmosphere" of the talks which began on November 1. The outcome of the Franco-Soviet talks was seen as depending heavily on the talks involving Germany. The Gaz de France sources declined to comment on the terms of any compromise, but some sources suggested that the price would be about five dollars per million British Thermal Units (BTU's) which is the current world market price for gas. Under the deal Soviet gas supplies would account for about 30 percent of consumption in France in 1990 compared with 14 percent now.

L'HUMANITE CRITICAL OF REAGAN ARMS PROPOSAL

PM231053 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 19 Nov 81 p 1

[Text] What is the value of the offer made in the speech delivered by President Reagan yesterday? It has been called the "zero option." What is it really?

The United States would abondon plans to deploy its new nuclear armaments -- 108 Pershing II and 496 cruise missiles -- in Western Europe provided the Soviet Union dismantles its SS-20, SS-4 and SS-5 missiles.

This proposal makes two observations necessary.

The first is that the effort to which its acceptance would give rise is certainly not the same for both sides. The Americans would simply refrain from deploying new missiles while the Soviets would unilaterally have to dismantle theirs. The second observation is that Mr Reagan is purely and simply disregarding a large number of nuclear weapons which it is vital to take into account to make a correct evaluation of the Eurostrategic balance of forces and ensure that the balance is respected.

In this connection the London TIMES published on 16 November a significant table which includes, in the sphere of armaments with a range of over 1,000 km 352 F-4's, 156 F-111's and 48 British Vulcan bombers, not to mention aircraft based on aircraft carriers. On the other side, of course, aircraft such as the Soviet Backfire bombers have to be taken into account and according to the TIMES there are 65 of them.

In his book "The Duty To Speak [Le Devoir de Parler]," Adm Antoine Sanguinetti estimates that there are at present around 30,000 U.S. nuclear weapons against 10,000 Soviet nuclear weapons. The 30,000 American weapons, he writes, include "10,000 strategic weapons and 20,000 tactical weapons.... The Soviets on the other hand have around 5,000 strategic weapons and 5,000 tactical weapons.... This is an overwhelming superiority but in the West's favor, the opposite direction to the one usually suggested."

For their part the Soviets explain that the SS-20 missiles are merely a response to the imbalance which was likely to be produced to the detriment of the USSR's defense capability. They calculate that there is now approximate parity between NATO and the USSR in the sphere of Eurostrategic arms: 986 weapons on the NATO side and 975 on the USSR's side but that the deployment of the Pershing II and cruise missiles would give NATO a 150 percent advantage as regards the number of missiles and 200 percent as regards the number of warheads.

That is why in a recent interview in DER SPIEGEL, Brezhnev condemned in advance the attempt to limit the negotiations on Eurostrategic weapons "solely to the medium-range Soviet missiles which should be dismantled" in exchange "for the U.S. missiles which were scheduled to be deployed in Europe. Those who put forward proposals" of this type, Brezhnev said, "probably do not imagine for one moment that the USSR could accept them."

But the Soviets, it should be remembered, are proposing that a moratorium on the deployment of these weapons in Europe be declared at the start of negotiations on medium-range nuclear arms. They say they are prepared to reduce the number of missiles on their side if the United States cancels its plans on the new missiles.

Before Mr Reagan had even delivered his speech, commentators had predicted that he would try to compensate for "the negative effect created in Europe recently" by numerous American statements and that he would launch a "campaign to charm people" on the eve of Brezhnev's visit to the FRG. It is certainly true that Mr Reagan's remarks envisaging a nuclear war "limited to Europe," or Mr Haig's statement predicting that the United States might use nuclear weapons first "as a warning," aroused a feeling of outrage in European public opinion. Demonstrations against the arms race are growing over our entire continent. Mr Reagan cannot disregard them; he feels the urgent need to portray himself as a dove. However, for that to be taken seriously Mr Reagan would have to stop demanding that others take umilateral steps but agree to real negotiations for a balanced arms reduction.

It is of course important for Soviet-American preliminary negotiations on the Eurostrategic weapons to start in Geneva on 30 November and for them to be followed in January by a Gromyko-Haig meeting on intercontinental weapons. Similarly it is important to take note of Mr Reagan's acceptance of the principle of a conference on disarmament in Europe.

France is in a position to make an active contribution to the success of such negotiations and to ensure that they start with the aim of producing results and not simply to deceive public opinion. The latter's pressure, far from easing off, should be increased to prevent the deployment of new nuclear weapons in Europe, to secure a universal ban on the neutron bomb and to ensure that practical decisions are made to reduce the level of armaments on both sides without jeopardizing the balance of forces.

LE MONDE VIEWS STATE OF FRENCH-SOVIET RELATIONS

[Editorial: "When Paris and Moscow Observe Each Other"]

[Text] From the moment he took office Mr Mitterrand adopted a very firm attitude toward the Soviet Union, and in particular ruled out any summit meeting between Paris and Moscow while, to quote Mr Cheysson, Soviet troops continue to camp in Afghanistan.

The president, who thus implicitly suspended the practice of annual summit meetings started by Georges Pompidou and continued by Mr Giscard d'Estaing, also aroused the Soviet leaders' anger by very clearly condemning the arms efforts made by Moscow for several years and by supporting the NATO decision to respond to that effort by deploying medium-range Pershing II and cruise missiles in West Europe.

Apart from some slight shifts French-Soviet relations have scarcely evolved for 6 months. However it is clear that they cannot be limited for the next 7 years to the few visits which USSR ambassador to Paris Chervonenko takes care to pay to the Elysee, as he did once again on Friday 13 November to hand Mr Mitterrand a message -- the content of which is not known -- from Mr Brezhnev.

Indeed it is as if the period of observation between the two sides was not yet over. Mr Mitterrand, who seems to have learned from the way in which the Soviets often succeed in using any high-level meeting to their advantage, does not seem in any hurry to respond to the Kremlin's pressing appeals, and this is good diplomacy. Indeed Moscow is at present in the uncomfortable position of asking for meetings.

In addition it seems that before going any further the president wants to be clear on the attitude which Moscow will adopt in several spheres: first at the CSCE conference, which is still dragging on in Madrid; second in Bonn, which Mr Brezhnev will visit from 22 through 25 November and where, as several Western governments fear, the Soviet number one will probably try to make some spectacular gesture to boost the pacifist and neutralist movement which is developing in the FRG.

Mr Mitterrand, who is acutely aware of problems of strategic balance, also wants to obtain some idea of the state of mind in which the Soviets will approach the negotiations which they are going to have with the Americans in Geneva on 30 November on Eurostrategic armaments.

In the short term Paris is favorable to a major revival of commercial and industrial exchanges with the USSR. Of course people are thinking of the signing, which should take place shortly, of an agreement on the price of the Soviet gas which France is to buy over 20 years, but many other affairs are pending. They could be revived during the French-Soviet Cooperation Commission meeting which will be held in Moscow on 14 and 15 December and which will be chaired by Foreign Trade Ministers Jobert and Patolichev.

It will apparently not be until after that meeting that the possibility of a visit to Moscow by Mr Cheysson will be studied, independently of political talks at a lower level like those which have just taken place between senior French and Soviet officials on the Near East.

COLOMBO PRAISES REAGAN NUCLEAR ARMS PROPOSAL

Referring to the contents of Reagan's suggestion to cancel plans for the deployment of NATO cruise and Pershing II missiles on this continent if the Soviet Union agrees to dismantle its SS-20 missiles pointed toward Europe, Colombo said that the reference to the "zero level" as an objective in the coming negotiations on disarmament in Geneva takes into consideration the ideas expressed for some time now by Italy and the other European allies.

In the European Economic Community (EEC) context, Colombo maintained that Italy concurred with the necessity of reinforcing and extending a common European politics, rationalizing farm policy, and balancing the EEC budget during the meeting of the "Ten" foreign ministers which took place in Brussels on November 16-17.

During that same meeting, Colombo said, which was dedicated to preparations for the coming European Council of heads of state and government slated to begin in London on November 26 EEC diplomatic heads also conferred over the various aspects of a possible participation of Italy, France, Great Britain and the Netherlands in a multinational peacekeeping force for the Sinai Peninsula. Colombo also said that the "Ten" ministers expressed their satisfaction for the realization of an African peace force for Chad.

Referring to a recent meeting with United States Under-Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger for consultations requested by the American official on the negotiating position which the United States will assume in Geneva, Colombo said the meeting was another demonstration of the American willingness to keep faith with its commitment to maintain close and continuous consultations with the European allies on all nuclear arms negotiations.

In conclusion, Colombo revealed that his recent official visit to the Yugoslav capital of Belgrade confirmed the excellent political framework which regulated relations between those two countries.

PLO'S 'ARAFAT INVITED FOR VISIT BY BERLINGUER

[Text] Rome, 21 Nov (ANSA) -- The leader of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, Yasir 'Arafat, has accepted an invitation proffered by Italian Communist Party secretary, Enrico Berlinguer, to visit Italy, according to a report which the Communist Party's official newspaper "L'UNITA" is scheduled to publish in tomorrow's issue. According to the account, the invitation was contained in a letter delivered last Friday to 'Arafat by a delegation of the Italian Communist Party, who are presently on a visit to Beirut as guests of Syria's ruling "Ba'th" Party.

In the letter, Berlinguer reportedly renewed "the expression and the commitment of communist solidarity with the Plaestinian people and with the PLO". In accepting the invitation, 'Arafat confirmed "the willingness to deepen and extend relations with Italian and European democratic forces".

The Communist Party delegation in Syria is directed by Senator Emanuele Macaluso, a member of the Communist leadership, and also includes Renzo Trivelli, from the Central Committee; Giancarlo Lannutti, from the editorial staff of L'UNITA; and Remo Salati, from the party's Foreign Affairs Section.

GOVERNMENT, UNIONS REPORTEDLY REACH AGREEMENT

[Text] Rome, 21 Nov (ANSA) -- The Italian Government and organized labor have already reached an agreement on tariffs for services and controlled prices, according to a leading Italian news weekly, the Rome-based L'ESPRESSO.

Generally regarded as well-informed, the weekly's revelation was seen by observers here as indicating that Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini has won his battle for an overall pact designed to limit inflation to no more than 16 percent a year.

Pre-publication versions of the weekly's claim reached the news agencies at about 1700 GMT yesterday afternoon and by the early hours of this morning, no comment was forthcoming from either government or trade union sources.

In its negotiations with the Spadolini government, organized labor has always seen some reigning in of public tariffs and other prices directly or indirectly under government control as part of a package for cutting back labor costs.

Small hints indicated that there was some foundation for the L'ESPRESSO report. At the congress of the CGIL union federation, whose majority is controlled by Socialists and Communists, the radical left Proletarian Unity Party delegation said they would present a motion criticising the leadership over its policy towards labor costs.

A few minutes after this move, the leader of the more conservative UIL union federation, Giorgio Benvenuto, a Socialist, issued a statement voicing the hope that the report made by CGIL Secretary-General Luciano Lama would be approved when the congress winds up later today.

Benvenuto added the hope that the CGIL would approve a position that is "open" on the problem of labor costs so that a "unitary understanding" with the UIL and the other major labor federation, the CISL, would be possible.

Benvenuto was backed up by CGIL Assistant Secretary-General Agostino Marianetti, a Socialist, who delivered a speech interpreted by observers as all in favor of trade union unity.

This, he said, should emerge "in serious terms" by offering "concrete margins" for negotiations with the CISL and the UIL in working out a common platform.

As the CGIL congress winds up this afternoon, observers said that internal opposition to the Lama line would have only marginal space for manuever by presenting amendments of no substantial importance.

According to these forecasts, even if some of Lama's opponents may win election to the federation's general council, the upshot will probably be a large majority in favor of reigning in labor costs in return for tax-breaks for wage-earners.

PRESS VIEWS IMPROVING RELATIONS WITH FRANCE

[Text] Rome, 20 Nov (ANSA) -- Relations between Italy and France were described today as having entered a "new phase" in editorial comment in the nation's major dailies on consultations in Paris yesterday between Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini and French President Francois Mitterrand.

The Italian head of government also met with French Premier Pierre Mauroy and was accompanied in the French capital by Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, who held separate talks with French External Affairs Minister Claude Cheysson.

"After years of a chill in relations between the two Latin Republics, a Paris-Rome axis has been created", according to the big Rome newspaper, "IL MESSAGGERO".

The comment then fit the shift into the context of the European Economic Community heads of state and governemnt meeting on the calendar for November 26 and 27 by noting that, "by forging the instruments for a different balance within the European Community, Italy and France will defend closely aligned positions at the European summit in London".

"MESSAGGERO" said that Mitterrand proposed "a step towards closer relations between France and Italy with working visits along the same lines as those applied to consultations between France and West Germany.

"This new chapter implies the evolution of the old Franco-German axis into a Rome-Paris-Bonn 'policy triangle,'" the Rome paper affirmed.

The right of center Rome daily, "IL TEMPO", reported that, "the new periodic bilateral Franco-Italian consultations are not institutionalized by a document, like the Franco-German talks, but this is due solely to the character of the two men who wanted these consultations. Both statesmen are learned in 'classical culture' and, therefore, tend to an approach which is not bureaucratic but pragmatic".

The Christian Democrat Party organ recalled a point of friction between the two countries last summer in commenting "we hope the hatchet of the Franco-Italian wine war has been finally buried".

"IL POPOLO" added that, "Paris and Rome are in agreement on the need to support proposals for an urgent revision of EEC Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) which considers the interests of the Mediterranean region during the forthcoming EEC summit".

"L'UNITA" the Communist Party paper, referred to the "new climate" in relations between Paris and Rome and affirmed that the "most striking" outcome of the Spadolini-Mitterrand meeting was the statement delivered by the French president in which he spoke of "periodic working visits" to be scheduled for twice a year.

This new type of relationship, the Communist daily said, will go into effect with the visit to France of Italian President Sandro Pertini "who is expected to arrive in Paris in the early months of 1982."

The Italian premier and foreign minister found "a new atmosphere in Paris, one no longer dominated by the Franco-West-German understanding", according to "LA STAMPA" of Turin.

"Once upon a time, the Paris-Bonn [as received] had the value of a dogma", the editorial said and added, "the more humanitarian approach of the new government leads to the thinking that ties between France and Italy will be more natural".

PALME VIEWS REAGAN DISARMAMENT PLAN FAVORABLY

[Text] In a first Swedish reaction, the Social Democratic leader Olaf Palme says that President Reagan's speech earlier concerning the deployment of new nuclear missiles in Europe may mean a significant change in United States policy. Palme also says that it is important that Reagan extend the forthcoming talks with the Soviet Union to include not only medium-range weapons but also strategic and conventional armed forces. What then is the most important thing in Reagan's speech, Olof Palme?

[Begin recording] [Palme] It is the attitudes to the disarmament problems which have previously not been found in the new American administration, and therefore may mean a rather significant change in policy. He says that disarmament is so immensely important that an increase in the nuclear weapons arsenals means a threat to peace, that he understands the desire for peace, (?for) a number of positive assessments of disarmament [words indistinct]. The essence is that now the Americans also want to negotiate. An exceedingly dangerous situation has existed because the superpowers have not been negotiating with each other.

[Question] Reagan has not previously presented himself as an apostle of peace. Do you doubt the sincerity of his move?

[Answer] Well, I do not want to assess that. I only think it is much better if the American President is talking about peace and disarmament than if he is talking about war and armament. And what [words indistinct] that will soon become clear in the negotiations.

[Question] And you do not personally think that if this American proposal was carried out it would disturb the nuclear weapons balance in Europe to the disadvantage of the USSR?

[Answer] Yes, of course it would. This is why the Russians are reacting so violently. But there is nothing strange if Reagan presents an initial offer which benefits himself, one has to accept that.

[Question] What do you think will be the result of the forthcoming negotiations?

[Answer] It is my sincere hope that it may be a step toward real disarmaments because otherwise the world will be extremely dangerous over the next decade. [end recording]

ULLSTEN VIEWS DEFENSE, URGES JAS PRODUCTION

PM201141 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 15 Nov 81 p 6

[Margareta Artsman report: "Nuclear Arms in Leningrad Are Intended for the Nordic Countries"]

[Text] Goteborg -- In the Leningrad Military District alone there are more than 150 pieces of artillery, launching ramps and aircraft intended to carry nuclear arms.

These are so deployed or equipped that they must be primarily intended for the Nordic regions. In addition there are at least 10 Soviet surface ships equipped with nuclear arms in the Baltic.

This is the first time the Swedish Government has made these facts public. They were cited by Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten in a speech here on Saturday [14 November] to the Swedish Civil Defense Association. The facts have been well known within the armed forces but have been kept secret up to now.

This was partial confirmation of the report in SVENSKA DAGBLADET on Saturday about nuclear armaments in the Baltic. The article spoke of a total of 109 ships and submarines with around 400 nuclear missiles and torpedoes.

"The submarine affair has shown us that there are more nuclear arms in our immediate area than we can imagine," Ullsten said in some comments to SVENSKA DAGBLADET. "It has also taught us that Sweden must tighten up its defenses and increase its watchfulness."

In his speech Ullsten came out strongly for the JAS [pursuit, attack and surveillance] aircraft. "The choice for it should be easy," he said. He also said that we must look again at the resources we set aside for the surveillance of Swedish waters, especially in hunting for submarines. The 1972 defense bill meant that shipping defenses were given much lower priority. This in turn meant that Sweden has done without new vessels suitable for searching for and action against submarines.

"This philosophy must now be reexamined, not least bearing in mind that we now have much larger territorial waters to watch over. It is correct to make investments in more effective coastal defenses with more effective technology. We cannot allow shortcomings in the belief that we will have time to remedy them before a mobilization," Ullsten said. He also said that perhaps the most important conclusion to be drawn from the submarine incident is that the boundary between conventional arms and nuclear weapons is being erased more and more. This lowers the threshhold for nuclear war.

"A sort of gray zone has come into existence," he said to SVENSKA DAGBLADET. "Today it is difficult to know what are nuclear arms and what are not since more conventional weapons than had previously been believed turn out to be equipped with nuclear charges. This means a greater threat to us."

The submarine affairs shows how important it is that the nuclear arms aimed at the Nordic area are removed from our immediate vicinity. Interest in the Nordic countries is to be found in both superpowers, Ullsten said. Beginning this fall the United States is regularly engaging in strategic surveillance with its most advanced surveillance aircraft, the SR-71, over the Baltic. Beginning next year the controversial AWACS planes will operate in Sweden's immediate vicinity.

"But it is not illegal to engage in surveillance as long as activities are limited to this. The Soviet Union, which claims that it is a supporter of a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries, has acted in a way which shows how urgent it is that such a zone be set up. Soviet credibility in the zone issue has been dealt a serious blow. The very credibility of any future guarantees must be questioned after what has happened. In our view what Sweden must do now is to push the demand in all contexts in which nuclear arms are discussed that nuclear arsenals, especially those in Europe, be drastically reduced. This is why nuclear arms must be included in the so-called TNF negotiations at the end of the month, that is, the negotiations on the Eurostrategic arms. And they must be included in the disarmament conference to which Sweden has been invited in Madrid."

Ullsten said that he was frightened by the U.S. speculation on a limited nuclear war. Such a thing is not possible, it leads inexorably to escalation and to a strategic nuclear war with total devastation. "As far as the Swedish defense forces are concerned, we know that unilateral Swedish disarmament would not be in the interests of peace," Ullsten pointed out. It is not possible to increase defense spending. The organization of the armed forces in peacetime must be slimmed down and training made more effective. We would weaken our defenses if we made drastic cuts in material purchases instead of closing units."

But it is Ullsten's view that even if our naval defenses need to be improved, the situation is better with regard to our air defenses. However, the organization of military air transport, which was limited in the past, must be increased.

"As far as the JAS is concerned it is my view that the idea is well supported by the leaders of our armed forces. For reasons of security and industrial policy is it important that the next generation of aircraft is also developed within Sweden. The Swedish aircraft industry can meet the demands which the commander in chief has placed on it. But is it also necessary that civilian production should increase, and Saab and Volvo Flygmotor have succeded well in this respect." Ullsten also said that his earlier view of the B-3LA [previous proposed Swedish military aircraft] question had turned out to be correct. "If we had invested in the B-3LA, we would not have been able to afford the JAS today." Finally he said that Sweden needs an improved and more youthful civil defense. This could become a reality if the civil defense were allowed to recruit 5,000 young people per year, including draftees and those allowed to do nonmilitary national service, the liberal party leader said.

He added: We believe that a federal solution is feasible and our efforts are turned toward this direction. The achieved solution must be based on the UN resolutions and the summit agreements.

GOVERNMENT SEEKS MISSING PERSONS SOLUTION IN UN

NC211302 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 21 Nov 81

[Text] The government of the republic and the Greek Cypriot side have decided to proceed with the necessary actions to promote the missing persons issue through the United Nations. Announcing the decision, Foreign Minister Rolandhis stressed that the government and the Greek Cypriot side have no other choice in view of the stalemate at which the issue has entered because of Turkish intransigence. Mr Rolandhis added that, following an understanding with President Kiprianou and the concurrence by the committee of missing persons relatives, he gave appropriate instructions to the republic's permanent delegate at the United Nations. Mr Rolandhis said: However, if progress is made in the meantime within the framework of the work of the investigatory committee for missing persons, the debate of the issue at the United Nations may be suspended. Mr Rolandhis stressed that the decision was made after exhausting all possibilities offered for discussion of the missing persons issue at the investigatory committee.

NORTH'S CAGATAY REPLIES TO PARTIES' STATEMENT

[Text] National Unity Party [NUP] leader and Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay has issued a statement today in reply to the joint declaration by Communal Liberation Party [CLP], Republican Turkish Party [RTP] and Democratic People's Party [DPP] leaders which was released yesterday. The statement says that if the joint move by the three parties is not directed at dragging the Turkish community to an adventure, then it is possible to find the most realistic and viable government model in accordance with the principles of mutual compromises -- which have always been favored by the NUP. The statement adds: in democratic systems, numerous possibilities and formulas can be found for the solution of existing problems, without, however, neglecting democratic rules or the realities of the country. The statement recalls that the NUP, which was in power before the 1981 elections and which won a plurality in these elections, endorsed the task of forming a government in a bid to eliminate a situation in which the community would be left without an executive body. The statement points out that the other three parties which could not then reach a consensus on the subject of forming a government and assuming power have now reached a stage in which they are seeking a unity program in a bid to solve their differences.

After noting that because the opposition parties did not act in the Legislative Assembly in accordance with the democratic principles of compromise and dialogue, the government was not able to function in a suitable atmosphere, the statement says that taking into consideration the arithmetic of the assembly, the government model envisaged by the CLP, RTP and DPP would not be able to serve the country and state properly. The statement concludes: The NUP is a political organization which has the support of our people. It is out of the question to find a viable government model in accordance with our conditions and the realitiies by ignoring that political power.

PAPANDREOU BRIEFS KARAMANLIS ON NATION'S DEFENSE

After the meeting, President Karamanlis made the following statement to representatives of the press: We came away absolutely satisfied with the briefing given to us by the country's military commanders. We established that the country's armed forces are truly at a very high level at this very moment. They have spiritual unity, they have discipline and they are excellently armed. For this very reason, we must surround them with love and continually strengthen them by making new sacrifices, should this become necessary. This is most imperative today when the international situation is confused and special dangers threaten Greece.

Replying to a question on whether the matter of the war industry was examined during the meeting, Prime Minister Papandreou said, it is the government's intention to expand the war industry at the fastest possible rate.

Papandreou Statement

NC221235 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 21 Nov 81 p 1

[Excerpts] The government's defense program (providing for an increase in armaments' expenditures and the fast development of the domestic war industry aimed at making the country self-sufficient at least in spare parts in the initial phase) constituted the primary axis of yesterday's conference at the Pentagon. The conference was held to brief the president of the republic on matters of national defense.

Answering questions from journalists, the prime minister stated that no particular political significance was attached to yesterday's conference. He also said that his visit to Brussels in December, which he is making within the framework of the NATO Defense Ministers Conference, "is an opportunity for orientation."

At the same time, in a statement to military correspondents, Mr Papandreou said: "I believe I do not have much more to add to what the president of the republic has already stated. It probably was the most wide-ranging briefing that could be made. It covered the financial aspect of the development of our defense capability and revolved around such well-known basic questions as Greece's participation in the military alliance, financial aid from abroad and the question of the U.S. bases. On all matters, the briefing was very successful and complete both for the president of the republic and for myself and my associates."

Concerning the domestic war industry, Mr Papandreou stressed: "Certainly there is the intention to develop it with the greatest possible speed."

COUNCIL EXAMINES GOVERNMENT POLICY STATEMENT

[Text] None of the positions declared by PASOK in the economic sector and in other sectors more generally will be abandoned. This was stressed during today's Council of Ministers meeting under Prime Minister Papandreou which dealt with the Government's policy statement, to be read in the Chamber of Deputies tomorrow night.

This position, stressed by Deputy Minister to the Prime Minister Maroudhas, is established by the context of the policy statement which is the result of collective work by staff units with the participation of ministers, deputy ministers, technocrats and other government personalities.

The policy statement will be subdivided into two basic sectors: The first will be the economic sector and will include a report on what the new government took over, what measures it will take for the recovery of the country's economy, to check inflation on investments for productive purposes and measures against unemployment no matter what its percentage may be. The same sector will also include the government's income policy.

The second sector will refer to foreign policy and defense. Specifically, the prime minister will explain the government's positions on questions such as NATO, the bases, the Aegean balance of power, defense policy, relations with Turkey and the EEC.

Papandreou will also refer to other basic questions of domestic policy, such as administration, local self-government, education, social welfare and others. As reported, the vote of confidence to be given to the government after the vote is cast Tuesday night will have the meaning of a carte blanche authorization to the government to handle the matter. It is estimated the prime minister's statement, covering all aspects, will last for 1 and 1/4 hours.

Discussions in the Chamber of Deputies will be given television coverage by both channels, at different times, and will be broadcast over the first radio program at 2200 tomorrow night. As reported, the statements of official opposition leader Rallis and former Prime Minister Kanellopoulos will be given proportional time on Monday night, and the statements of KKE Secretary General Florakis and Mavros on Tuesday night.

Papandreou Begins Statement

[Text] At 1840, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou began reading his government's policy statement in the Chamber of Deputies. At the beginning, the prime minister stressed that basic goals of the government policy are national independence, territorial integrity, people's sovereignty and democracy. The government program also provides for self-sufficient economic and social development of the country, cultural revival, revival of the countryside and radical improvement of the quality of life in the city and the village. The goals of the government, which also determine the road to be followed, are also social justice and social liberation.

In connection with the change, the prime minister said that its course will be long and will depend on the inexhaustible power of the united and sovereign people, who will make vision a reality. He added: Change is a vision and a course. But it is also [word indistinct] practical action and a way of life. This will constitute the golden ray for every [words indistinct].

Further on Mr Papandreou said that with the people's cooperation he will make Greece [passage indistinct]. In connection with the foreign policy, the prime minister stressed that [words indistinct] the shaping of an independent, [words indistinct] Greek foreign policy. [passage indistinct] As for our country's strategic position toward NATO, the prime minister said that the (?vision) of the government is the dissolution of the two cold war blocs, of NATO and of the Warsaw Pact. [Words indistinct] the Greek people are not inclined [words indistinct] the 7-year dictatorship in Greece [words indistinct] to stop the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. He added: There is no sense in our belonging to the military section of an alliance which does not guarantee our eastern borders against any possible threat and which, with the simultaneous and unlimited supply of war materiel to Turkey, tends to overthrow the balance of power in the Aegean. Besides, the Rogers agreement is harmful to our national interests.

In connection with the U.S. bases, Mr Andreas Papandreou said that during the negotiations he will hold in the first months of 1982 he will clearly set a timetable for their removal from our country.

As for the European Economic Community, the prime minister stressed that the government's aim is the holding of a referendum in accordance with constitutional procedures so that the people may decide. The decision for the holding of the referendum belongs to the privileges of the president of the republic. The government's position is firm in connection with the shaping of a special agreement that would allow industrial and agrarian development of the country and will safeguard national independence.

The reading of the policy statement by the prime minister is still in progress.

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou and Chairman of the EEC Executive Committee Gaston Thorn met at noon today at the political office. Thorn arrived in Athens last night within the framework of his tour of EEC capitals in preparation for the London summit conference.

Welcoming Thorn, the prime minister stated: I am particularly glad because before attending the summit conference I will have the opportunity, both officially and unofficially, to discuss Greek problems within the framework of the Common Market. Replying to Papandreou, Thorn stated: This tour, which is undertaken in my capacity as chairman of the committee prior to the community's summit conference, takes on a very special significance here because it is very important for me to come to Athens after the change of government. I am glad to meet you, Mr Prime Minister, and I hope we will have an exchange of views which, as I hope, will be the first in a lenghty cooperation. I believe that together we will be able to better prepare both for the London summit conference and for the cooperation of the community's committee with the Greek Government to facilitate a solution of the problem which we will have to deal with. One of these, he said, was on whether it was possible to resolve the problems within the framework of the present community's mechanisms or if other mechanisms should be found.

Mr Thorn added that it was agreed that the Greek positions should be expressed more explicitly and to follow up and exchange views on all the problems without haste. Mr Thorn expressed the view that the Greek-Community dialogue should be held within the framework of the present system. He also said that the community must better understand Greece's problems. Greece, in turn, must get to know better the community's mechanisms and the possibilities and benefits it has to offer.

PAPER CRITICIZES VISITING IRANIAN HEALTH MINISTER

[Text] Ankara, 20 Nov (AFP) -- Turkey's largest newspaper today lashed out at visiting Iranian Health Minister Hadi Manafi for allegedly criticizing a former Turkish president as a "bloodthirsty man". "We have two words to say to our guest: that's cheek," a headline splashed across the front page of the 700,000-circulation newspaper HURRIYET said today. "We have never had such an ill-mannered official visitor," it added. A Foreign Ministry spokesman confirmed the incident but refused comment, saying only that "Iran was a friendly country".

The affair started with a booklet distributed in Istanbul by the delegation led by Dr Manafi that arrived here two days ago on an official visit. The booklet, called "Iran: From Slavery to Freedom", included a photo of Cevdet Sunay, who was president of the Turkish Republic from 1966 to 1973, with the late Shah of Iran Mohammed Reza Pahlavi celebrating the former Iranian regime's 2,500th anniversary. The photo caption referred to: "The Shah and his Bloodthirsty Guests at the Table of Pillage, Unaware of the Poverty of Millions of Destitute Iranians". Mr Sunay, 82, also a former chief of General Staff, currently lives in retirement in Istanbul.

Ministry Disavows Criticism

[Statement by Turkish Health and Social Welfare Ministry 20 November -- read by announcer]

[Text] It is in an atmosphere of friendship and good neighborliness that Iranian Health Minister Hadi Manafi and those accompanying him are paying a visit to our country, discussing with our ministry's officials health problems connected with our region and emerging from similar conditions of climate. A daily newspaper dated 20 November 1981 has published a news report concerning our honorable visitors in an unpleasant and offensive style. In an effort to create an atmosphere that harms the existing friendship and goodneighborly relations, the newspaper report claims that the Iranian minister has distributed pamphlets during his visit to Istanbul.

An investigation by our ministry has confirmed -- by statements made by our ministry's deputy under secretary and deputy foreign relations chief, who have accompanied the Iranian minister and his colleagues from the moment they set foot on our country at Istanbul's Yesilkoy airport -- that neither the visiting minister nor those accompanying him have distributed pamphlets to anyone, anywhere at any time.

The visit of the Iranian minister constitutes an open sign of existing friendship, and it is in this spirit that his visit of 3 days in our country has been conducted. It is obvious that rumours to the effect that pamphlets were distributed by the visiting minister in Istanbul are only an attempt to undermine friendship between Turkey and Iran.

[Text] Istanbul, Nov 21 (AA) -- Turkey and Yugoslavia have agreed to cooperate in combatting gunrunners, drug smugglers and terrorists. The pledge came in a joint communique issued after the Turkish Minister of Interior Salahattin Cetiner paid an official visit to Yugoslavia.

The statement pledged action against "illegal traffic in narcotics and other forms of international crime" and against "any terrorist and subversive activity against one of the two countries." Cetiner and Belgrade Interior Minister Franjo Herljevic also agreed on measures to improve the flow of Turkish workers (?driving) through Yugoslavia to and from jobs in Western Europe.

MINISTER OZAL STOPS IN ATHENS EN ROUTE TO UAE

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Primer Minister Turgut Ozal has said that necessary agreements have been made with Libya for the import of 2.5 million tons of crude oil for next year. Ozal made the statement to journalists during a stopover in Athens on his way from Tripoli to Abu Dhabi.

Pointing out that his contacts in Libya were very beneficial, Ozal said that Libyan leader Qadhdhafi told him he had given the necessary instructions to those concerned for the improvement of relations with Turkey. Ozal added that during his stay in Libya, agreements were signed for new investments in the fields of housing, heavy industry and railroad construction.

Turkish Radio and Television correspondent in Athens Ozgen Acar reports Ozal as saying that an agreement was signed increasing the capital of the proposed holding of Islamic countries to $500 million instead of $100 million as decided earlier. Ozal said that Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates were also expected to join the holding which would be headquartered in Istanbul.

Recalling that Turkish exports to Libya which amounted to $60 million last year were expected to reach $430 million this year, Ozal said that next year this amount was expected to be more than $600 million. After noting that rumors to the effect that Libyan payments for Turkish exports and amounts due to Turkish construction firms were being delayed were unfounded, Ozal said that some bureaucratic difficulties existing on this subject were eliminated during his contacts in Libya.

During his stay in Abu Dhabi, Ozal will review Turkey's economic and trade relations with the United Arab Emirates. He is expected to return home next week.

CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY RATIFIES INTERNAL STATUTES

[Text] The Consultative Assembly ratified today a law concerning its internal statutes. The law will be in effect as soon as it is published in the Official Gazette but will be retroactive to 23 October 1981, when the assembly met for its first session in Ankara.

The 15 members of the Constitution Committee will be elected during the meeting of the assembly scheduled for Monday, 23 November. According to the statutes that were passed today, the Constitution Committee will meet as soon as its members have been elected by the assembly and will elect its officials no later than 24 hours after it undertakes work. The committee will submit a monthly report to the Chairmanship Council of the assembly indicating progress made in its work in connection with the preparation for the speeding up of the work. Those elected to the committee will remain members of the committee for a year.

The statutes of the assembly also envisage the formation of 10 more specialized committees in addition to the Constitution Committee. The statutes stipulate that the judicial year begins on 1 September and ends on 31 August.

The statutes also limit the days the Consultative Assembly can be closed to no more than 45 days for leave during a year except for adjournment. In the event a member is absent from the assembly session for 5 days in a month without excuse, or permission, he will be liable to be dismissed from membership by the decision of the Consultative Assembly.

The Consultative Assembly will meet for 4 days a week on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesday and Thursday at 1400 and will conclude its work at 1900. Though the plenaries of the assembly will be open to the public, committee meetings will be held behind closed doors.

The Chairmanship Council will prepare the regulations concerning the work of the Turkish and foreign correspondents who will report the assembly discussions. Requests and objection letters addressed to the Consultative Assembly Chairmanship Council in accordance with Article 62 of the constitution will be dispatched by the chairmanship to the National Council Secretariat. After it completes the election of members to the committees, the assembly will begin discussing 83 bills and proposals which are on its agenda.

COMMAND UPHOLDS BULENT ECEVIT'S PRISON SENTENCE

[Text] Ankara, 20 Nov (AFP) -- The Ankara State of Siege Command has confirmed a four-month prison sentence passed on former Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit for contravening the ban on political activities in the country, well-informed sources here said today. Mr Ecevit was sentenced under a National Security Council law banning all political activity in Turkey.

The former premier had handed foreign correspondents the text of a letter he sent to the radio-television following a televised speech by Head of State Gen Kenan Evren in which the general explained why he had banned political parties.

The National Security Council having decided that all sentences of less than three years imprisonment could not be appealed, only the Ankara State of Siege Command could have reversed the decision. Mr Ecevit, who was three times prime minister in 1974, 1977 and in 1978-79, is expected to be asked to report to jail within a week, his lawyers said.

TIME LIMIT TO FORM NEW GOVERNMENT EXTENDED

[Text] Brussels, 20 Nov (AFP) -- King Baudouin of Belgium today gave Herman van der Poorten additional time to obtain an accord between the country's political parties on the composiiton of a new government. Van der Poorten, named by the king to try to form a new government, had been unable to obtain the needed agreement in the designated time. The failure was seen as threatening to string out negotiations for weeks.

The Liberals, big winners in the November 8 elections, are unable to form a minority government without a coalition. But the Flemish Socialists refuse to align themselves either with the Liberals in a bipartisan coalition, or with the Liberals and Social Christians in a tripartisan bloc. And the Social Christians, still smarting from their election defeat, are holding to a "wait and see" stance.

PSUC EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ENDORSES PCE EXPULSIONS

PM200857 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 15 Nov 81 p 27

[Text] The final resolution adopted by the Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia [PSUC] Executive Committee in connection with the PCE Central Committee's design to expel six of its members was released yesterday. In the resolution the PSUC approves the decision concerning which, as is known, there were different stances within the PSUC leadership.

The resolution reads verbatim: "The PSUC Executive Committee, which has already displayed on a previous occasion its concern about the political repercussions and those on institutional life which the PCE leadership's decisions vis-a-vis certain stances on the part of some of its members could have, has found that efforts were made until the last moment by the PCE Central Committee to resolve without penalities the actions contrary to the rules by six of its members. The decision which was finally made therefore lies entirely within the framework of the PCE's organizational and democratic functioning.

KREISKY EXPLAINS PROBLEMS WITH POLISH REFUGEES

AU201325 Vienna KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 20 Nov 81 p 3

[Text] Budapest -- Austria's enormous problem with the 50,000 emigres from Poland as well as yesterday's KRONEN-ZEITUNG report, in which Interior Minister Lanc for the first time spoke about a reintroduction of visas for Poles, are casting shadows even over Chancellor Kreisky's visit to Hungary. Here in Budapest the chancellor, in an interview with KRONEN-ZEITUNG, fully backed his interior minister's statement, which has also caused quite a stir abroad: "Ev erything has been agreed on with Lanc."

At the same time Kreisky confirmed Austria's plight and expressed his bitter disappointment over the inadequate readiness to aid on the part of the Western immigration countries: "We have reached the limit of our capacity. The emigres from Poland are costing our little country nearly 800 million schillings. Now there is even the danger that we may have to close down schools so as to provide accommodation for the Poles; and they are actually not the only refugees from the East. The threat to reintroduce visas is a call for help, a shot across the bows, especially of those who pose as champions of human rights but keep their own borders closed. It is a final attempt to morally rouse these people and these countries by a spectacular move."

The chancellor revealed what presumably touched off the change in his attitude necessitated by the pressure of the difficult situation; a change that obviously deeply touches him personally because he repeatedly refers to his own fate as an emigre: Kreisky recently sent a letter to U.S. President Reagan begging him to admit more Polish immigrants from Austria. Reagan's answer was grotesque and shattering. Kreisky: "In the letter it is stated that the President admires us, that he finds our attitude on this question magnificent, that he pats us on the back." No more.

Chancellor Kreisky touches for the first time, and with an unprecedented frankness, on another particularly sensitive aspect of the problem: "This type of Polish emigre is actually not the kind of person for whom our population has a particularly great understanding. Indeed it is certainly not a question of these refugees having been in mortal danger. One cannot speak of political emigration at all. At present there is no political persecution in Poland. Moreover, the people who come to our country are naturally not taking part in the Polish people's current struggle for freedom. I know what I am talking about because while I was in the Social Democratic underground in the era of Austro-Fascism no one in our movement was allowed to desert from Austria who was not threatened with imprisonment of at least 5 years. Hence we Austrians need not reproach ourselves in times such as these. Since the end of the war we have been Europe's most generous country as regards the admission of refugees."

Lanc on Visa Requirement

AU201242 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1100 GMT 20 Nov 81

[Text] Interior Minister Lanc stated today on the problem of the steadily increasing number of Polish refugees in Austria that he considers a temporarily limited introduction of compulsory visas for Poles possible. Lanc said this measure was a means of last resort to meet the financial and organizational difficulties as well as difficulties in maintaining order that are resulting for the Austrian state from the refugee problem. Currently some 50,000 Polish refugees are staying officially in Austria.

Lanc leaves for Australia tomorrow to appeal to Canberra to accept more Polish refugees.

QUEBEC MAY SEEK REFERENDUM ON OTTAWA AGREEMENT

PM231427 Paris LE MATIN in French 16 Nov 81 p 8

[Marie-Claude Decamps interview with Quebec Minister of Intergovernmental Relations Claude Morin -- date and place not given]

[Text] Morin: With negotiations as "loaded" as those in Ottawa, how could we fail to be angry! Almost all the English-speaking provinces had signed an agreement with us on 16 April. It was even signed in front of the television cameras. It was a common front to denounce Trudeau's methods and to secure guarantees. Quebec is now alone; the others did not want to take the matter to London. But we are not going to accept a unilateral reduction of our powers just because we have been betrayed.

LE MATIN: How would your powers be reduced?

Morin: It is complicated to explain. We did have a veto right, but now, if we reject a federal program and replace it with our own program, we will not receive any subsidy from Ottawa. In other words, any desire to "differ" from the federal will is sanctioned! Let's take a specific example, that of education, which is the most obvious: In Quebec there is a law that allows English-speaking inhabitants of Quebec to be taught English. But there is no equivalent provision for the French-speaking minorities in the other provinces. What are we now being asked in the name of the "Canadians' charter of rights"? What does Trudeau want to install? We are being asked to institutionalize the protection for English-speaking people in Quebec. Fine. But what are we being given in exchange? We are told: "Where the minorities are big enough, they will have teaching in their own language." But that doesn't mean anything, because how big is "enough"? Isn't this vagueness the best way of avoiding the issue? To take one last example: The social mobility this charter will produce will go against the provinces' individual employment policies.

LE MATIN: Are the Quebec people aware of this danger?

Morin: The betrayal of the Ottawa negotiations has clarified people's thinking in Quebec, and we have returned to the situation that existed before the referendum. However, those who voted "no" at the time because they thought a new kind of federalism was less risky than our "sovereignty-association" plan know that they have been cheated. The new federalism will not protect the right of French-speaking people; quite the reverse. So they are now turning to us -- who had bowed to their will -- and are urging us to continue the struggle. Moreover Levesque and I have already been criticized publicly for our famous initial alliance with the English-speaking provinces.... This is a revival of the policy of seeking the worst in order to exploit it.

LE MATIN: Could you be forced into becoming even more "radical"?

Morin: We are already boycotting the regular consultations between Quebec and Ottawa. In the near future we may also envisage a referendum to ask the inhabitants of Quebec whether they approve of the agreement reached in Ottawa. If the "no's" win, it will be very serious for the federal government; it is unprecedented for an entire population to reject what some people are trying to impose on it!

LE MATIN: Could that rejection revive separatism?

Morin: It is possible. You know the inhabitants of Quebec are not belligerent people. But when they are attacked they respond. And haven't they just been attacked?

SCHMIDT ADVOCATES 'SECURITY PARTNERSHIP'

DW241019 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2006 GMT 23 Nov 81

[Text] Peace is not endangered, but the concern for the preservation of peace is great. There are reasons for concerned questions and uncertainties between East and West. Trust has been upset and fear exists on the part of many people on both sides, for this reason it is important that talks like ours take place. In times of increased tension it is especially necessary to listen to each other attentively and carefully. For this reason your visit is very welcome.

The Federal Government is holding these talks with you as the government of a country which is a member of the Atlantic alliance and the European Community. Our position is firmly rooted in the common interests of the West. We have contributed constantly and considerably to the formulation of the West's common stand and will continue to do so.

You, Mr General Secretary, have always recognized this and made it clear that the Soviet Union has no desire to change and jeopardize our relations with our friends.

By making our position clear to you we want to help you to understand better the interests and plain concerns in the Western camp and take them into account in your own considerations. To the peoples of the Soviet Union who were caused great suffering in the name of Germany and by Germans during World War II, I say: The German people want peace.

I say this as a member of the generation to which you also belong -- a generation which has directly experienced war and which has seen Europe destroyed from Calais to Moscow, from Rotterdam to Cologne and from Dresden up to Warsaw and Leningrad. We are aware of what death, flight, destruction and the loss of one's homeland mean. We then started to rebuild our countries, to create conditions under which human work would bear fruit and under which a meaningful life could be lived. In doing so we did not follow identical concepts of how society, the economy and the state should be organized and how the freedom, justice and welfare of the individual could best be guaranteed. In one point, however, full conformity of views exists between us, namely, in the passionate will to contribute each day, each week, each month and each year to continuously creating peace.

For this reason, Mr General Secretary, I agree with you when you say in the foreward of the German edition of "Speeches and Declarations," which has just appeared in this country, and I quote: that the difference in ideologies can be harmonized with the common concern for peace and that this difference does not preclude the concerted efforts of the peoples to solve the vital problems on which their welfare depends. End quote.

Mr General Secretary. This readiness to actively contribute to the preservation of peace is supported by all people in the Federal Republic of Germany. This is particularly clear in the peace initiative of the German Trade Union Federation and its chairman, Mr Vetter. I might add that our past and the geographical location of our country, as well as the political situation of our nation, all three of these elements make it more urgent to us than to others to seek new options for the continuation of detente and for the continuation of cooperation.

There is no reasonable alternative to peaceful equal cooperation between states. This was stated in the communique following the visit which Federal Minister Genscher and I paid to you in Moscow in the summer of last year. External security also must be a key element of this cooperation. Peace can be guaranteed today only by acting with and not against each other. In this regard I advocate a comprehensive political partnership on security.

During your state visit to our country in 1978, we contributed together an important building block for such a security partnership when we noted in our joint declaration at the time, and I quote: Both sides deem it important that no one strive for military superiority. Both sides proceed from the premise that approximate balance and parity are sufficient to guarantee defense. In their view, appropriate disarmament and arms limitation measures in the nuclear and conventional field, corresponding to this principle, would be of major importance. End quote. This morning you once again recalled this quotation during our first conference.

Since then, new developments have occured about which we are very uneasy. The increase since 1978 in Pioneer missiles, which we call SS-20's, to more than 250 units -- these are mobile, have altogether more than 750 warheads and a high degree of accuracy -- directly affects our security interests and gives us cause for great concern.

Since 1978, and repeatedly since then, I have been able to point out to you, Mr General Secretary, and other members of the Soviet leadership, the political consequences which could ensue if the Soviet Union did not desist from its medium-range arming which changes the balance of military forces in Europe and threatens us as well as other states in Europe. Since this unfortunately did not happen, the North Atlantic alliance reached a decision at the end of 1979 on modernizing its own medium-range potential. This response in arms policy was, however, linked in NATO's dual decision with an equally strong offer for negotiations.

Through their readiness to begin talks next Monday in Geneva on nuclear medium-range weapons, the United States and the Soviet Union have likewise shown that dialogue and cooperation on vital issues of security are a top priority political goal as far as they are concerned. Both sides have thus also demonstrated their basic readiness for effective arms limitation.

The Federal Government warmly welcomes this especially since it has helped to the best of its ability to bring about these negotiations. The negotiations should bring forth a result by autumn 1983, in other words, before the West can site land-based medium-range weapons -- for the first time since the early sixties.

If an agreement cannot be reached despite all efforts, then my country will carry out its obligations emanating from the other part of the dual decision in the security interests of my country and of the Western alliance.

I know, Mr General Secretary, that President Reagan is approaching the Geneva talks with an earnest will to achieve a reduction in the nuclear threat through arms limitation. This has once again been confirmed by the impressive speech which President Reagan gave last Wednesday. We share the U.S. President's desire that both sides fully renounce medium-range missiles in Europe. Our talks today should and can contribute toward giving positive impetus to these forthcoming talks.

It is an encouraging sign for me in this respect that the U.S. Government is ready to continue talks on strategic weapons -- called SALT -- in the spring of 1982, and you too, Mr General Secretary, have clearly made similar statements along these lines. Trust would also be strongly promoted by a successful conclusion to the CSCE followup conference in Madrid with the adoption of a concrete mandate for a European disarmament conference with confidence building measures for all of Europe.

We welcome very much the fact that dialogue between the Soviet Union and the United States has clearly increased again in content and intensity. It would be especially important if you, Mr General Secretary, would meet the President of the United States. A clear signal of hope and trust could emanate from such a meeting.

Peace must not only be ensured between East and West, but tensions and crises must be defused at other points in the world as well. They tie up political and material forces which we urgently need to find answers to the questions which are really important to mankind.

No country has been exempt from the critical developments in the world economy. We are affected just as you are. The economic exchange between our two countries can be especially beneficial to both us in this situation. For us it safeguards jobs, for you it also generates foreign exchange for the necessary purchases of grain.

However, the Third World countries suffer most of all. They expect us to respect their independence and their political and cultural sovereignty. This also applies to the desire of the Afghan people for an independent and nonaligned Afghanistan, free of foreign troops.

Mr General Secretary, we have been able to discuss in all frankness those questions that are important for East-West relations and for world peace and well-being because our bilateral cooperation has been good for more than a decade. We adhered to this, sometimes against resistance, on the basis of the existing treaties which you and Foreign Minister Gromyko negotiated at the time with Chancellor Brandt and Foreign Minister Scheel. We agreed in 1978 to promote our relations in the economic, industrial and technological field on a stable and long-term basis. This is being done in the conviction that an expansion and intensification of our long-term cooperation in these fields not only is in the economic and social interest of both sides, but that it can constitute an important contribution to long-term cooperation in all of Europe as well. This holds true today and tomorrow, just as it was true 3 years ago.

On this basic, for example, German enterprises are participating in the large-scale natural gas project on which a contract was concluded the other day in consideration of the interests of both sides. We will also intensify and enhance mutual economic cooperation in the future wherever it is advantageous to both sides.

What seems to me to be of special significance for the consolidation of our mutual relations is that we are sharpening in our two countries the awareness again of what we Germans and what the people of the Soviet Union have contributed in the course of our long history to the common heritage of European culture. In so doing we should keep in mind, above all, how strongly the artistic and intellectual creations of one country has influenced the other. These questions deserve to be dealt with between us with greater frankness. In any event, I personally see quite clearly the great influence Pushkin, Dostoyevskiy, Tolstoy, Chekhov, Gorkiy, and others -- or Mussorgskiy, Tchaikovskiy, Prokovyev, Shostakovich in music -- have had on my personal picture of Russia and the Soviet Union. For the younger generation there are other important and shining examples.

What should be valid for topical cultural and scientific relations is that we must try to overcome still existing impediments. In this context, Mr General Secretary, I would like to raise an issue which moves me very much personally. What I mean is the reunification of families. What is involved is the fate of human beings and the desire of loyal citizens of your country to return to their historical homeland. You yourself, Mr Brezhnev, have described in the excerpts from your recently published memoirs, and on the basis of your own personal and national experience, what homeland means -- and you did this in a way which moved me very much.

In conclusion, Mr General Secretary, what is required of us is responsible political action. Never before has it been as necessary as it is today for commonsense and a very concrete understanding of the interests and concerns of the other, regard for the interests of the other, and moderation in one's own choice of words and deeds to prevail in dealing with each other. These virtues, which are valid for individual relations, have now become imperative preconditions for the peaceable life together of peoples and states.

Our current dialogue is determined by the necessities of the contemporary world situation. But what matters to us is not just today and tomorrow. We have a long historical knowledge about conflicts: we are aware of what war means. By the same token, however, we know about the great feats which our peoples and nations can perform in the future, but to do this they need peace.

Since 1945 Europeans have succeeded in preserving peace in Europe longer than at any other previous time in this century. It is our common duty to contribute to ensuring that our peoples will not only be able to live in peace with each other for the remaining 18 years of this century, but that they will also establish the basis for peaceful cooperation in the next century. The next century must be based on the respect for each other and for the way of life we have chosen.

Mr General Secretary, I would like to raise my glass in a toast to your personal health, to the health of your delegation and of the Soviet leadership, to good relations between our two countries, and to peace in Europe and the world.

"During your state visit to the Federal Republic in 1978, we contributed together an important building block for such a security partnership when we noted in our joint declaration: 'Both sides deem it important that no one strive for military superiority. They proceed from the premise that approximate balance and parity are sufficient to guarantee defense. In their view, appropriate disarmament and arms limitation measures in the nuclear and conventional field, corresponding to this principle, would be of major importance.'

"Since then, new developments have occurred about which we are very uneasy. The increase since 1978 in Pioneer missiles, which we call SS-20's, to more than 250 -- these are mobile, have altogether more than 750 warheads and a high degree of accuracy -- directly affects our security interests and gives us cause for great concern.

"Since 1978, and repeatedly since then, I have been able to point out to you, Mr General Secretary, and other members of the Soviet leadership, the political consequences which would ensue if the Soviet Union did not desist from its medium-range arming which changes the balance of military forces in Europe and threatens us as well as other states in Europe. Since this unfortunately did not happen, the North Atlantic alliance reached a decision at the end of 1979 on modernizing its own medium-range potential, this response in arms policy was, however, linked in NATO's dual decision with an offer of negotiations.

"Through your readiness to begin talks next Monday in Geneva on nuclear medium-range weapons, the United States and the Soviet Union have likewise shown that dialogue and cooperation on vital issues of security are a top priority political goal as far as they are concerned. Both sides have thus also demonstrated their basic readiness for effective arms limitations.

"The Federal Government warmly welcomes this since it has helped to the best of its ability to bring about these negotiations.

"These negotiations should bring forth a result by autumn 1983, in other words, before the West can site land-based medium-range weapons -- for the first time since the early sixties.

"If an agreement cannot be reached despite all efforts, then my country will carry out its obligation emanating from the other part of the dual decision in the security interests of my country and in the joint interests of the alliance.

"I know that President Reagan is approaching the Geneva talks with an earnest will to achieve a reduction in the nuclear threat through arms limitation. This has once again been confirmed by the impressive speech which President Reagan gave last Wednesday. We share President Reagan's desire that both sides fully renounce medium-range missiles in Europe. Our talks should and can contribute toward giving positive impetus to the forthcoming talks.

"It is an encouraging sign for me in this respect that the U.S. Government is ready to continue talks on strategic weapons beginning in spring 1982 and you too, Mr General Secretary, have clearly made similar statements along these lines. Trust would also be strongly promoted by a successful conclusion to the CSCE follow-up conference in Madrid with the adoption of a concrete mandate for a European disarmament conference with confidence-building measures for all of Europe.

"We welcome very much the fact that dialogue between the Soviet Union and the United States had clearly increased again in content and intensity. It would be especially important if you, Mr General Secretary, would meet the President of the United States. A clear signal of hope and trust could emanate from such a meeting."

SCHMIDT OPTIMISTIC ON FAMILY REUNIFICATIONS

Schmidt reported that during the discussion, which had been conducted in a very friendly atmosphere, he had "once again explained with great emphasis our urgent interest in a zero solution, in the fact that no missiles should be installed either on our territory or on eastern territory directed against us." He believes that the discussion resulted in "both sides better understanding their anxieties. This is a great deal. If there is mutual understanding then this is the necessary prerequisite for drawing closer to each other."

Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt stressed that "The Soviet Union made it clear beyond any doubt that it is ready to reduce its medium-range missiles."

After Brezhnev's dinner speech, the chancellor expressed the view on German television that the Soviet Union is linking this to prerequisites and conditions which must be examined more closely. Schmidt, in turn, pointed out that it is not quite enough "to withdraw missiles, which can be fired 4,000 kilometers and further, to behind the Urals." They could still reach Cologne and Hamburg from there.

On the whole, it is clear however that the Soviet side, just like the U.S. side, wants to talk seriously in Geneva about the medium-range missiles. Schmidt is very confident that earnest negotiations will get underway in Geneva on 30 November. "Then the wheels really will be oiled, as we say in German."

CHANCELLOR RESERVED ON 'MORATORIUM' PROPOSAL

[Excerpt] Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is sticking to his reserved attitude toward the Soviet moratorium proposals, this was reaffirmed by Government Spokesman Kurt Becker in Bonn today. He said that Schmidt's fundamental attitude, which had already been made known after the first meeting of the German and Soviet delegations yesterday, has not changed following the speech by the Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev yesterday evening which contained further offers.

In a 90-minute news conference with Soviet spokesman Leonid Zamyatin, Becker made it clear that the chancellor obviously regards the Brezhnev speech as the existing Soviet concept for a moratorium in different form, regarding which there is still a question to be asked. Becker did not explain what this question is. He recalled that at the first talk between the delegations Schmidt had again rejected the original moratorium proposal. He said the Federal Government has always wanted the forthcoming Geneva negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union to lead to a reduction in medium-range missiles in Europe. This fundamental attitude of the Federal Government has not been changed by Brezhnev's dinner speech, in which he submitted his modified proposal.

Politicians React

[Text] Hamburg, 23 Nov (DPA) -- The offer by the Soviet party leader, Leonid Brezhnev, in Bonn that the Soviet Union withdraw a "certain number" of the nuclear medium-range missiles in the "European part of the USSR unilaterally" in view of the negotiations starting on Monday in Geneva between Moscow and Washington has been met by SPD and CDU politicians' initial reactions ranging from wait-and-see to rejection.

Horst Ehmke said for the SPD on Monday night on ZDF Television that although the proposal of an arms moratorium has now been combined with the offer of withdrawing the new Soviet SS-20 missiles from the European part of the Soviet Union, Brezhnev did not say where they are to be removed. This is "the actual problem for the Western side," for these missiles have sufficient range to reach Europe "even from East of the Urals." That is why this proposal cannot be assessed as yet. A real exchange of views can "only happen at the negotiating table."

For the opposition, the CDU disarmament expert, Alois Mertes, described the moratorium offered by Brezhnev as nothing new, a "sham offer" and "a sort of trap into which the Soviet Union wants to lure the West, especially the Americans."

Mertes like Ehmke, said that since it is not clear to where the weapons are to be removed the threat to Europe is not reduced in practical terms. The leader of the Kremlin did not answer the main thrust of the Reagan proposal "which wants a comprehensive zero solution to land-based medium-range missiles, that is to say, getting rid of a whole category of weapons. Seen in this light, the "bait in this trap has only grown a little bit bigger."

KOHL URGES SERIOUS ARMS NEGOTIATIONS

[Text] Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- The CDU chairman, Helmut Kohl, emphasized the willingness of the United States to disarm, in a talk with the Soviet state and party leader, Leonid Brezhnev. The spokesman of the opposition parliamentary party, Eduard Ackermann, said on Tuesday after the meeting in Gymnich Castle that Kohl had informed the Soviet guest on his latest visit to America. During this visit he gained the impression that the United States is very interested in serious disarmament negotiations. With goodwill on both sides, success must be possible. Kohl advised Brezhnev to take a step toward the Americans after the disarmament proposals of U.S. President Reagan. Already in Washington he had told Reagan that a meeting with Brezhnev in the foreseeable future would be useful.

Kohl emphasized during the talk, which lasted 40 minutes according to the CDU, that the Union is interested in good-neighborly relations with the Soviet Union. In the FRG, all people of goodwill support peace: but disarmament has to be verifiable and has to take place on both sides. Kohl further spoke to Brezhnev about Afghanistan, the division of Germany and family reunification. He stressed that steps toward peace in Afghanistan are also important for the European situation. The effects of the partitioning of Germany have to be made more bearable for those affected by it.

Brezhnev said, according to the CDU, that the Soviet Union has noted that the Union is prepared for cooperation on the basis of the Moscow treaty. Over and above this he made some critical comments on certain points where the Soviet stance differs from the CDU/CSU view.

In the view of the deputy chairman of the the CDU/CSU parliamentary party, Walter Leisler Kiep, good faith toward the Soviet Union is misplaced. The shock which resulted from the Soviet submarine running aground near the Swedish coast has not yet been overcome, Kiep said on Tuesday on Saarland Radio. All the same, one can assume that the Soviet Union does not want war but peace. He stressed the large area of agreement between the Federal Government and the opposition on the central question of the ostpolitik. "Perhaps there might be more optimism on Federal Chancellor Schmidt's part regarding the possibility of achieving a zero solution, but otherwise the line is the same," Keip said.

STRAUSS SEES NO RESULTS FROM BREZHNEV VISIT

[Text] Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- Following his talk with Leonid Brezhnev today, CSU Chairman Franz-Josef Strauss reaffirmed his opinion that no results, especially with regard to disarmament, are to be expected from Brezhnev's visit to Bonn.

After a talk lasting about 40 minutes at Gymnich Castle, in which Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko also took part, Strauss said that from the outset it was not to be expected that any harmony would result between Bonn and Moscow with regard to disarmament questions or confidence building measures. He said that the expectation that the Federal Government would break from the joint NATO line or that Brezhnev would assume Western ideas was "Courths-Mahler translated into a political context," which was an allusion to the light fiction of the writer Hedwig Courths-Mahler.

According to Strauss, during the talk Brezhnev repeated the accusations against the American arms strategists and also reproached the policy of the CDU/CSU. He (Strauss) stressed that today "only a criminal idiot" could regard a war as capable of being won and that no one in the West wants to achieve political aims by military means. He had also criticized the Soviet arms buildup with SS-20's and was also critical of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. Summing up, Strauss said that in general the talk had taken place in a "friendly way" and he did not regret having met Brezhnev.

TAXATION AGREEMENT WITH SOVIET UNION SIGNED

[Text] Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- An agreement between the Federal Republic and the USSR for avoiding double taxation, which was negotiated in October, was signed in Bonn today. The agreement, which is retroactive, taking effect from 1 January, 1980, was signed for the German side by Bernd von Staden, state secretary at the Foreign Ministry, and for the Soviet side by USSR Ambassador Vladimir Semenov.

The double taxation agreement between Bonn and Moscow is also intended to consolidate and strengthen economic relations between the two states, according to a statement issued by the Finance Ministry to mark the signing. In structure and content the agreement follows the pattern of the more than 50 other agreements which the Federal Government has concluded with Western states and East bloc states.

EUROPEAN SINAI PARTICIPATION WELCOMED

[Text] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Government has welcomed the readiness of Italy, France, Britain and the Netherlands to take part in a peacekeeping force in Sinai. A statement by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs released in Bonn today says that this readiness shows the "determination of the European Community to contribute to a comprehensive, just and lasting peace based on an agreed negotiated solution."

All parties concerned must cooperate in this negotiated solution, the statement says. It should also win the "consent of the international community." The Federal Government points out that it still regards the European Council's 14 June 1980 Venice Declaration, including all its parts, as its "perspective for a Middle East settlement."

BRANDT MEETS WITH FRENCH SOCIALIST PARTY CHIEF

[Text] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt in Bonn today discussed with the first secretary of the French Socialist Party, Lionel Jospin, the international situation, German-French relations and cooperation between both parties. Afterwards there were talks with Brandt's deputy, Hans-Juergen Wishnewski and SPD Manager Peter Glotz. According to the SPD, it was agreed that the exchanges between both parties on economic and social policy, European affairs and policy on international media should be intensified. Jospin, who had been invited by Brandt, was accompanied by his party's international secretary, Jacques Huntzinger.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH AGREEMENTS SIGNED WITH PRC

[Text] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- The German Reserach Association (DFG), has concluded two agreements on scientific cooperation in basic research with the Ministry of Education in Beijing and with the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences.

The DFG announced today that these two agreements will extend cooperation in basic research to all scientific disciplines. The Max Planck Society had already concluded an agreement in this field some time ago with the Academia Sinica, dealing mainly with the field of natural sciences.

The agreements concluded by the DFG provide among other things for the exchange and publication of information and scientific essays, the promotion of research projects and support for joint meetings of experts. A five-person Chinese delegation came to the Federal Republic for the signing of the agreement.

WEST EUROPEANS MUST INFLUENCE GENEVA TALKS

DW201509 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 20 Nov 81 p 3

[Erich Hauser article: "Reagan's Negotiation Offensive"]

[Excerpt] An audible sigh of relief by all governments of European NATO partners is the initial reaction to U.S. President Ronald Reagan's speech before the U.S. National Press Club. At last this U.S. Government has taken the offensive with a wideranging negotiation offer to the Soviet Union. The immediate critical and enraged commentary by the Soviet news agency TASS proves that the Moscow leadership fears for the propaganda success it has attained up to now, but it does not contain a rejection of the negotiations desired by Washington.

Three things are remarkable about the U.S. President's thoroughly prepared speech: He did not demand U.S. military superiority but proclaimed a balance and the reduction of mutual distrust as goals of all negotiations. Not arms limitation but arms reduction -- above all in the field of nuclear arms -- is to be negotiated. The negotiations are to cover the entire range of East-West military confrontation on various levels, from intercontinental strategic weapons to conventional armed forces in central Europe. So there will be no "grey zone" anymore.

Although the tenor of Reagan's speech suggested that it was clearly addressed to the European and world public, its contents also set signals for the Washington government apparatus. Therefore, it may be expected that Defense Secretary Weinberger and others will not talk to pieces what the President said in a speech which was publicized worldwide.

The positive echo of West European governments to Reagan's offer to Moscow to first talk about a "zero solution" for the medium-range nuclear missiles of both sides is politically understandable. NATO circles are much more sceptical because the starting position agreed to by the Western allies, to demand in exchange for the renunciation of the deployment of U.S. medium-range missiles and cruise missiles in West Europe the scrapping not only of the new Soviet SS-20 missiles but also of the older SS-4 and SS-5 missiles from the sixties, is unacceptable for Moscow. The Soviets consider part of these missiles as a necessary deterrent against China's nuclear arms.

Because of the West's maximum demands for future negotiations mentioned by Reagan utmost importance must be given to his statement that the United States will be prepared in the negotiations to "listen to and consider" all arguments of the other side. It will be up to the European alliance partners to tip the scales in the course of the Soviet-U.S. negotiations on nuclear arms systems and to clearly state their views on the real Soviet threat or exaggerated American demands.

In substantial portions of Reagan's speech there is proof that Washington has at last recognized the danger of a split of the Western alliance. The fears and trends expressed in the peace movement of West European countries undoubtedly have contributed toward intensifying the influence of European NATO partners on Washington. But this influence can be preserved only by advancing rational arguments and to influencing Moscow as well.

MAUROY CALLS FOR GREATER EUROPEAN ROLE IN WORLD

[Excerpt] Turin, 20 Nov (ANSA) -- An appeal for the right of individual nations to self-determination and a condemnation of bipolar world politics were among the strong opinions expressed by French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy in an exclusive interview published here.

The interview was published in Turin daily LA STAMPA on Thursday as Italian Prime Minister, Giovanni Spadolini, arrived in Paris for an official visit, where he held talks with Mauroy yesterday.

"France refuses a bipolar concept of the world," Mauroy said in the interview, adding that "by multiplying the decision-making centers, the necessary evaluations can develop themselves. Europe can rediscover its autonomy and the Third World can go on to a realistic independence." Reflecting the thinking behind his government's foreign policies, Mauroy also said that the right of populations to self-determination is the reason why France continues to "fight foreign interference in Africa, Latin America, Poland and Afghanistan."

On the subject of disarmament, the government chief confirmed France's loyalty to its allies, and firstly to the United States. He also admitted that "American dissuasion constitutes a fundamental contribution for the balance of power" in the world. The Paris government leader stressed however that "the most serious dangers, for our planet are underdevelopment and nuclear proliferation," and added that France has "resolutely announced its support for a simultaneous and negotiated limitation of arms."

Turning his attention to Italy, Mauroy said that "France desires to develop close relations with Italy and considers (that country) of inestimable value." Continuing on the bilateral theme, the French premier also maintained that "our two countries have numerous common interests in the Mediterranean," and listed those interests as existing "towards the future members of the European Economic Community (EEC) as well as toward the nations of southern Europe." Expressing his hope for "friendship" between France and Italy, Mauroy pointed out that Italo-French relations "have never ceased to develop and amplify in the political, economic and cultural sectors, with, among other things, a doubling of exchanges."

JOBERT: TRADE WITH PRC WILL ADOPT LOWER PROFILE

PM201625 [Editorial Report] Paris LE MONDE in French 17 November 1981 carries on page 7 a 200-word unattributed report on a Radio Luxembourg interview with Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert on the "Radio Luxembourg-LE MONDE Grand Jury" program of 15 November in which Jobert commented on the recent French-Chinese clash over the imprisonment of the Chinese fiance of a French diplomat during Jobert's visit to China:

"The Chinese were more clumsy than ill-intentioned. Let's give them the benefit of the doubt.... The matter can be settled since it seems to be an administrative measure.... I reacted appropriately. I was representing France in that country and when somebody is your guest you do not insult him."

Jobert then commented on the prospects for French-Chinese economic cooperation: "Compared with the rather crazy hopes of recent years, trade will now adopt a low profile."

The same edition of LE MONDE carries on page 8 a 500-word A.L. report on the same Radio Luxembourg interview with Jobert which states that he discusses his role in the present government, fiscal problems and trade with the Soviet Union. With regard to this last issue Jobert said he hopes "that we are going to start afresh on a good footing."

Questioned on American pressure over purchases of Soviet gas, Jobert replied: "Why should we not purchase gas from the Soviet Union on favorable terms?" Jobert reportedly concluded by saying that "France's face is more clearly seen and more distinct abroad than it was under the previous presidency."

SINAI FORCE TO BE COMPRISED OF TECHNICIANS

LD231808 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 23 Nov 81

[Excerpts] There will soon be French, English, Italian and Netherlands soldiers in the Middle East within the framework of the international peace force to be established in Sinai following the Israeli withdrawal and the return of that territory to Egypt. However, Paris is being very clear: There is no question of sending soldiers there to fight; it is even probably that only doctors, nurses, truck drivers and logistic equipment will be sent, with the United States in any case providing half of the manpower. The Arab countries are rather furious, even though France has reaffirmed that nothing will be done in the Middle East without the Palestinians of the PLO.

MITTERRAND ENVOY REAFFIRMS NAMIBIA SUPPORT

AB211219 Paris AFP in English 1140 GMT 21 Nov 81

[Excerpt] Dar es Salaam, 21 Nov (AFP) -- France is committed to an early independence for Namibia and hopes that Namibia would become independent next year, Guy Penne, French presidential advisor on Africa, told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE today.

Mr Penne, now on a tour of frontline states, said France supports the United Nations resolution 435 on Namibian independence and has already made this stand clear to African leaders. France is a member of the five-nation Western contact group on Namibia. Envoys from the group, which also includes the U.S., Britain, West Germany and Canada, recently toured 10 African countries in an attempt to revive Namibian independence talks.

Mr Penne arrived here yesterday with a message from President Francois Mitterrand for Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere. He declined to disclose the contents of the message. The advisor also met with acting Foreign Minister Ben Mkapa, Finance Minister Amir Jamal and other senior government officials, who reportedly expressed Tanzania's wish to initiate joint economic co-operation with France. Mr Penne said that France was keenly interested in strengthening mutually beneficial social, economic and political co-operation with Tanzania and other independent African countries.

LE MONDE SEES 'ORTHODOXY' IN DEFENSE DOCTRINE

[Laurent Zecchini report: "Defense: Continuity in Question"]

[Excerpts] The present opposition is taking pleasure in recalling that the left never joined in the nation's effort for its defense by voting for the credits allocated to it by the finance law each year. The RPR and Union for French Democracy [UDF] group spokesmen stressed that once again in the National Assembly on Friday 13 November. But in announcing that the Gaullists will not vote for the defense budget put forward by Mr Charles Hernu, a Socialist minister, could Mr Lancien (RPR, Paris) fail to see that by adopting the attitude which the PS and PCF took before 10 May his friends are placing themselves in a difficult position in view of their constant concern not to allow the French nuclear force created by General de Gaulle to decline?

This attitude may have been justified if the defense effort for 1982 was a marked reduction, but is it logical when the opposition is welcoming some degree of "continuity?"

Even if that continuity is not exempt from criticism in view of shortcomings in certain spheres? Moreover there is continuity in this respect too since at least since 1974 the Gaullists have always deplored the low level of military credits. By stating that the UDF will vote with the majority while regretting -- naturally enough -- some shortcomings, Mr Bigeard (UDF associate, Meurthe-et-Moselle) and Mr Daillet (UDF, Manche) seem to be showing greater logic.

Indeed the "doctrine" put forward by Mr Hernu reflects some orthodoxy which, moreover, could ultimately cause the minister some problems within his own party. In this sphere the "change" and "break" advocated by so many Socialist deputies is not very evident.

Of course by citing Jaures, the former Rhone deputy returned to Socialist legitimacy under which "the organization of national defense and the organization of peace go together," but, by adopting the doctrine expressed by General de Gaulle -- "Our country must have nuclear armaments because if it did not it would be forced to rely on another country for its security and consequently for its policy" -- the defense minister seemed primarily concerned to put himself forward as the defender of a certain idea of French defense which at present does not differ in the least from the one which hitherto prevailed.

"No security without a balance of forces: this is not a ne assertion," Mr Hernu admitted, "but it is still true." Replying to the alarm expressed by majority and opposition deputies at the "neutralist wave" in Europe, Mr Hernu stated: "People are demonstrating for peace. We are all pacifists, all the deputies and, I would add, all the soldiers. But balance and peace form one whole. It is clear that this disarmament process must be negotiated. We reject any unilateral approach which, under cover of badly expressed pacifism, would amount to disarming without an equivalent gesture from the other side."

Thus when, after stressing that as far as rearmament is concerned "it was the deployment of new Soviet means which sets the precedent in the sphere," Mr Hernu stated: "It is entirely consistent for our allies to have decided to strengthen their means, not having nuclear weapons (in the European area -- LE MONDE note), they opted for the only reasonable course open to them, namely the deployment of American weapons, the surface-launched Pershing II and cruise missiles." The UDF, logically enough, applauded.

France, Mr Hernu continued, as a member of the Atlantic alliance, intends to contribute to the common defense but it is still a country which is "alone with itself" when it comes to decisive choices. Similarly the approval of the opposition deputies was understandable when Mr Hernu, talking of the French deterrence doctrine, asserted: "That has nothing in common with the graduated response and extensive deterrence [dissuasion etendue] which form part of American doctrine, which is suited to that vast country's means but which I personally do not think is suited to ours.... Our nuclear force could not be considered an element for negotiation between the United States and the USSR."

Mr Hernu then explained in detail how the previous governments allowed a number of delays to develop in the implementation of the military programming law. Moreover the two important decisions announced by the defense minister -- the construction of a seventh missile-launching nuclear submarine, and the fact that the armed forces will be able to be equipped with the Hades tactical missiles, the successor to the Pluton weapon system -- did not prompt visible satisfaction from the deputies. It is true that the press had hinted at the likelihood of such decisions.

LE MATIN PONDERS REAGAN'S 'TACTICAL MANEUVER'

[Text] It is a considerable surprise: Not only is Ronald Reagan prepared, on certain conditions, to abandon the deployment of cruise and Pershing missiles in Europe -- which was expected Tuesday evening following leaks from his entourage -- but he is going as far as to propose broad negotiations with the Soviets relating not to a limitation but to a reduction of strategic armaments.

As always when there is a diplomatic coup de theatre, it is easier to explain it afterward than to predict it. But it is important not be deceived: Ronald Reagan has not become a pacifist overnight. Moreover nobody was asking him to do that. He has simply just moved forward a major pawn on the geopolitical chessboard and has placed his adversary in difficulty.

Indeed Reagan has awakened to the scale of the pacifist movement in Europe and more especially in the FRG; and that is why he had his speech relayed worldwide by the National Press Club. He has always taken this movement very seriously -- a movement which his Secretary of State Alexander Haig has mentioned on several occasion. Recognizing its scale and also regretting it: The American Government realized that with Brezhnev's visit to Bonn and the rather reassuring Soviet statements which preceded this visit, Moscow was going to appear as the champion of peace in face of a militarist America. Therefore his aim was to reverse European feeling on this point, and it is primarily the Europeans he wants to convince. At the same time he is placing the Soviets in a difficult position: if they want peace they must accept the principle of gradual demilitarization and seize his offer, which goes further than the moralist Carter hoped. Either the Kremlin agrees to negotiate on the bases indicated by Reagan, and the United States will able to reduce a military effort which it is having terrible difficulty in financing, while calming its relations with Europe, or the Russians refuse and the United States keeps up its momentum and uses all the funds it has allocated to defense.

Once the tactical maneuver has been accepted, Reagan's "gesture" must not be underestimated ; it is nonetheless a break in the doctrine. The head of the Executive Branch had not planned to have serious negotiations with the Kremlin until after he had set in motion the mechanism capable of bringing the United States back to nuclear parity with the USSR. The idea of parity at a lower level (which is suggested in the proposal contained in Reagan's letter to Brezhnev) is not even convincing: The American President had accustomed us to a strong and triumphalist image of his policy, and if he is abandoning it now then why not give him the credence granted to people capable of changing their opinions and hence endowed with intelligence?

PERTINI PROPOSES REDUCTION IN PRESIDENTIAL TERM

[Text] Rome, 20 Nov (ANSA) -- The Italian head of state, Sandro Pertini, launched a proposal to reduce the president's term of office from seven years to six years in a statement made Thursday in Florence where Pertini was present for ceremonies commemoration Luigi Einaudi, Italy's second president of the republic.

The Italian president said that, "the fundamental charter (the construction) must not be a taboo. The experience of these years might advise us to make some changes, to improve it".

The constitution of the republic, in effect since January 1, 1948, has been at the center of perennial debate on the prospects of reform.

The president of the republic, elected by Parliament, serves a seven-year term but, Pertini said in Florence, "this term could be reviewed, beginning with the current presidency."

The 85-year-old head of state, never at a loss for a quip, quickly added, "Write that. I don't want people to think that I want to reduce only the term of my successor".

Pertini also said that he agreed with those who have proposed making the president ineligible for reelection. Pertini himself was elected to the highest office in the land on July 8, 1978.

He also confirmed the tough words he delivered last month against suspected members of Italy's outlawed Propaganda 2 Masonic lodge, a statement which drew stinging criticism from the Christian Democrats and Socialists.

AVANTI INTERVIEWS PSI'S CRAXI ON DEFENSE

LD191725 Rome AVANTI in Italian 8-9 Nov 81 p 2

[Reprint of interview granted to Lotta Continua by PSI Secretary Craxi: "Balance of Forces is Guarantee of Peace" -- date and place of interview not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] Deputy Craxi, you did not take part in the Rome demonstration. But you took part in peace demonstrations in your youth, and Pietro Nenni, also on account of these, was awarded the Stalin prize by the Soviets. You are accustomed to arguing on the basis of specific facts. What idea did you form of the 300,000 demonstrators?

[Answer] It is precisely because I marched so much in my youth that I am now more cautious about taking part in demonstrations. We were marching, too, against nonexistent dangers, such as the return of Nazism in Germany, while in fact it was a matter at that time of the plan for a European military union disliked by the Soviet Union; a plan, incidentally, which would be regarded today as a revolutionary turning point.

Viewed from a historical perspective, the dove of peace of that time was the symbol of a sickeningly partisan propaganda, and the so-called "supporters of peace" were principally supporters of the USSR. Nenni returned the Stalin Peace Prize when the Russians entered Budapest in 1956. We had demonstrated in support of a "socialism" which showed its armor-plated face, oppressive toward the peoples' free aspirations.

I now observe with a critical eye and attempt to understand and to discriminate. The 300,000 were not 300,000. But that does not matter much. There have been impressive demonstrations throughout West Europe, as well as in Rome. The virtue which is extolled is noble. The feeling among most of those taking part is, I believe, sincere. The arguments employed are not always acceptable and the aims are not sufficiently clarified. Of course, there is a current which is manipulating these movements or is seeking to do so. This is to be deduced from so many facts which can be analyzed. I will refrain from delving into the purely polemical aspects. It has happened in the past that democrats have been mistaken for fascists and reforms despised in the name of a revolution which was not carried out, just as it happens that men of peace may be mistaken for warmongers.

This is deeply mistaken, and I am not prepared to agree with people who are clearly wrong with a view to deriving a temporary benefit. I have found how true it is in politics, as in life, that sooner or later your sins will find you out.

[Question] You maintain that there are no immediate dangers of war. And, unlike a very widespread opinion, you also believe that the proliferation of weapons is not as dramatic as it is portrayed. So how do you explain the "fear," which is nevertheless certainly shared in various ways by intellectuals, young people and much of the Catholic world, beginning with the pope himself?

[Answer] I have simply said the truth, and that is that a third world war is fortunately not imminent. This certainly does not mean that a danger of this terrible nature is banished from the history of our century or from the future of mankind.

This does not even mean witnessing with indifference the danger of a resumption of an uncontrolled race toward rearmament.

On the contrary, I believe that this trend must be reversed and that this danger must be curbed.

Too many resources in the world are earmarked for weapons when they could and should be earmarked for purposes which are more moral, more productive and better able to achieve change in the unequal relations which constitute the keynote and the predominant problem of the current world situation.

Only the path of negotiation and agreement -- primarily between the largest military systems -- can achieve an aim of this nature. The path of unilateral disarmament and of neutrality is not feasible for our country. Other values would be jeopardized.

On the "socialist day for peace," scheduled for 15 November, we will talk together about peace, security and Italy's independence.

I also believe that we must concern ourselves more and better -- precisely because we wish to consolidate peace -- with all situations where war is in progress, where there is shooting and killing and where men, women and children are dying every day through war, poverty and hunger amid considerable indifference on the part of this highly sensitive European public opinion and also indifference at least on the part of those who march in one direction.

It is necessary to defend peace, work for peace and organize peace in a stable and rational manner, without losing control over the fear which is always a bad adviser for anybody.

[Question] It is said that the communist party has a great organizational capacity. This explains the success of the march. Does it explain it completely? Are you prepared to make the PCI a gift of the 300,000 demonstrators? Do you not believe that the "fear" of, the aversion for what [Socialist philosopher] Norbeto Bobbio calls the balance of terror now exists also among the strata of the population which vote for your party?

[Answer] I am making no gifts to anybody. I assess things for what they are. In the creation of certain clearly unilateral excesses and deviations, there is certainly a factor that can be attributed to the communists; a revival of old style communism which is by no mean certain to find approval from the entire PCI. The aversion for the idea of any war has spread everywhere, throughout all strata of the population and certainly to all our voters and friends. But the balance of forces is the principal guarantee of peace, and it is only on the basis of a situation of balance that a policy of gradual disarmament can be started. It is from a position of military supremacy that the threats to peace can derive. History shows that nobody that has achieved a position of military supremacy has ever resisted for long the temptation to use it, at least on the political plane. The problem of the imbalance that has come about on the European theater is a real one. It is estimated that with regard to conventional forces, the balance in Europe between NATO and the Warsaw Pact is now 1 to 3.

[Question] Romanian President Ceausescu has declared himself in favor of the dismantling of the SS-20s. In your opinion is this a diplomatic move that will lead nowhere, or could it be interpreted as a rift which could open up in the Eastern bloc countries?

[Answer] Once again, Ceausescu has adopted a balanced stance and has made wise assertions. We are among the first to propose the so-called "zero option," which means abandoning the deployment of the Atlantic alliance's new series of missiles in exchange for the dismantling of the SS-20s.

This position must be backed by NATO in the negotiations beginning at the end of the month, which we hope will proceed expeditiously so as to achieve convincing and position results before 1983. Ceausescu has invited me to conduct an exchange of ideas with him on these very topics. I am about to leave for Bucharest, where I will have a series of talks that will, I believe, help me better to understand what is happening in the Eastern bloc too.

BERLINGUER LETTER TO DC ON INSTITUTIONAL REFORM

PM191125 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 7 Nov 81 pp 1, 20

[Text] Rome -- At its meeting on Thursday, the PCI Directorate discussed institutional topics in relation to deputy Piccoli's 29 October letter. It discussed no other initiatives, concerning which statements and press disclosures (such as the one attributed to the PSI) have been circulating, because no direct information was forthcoming.

Comrade Berlinguer replied to the DC secretary with a letter which we herewith summarize.

First, Berlinguer stresses that the prime causes of the combination of constructions, distortions and incongruities that now hinder the democratic system so seriously are political ones (pacts to ostracize or discriminate against the PCI, the way government is organized and leadership methods), which must be dealt with and eliminated. Moreover, the letter continues, we are not unaware of the further exacerbation of the critical situation in the institutional context.

This is one of the central problems of public life for which there is a pressing need to formulate reform plans and, above all, to be willing to coordinate them with definite objectives, in accordance with the standard of assessment of extending and regenerating the democratic political system.

Having pointed to the PCI's overall examination of the subject, the letter confirms that we do not make the possibility of a reform process on the institutional plane dependent on changes in the political framework and balance, though we consider these necessary. Indeed, we reject any tactical view of such profound issues, which demand ideas and objectives of a strategic nature. We therefore believe that it would be disastrous and a sign of political decline if a debate on the institutions were, or were to become, the culture medium for another tragic early dissolution of Parliament.

Moreover, the topics, objectives and method of a constructive examination must be freed from any intention to adapt to the convenience of a particular alignment the machinery for forming the public will and the rules of the game of the activity of the state and of the other bodies of the system. If the dialogue and the proposals reflect the aim of facilitating the perpetuation of a particular political leadership or government coalition, of hindering rather than facilitating the alternation in government responsibility of the various democratic political forces, without any exceptions, the motivation would be unacceptable.

The same would apply if the dialogue or the proposals aimed not to eliminate but to consolidate approaches and attitudes designed to exclude -- as is now widely happening -- the full involvement of all the democratic forces, without prejudices, in leadership posts in the representative institutions and the enduring practices of cronyism which reveal a fault in the conception of the state, undermining, moreover, professional standards and causing an outright evasion of responsibility in crucial fields.

The PCI notes that the DC has made no reference to modifications in the means of expression of the people's will, such as the electoral laws, or in the instruments for ascertaining the relationship of confidence between government and Parliament. For the sake of clarity, however, we reassert our complete opposition to any hypothesis of abolishing secret ballots on legislative acts. The PCI also emphasizes that there is an acknowledged need for a reform initiative to be expressed and to take shape in parliamentary forums. It points out, however, that many problems could already have been resolved, since plans concerning very important topics have been before Parliament, mostly since the start of the legislative period.

None of these plans, Berlinguer's letter points out next, even if embodied in government bills, has been submitted to the vote of either house. It cannot be said that this is due principally to the difficulty of scheduling Parliament's work and to the recurrent filibustering. Of course these difficulties do exist. We have worked intensively with specific suggestions for the reform of parliamentary regulations to overcome them and more generally to make the representative assemblies more efficient. In the immediate term we are totally committed to supporting the changes drawn up by the lower house regulations committee, while we are actively involved in the similar activity of the Senate committee. But the reasons for the widespread atmosphere of mistrust in the country lie principally in the conduct of governments and majorities, which have established -- and often publicly advocated -- practices contrary to the rules of impartiality and proper functioning of the public administration, and to a correct distinction between the respective functions of the parties and of the state bodies. The failure to repudiate those practices or to turn down a new path has been and still is the main obstacle to proper measures of reform.

It is therefore indispensable, the letter continues, to stress once again the prime importance of the "morality issue," regarded in terms of the objective need for the reform and regeneration of the organization and procedures of the various posts and functions, in accordance with definite values and permanent rules, which must not fail to be adopted in the political parties' activities too. Our emphatic appeal in this regard cannot be attenuated in the proposed dialogue. This does not mean that the Communist Party is indifferent to the fact that the deterioration of a general situation of crisis is forcing other political forces to wonder about the reasons for institutional malfunctionings, the decline of the administration, the failure to use many of the government's economic tools and public unease. This could be the starting point for a debate that is not governed by ulterior motives, as long as it leads to the examination of reform proposals in the proper institutional forum, namely Parliament, without preclusions of method or substance, and as long as unequivocal signs are given of wanting to restore and guarantee the minimum conditions essential for public morality.

The letter deals fully and in a reasoned manner with the merits of the DC's proposals and of the ones which the PCI considers most important and pressing (particularly on subjects such as Parliament, the government's structure and functions, administrative justice, the reorganization of local government and finance, the law on secret associations, the abolition of the examining magistrate except in cases of offenses against the constitution and high treason, regulations concerning incompatibility and appointment procedures and the broad subject of common law). In conclusion, the PCI believes that the following guidelines should be followed:

1 -- A start to resolving the acute and serious problems which demand a reform of public life;

2 -- Special attention, partly in relation to economic matters, to the subject of relations between government and Parliament, central and local powers, the decisionmaking functions of the elective assemblies and the executive power, the coordination of public decisionmaking with the results of trade union negotiations;

3 -- Tackling the problems of common and administrative law with the aim of imparting stability and expansive force, within a framework of greater certainties, to the logic of regeneration already reflected in the reforms hitherto implemented and in the ones at an advanced stage of formulation. It is of course possible to establish priorities within the context of such guidelines.

The letter concludes as follows:

We, therefore, confirm the Communist Party's commitment to fight for the necessary innovations, to eliminate the negative factors hindering the realization of all the democratic potentials defined and envisaged by the republic's constitution. Therefore, now as in the past, we have no difficulty in comparing our positions with other people's. But with regard to procedures, we believe that the ones apparently being suggested to us by the DC would be very unproductive. The method of bilateral meetings between parties and subsequent collegial meetings on all the issues and on individual aspects risks becoming overly complicated, exhausting and inconclusive. We definitely opt for Parliament as the most suitable, and for that matter inevitable, forum for dialogue and decisionmaking. Of course, this does not mean that we are unwilling to meet with the DC for any further necessary elucidation.

JORGENSEN DECLINES PACT WITH PEOPLE'S PARTY

[Text] Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen forcefully dismissed the proposal of cooperation between the Social Democratic Party and the Socialist People's Party [SF], which SF Chairman Gert Petersen has been making in the last few days. In particular the significant increase in support for the SF in the local elections on Tuesday [17 November] made the SF chairman emphasize that the party will support Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen as prime minister after the 8 December Folketing election and that in return the party expects to cooperate with the Social Democrats to prevent the nonsocialist parties forming a government.

"It cannot be useful to believe that it is possible to solve the country's problems with a clear right of center or left of center program," Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen said. "Negotiations will be necessary. It is possible that the Social Democrats, the SF and the Radical Liberals could agree on something, but we must also bear in mind that cooperation with the parties of the center is also necessary. All the talk of cooperation with the SF is undermined by the consideration that together we do not have a clear majority. Nor would we be able to induce the SF to do things which would be necessary but unpopular."

Gert Petersen expressed his fear that, if they do not begin to cooperate with a strengthened SF after the election, the Social Democrats will "implement the Conservative-Liberal plan [proposed plan of expenditure cuts] after a year's delay." Poul Schlueter, chairman of the Conservative People's Party, warned the prime minister against forceful statements during the election campaign and pointed out that cooperation among all the Folketing parties would be necessary after the Folketing election.

COUNCIL OF NORDIC MINISTERS APPROVES SATELLITE

[Text] [Announcer] The Nordic governments have decided to support the joint NORDSAT radio and television satellite project. The decision to approve the project was made at a meeting of the Nordic Council of Ministers in Copenhagen. Here is our reporter, Juhani Lompolo:

[Lompolo] The threshold has been crossed and a step taken toward the launching of a Nordic radio and television satellite into space. With these words Education Minister Par Stenback today described the decision made by the Nordic Council of Ministers on the further development of NORDSAT. A formal decision on the matter will be made at the meeting of the Nordic Council next spring.

The Council of Ministers, which met under the chairmanship of Stenback, notes in its decisive statement, as it is described, that it has approved the proposal according to which the Nordic governments expressed their desire to start cooperation which will make it possible gradually to build in the north a system of radio and television satellites for direct transmissions. In simple terms this means that the Nordic governments have now finally reached agreement to the effect that NORDSAT is desired and that its construction will start gradually.

[Announcer] The Danish Government has not yet made a decision because the country has a caretaker government. In the Finnish Government last week the Finnish People's Democratic League ministers expressed a dissenting view on the decision, which announced that Finland viewed the project favorably in principle.

According to present information, the first Nordic television satellite may be launched as soon as the middle of the decade.

PM231617 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 19 Nov 81 p 3

[Excerpt] The acting president, Prime Minister Majno Henrik Koivisto, 57, was yesterday unanimously nominated by the party's congress as the Social Democratic Party's presidential candidate without any dissenting voices. The party congress also resolved that Koivisto's electors would support the "appointed candidate" at all phases of the presidential election. Thus this means that there are no plans at all to replace Koivisto with party chief Kalevi Sorsa just before the final round of voting.

INTEREST IN LASER RADAR GROWS AFTER SUB AFFAIR

PM201525 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 17 Nov 81 pp 1, 17

The electromagnetic radiation best at passing through water is visible green light. For this reason the Armed Forces Research Institute at Linkping has for the past few years been researching under the direction of Dr Ove Steinvall into radar using green laser light. Ove Steinvall was unwilling to comment on the extent to which the technique has been used for submarine surveillance: "We have carried out tests in closely related areas, but I cannot give any details," he said.

In tests from helicopters researchers have succeeded in recording laser radar echoes from the seabed at depths of 20 to 30 meters. "This is probably the depth which can be reached in the Baltic. In seas with clearer waters it ought to be possible to go down to 100 meters," Ove Steinvall said. The problem with laser radar is that of developing electronic equipment capable of analyzing the reflected signal. This equipment must be able to distinguish between the extremely powerful echo produced when the laser beam hits the water's surface and the extremely weak echo from possible underwater objects. The difference in intensity between these two reflections is in the order of 100,000 to 1. "We think that we have succedded in pulling this off," Ove Steinvall said.

[Text] Speaking prior to his departure for Bulgaria, President Kiprianou referred to his visits to Bulgaria and Hungary, lauding the policy of both countries on the Cyprus issue. He said he will discuss matters of joint interests with the presidents of the two countries. He will brief them on the current phase of the Cyprus issue and will exchange views with them on more support for the struggle of the people of Cyprus. President Kiprianou also mentioned that the Cyprus issue will be one of the issues to be discussed in Paris with French President Mitterrand, with whom he will also discuss the question of the accession of Cyprus to the EEC.

In reference to his U.S. visit, Kiprianou said he will once again discuss the Cyprus issue with the UN secretary general and the chairman of the UN General Assembly. With the chairman of the UN General Assembly in particular, Kiprianou said, he will also examine the possibility of a debate on the Cyprus issue at the General Assembly after its regular session.

This, he added, has already been guaranteed. It would be wise, he said, to have a new debate on the issue. Such a possibility is also envisaged in case of a failure of the intercommunal dialogue. I do not wish to forecast a failure of the dialogue with what I say, he added, but I simply want us to be prepared for any eventuality.

He also said that during his meeting with President Reagan he will have the opportunity to exchange views on matters of joint interest and to brief the President on the views of the Cypriot Government. President Kiprianou also expressed the belief that his visits and meetings will be extremely useful to the cause of Cyprus. He added that during his return to Cyprus he will stop over in Athens in order to have consultations with Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, with whom he will exchange views within the framework of the close and harmonious cooperation which exists between the two governments.

NORTH'S CAGATAY GOES TO TURKEY 21 NOV

In a statement at Ercan state airport before his departure, Cagatay said that they are going to Ankara to hold talks with Turkish Government officials on economic, social and political issues. Noting that recent political developments and the current state of the intercommunal talks are to be assessed in talks to be held with officials in Ankara and that the joint stand adopted will be reviewed, Cagatay added: At a time when we are preparing the 1982 budget, we will discuss especially our investment projects and the economic stability program. I belive that as has been the case in past years it will be possible to secure from Turkey the necessary financing for the projects foreseen in our budget, that we will be shown the necessary understanding and that we will return to Cyprus with positive results. Cagatay also said that he will be happy to extend the gratitude of the Turkish Cypriot community to the Turkish officials.

Cagatay, who is going on an official visit to Ankara as the guest of Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, is accompanied by Interior Foreign and Defence Minister Kenan Atakol, the minister of economy and finance, the ministry undersecretary, the undersecretaries of the Energy Ministry and the State Planning Organization, the prime ministry secretary and the officials in charge of the prime ministry financial affairs and the press and public relations departments. Talks Begin

[Text] Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay has said that in the event Greek Prime Minister Papandreou succeeds in implementing his statements, an armed conflict may occur. Cagatay, who is on an official visit to Ankara, began his contacts today. Official talks between Turkish and Turkish Cypriot delegations also began today.

Cagatay called separately this morning on Zeyyat Baykara, the state minister, deputy prime minister and chairman of the Cyprus Coordination Council, and Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu.

In a statement to the ANKA news agency, Cagatay said the economic stability program of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus [TFSC] as well as the issue of the Turkish Cypriot Government were discussed during his talks with Baykara and Ulusu.

In reply to a question on Papandreou's statements on his government's Cyprus policies, Cagatay said: We, the Turkish Cypriot community, want to preserve our hope and belief that the Greek Cypriot community will not undertake a negative and provocative move in this period after Papandreou has read his government program and has begun implementing it. If such a move occurs, much unrest and dangerous developments may take place. These developments would be dangerous not only for our area but for the world in general. If Papandreou succeeds in implementing his declarations, there might be an armed conflict. Cagatay and the delegation accompanying him will return to Cyprus on Wednesday, 25 November.

GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON SINAI PEACE FORCE

NC232108 Athens Armed Forces in Greek 1900 GMT 23 Nov 81

[Greek Government statement 23 November]

[Text] The Greek Government made it clear from the very first moment to its EEC associates that although it was prepared to assist any effort for the solution of the Middle East problem onthe basis of the well-known principles which it has repeatedly declared -- that is, the need for the Palestinian people to establish their own state and the need for peaceful and secure life for all states in the region -- it was not prepared to accept any correlation with the procedures envisaged by the Camp David agreements, which it has never recognized can secure the solution of the problems in the region. Because of this Greek position, which was finally accepted, the decision adopted by the four Western powers to send troops for the Sinai peace force does not fall within the Camp David agreements. The participation of the four Western powers in the Sinai peace force coincides with these agreements solely on one point -- the withdrawal of the Israeli troops from Sinai. All the EEC member states makes it clear -- just as the Greek Government wishes -- that the European Community favors [words indistinct] the peaceful solution of the Middle East problem based on the principles of existence and security for all the states of the region and the need for the Palestinian people to fully exercise their right to self-determination and the establishment of a Palestinian state.

FOREIGN MINISTRY STATEMENT ON ARMENIAN MILITANT

The ministry announcement was made in response to a news agency report (?that) Gokberk Ergenekon, a Turkish diplomat stationed in Rome, who was shot at and wounded several weeks ago by an Armenian terrorist, had failed to identify an Armenian held in [word indistinct] in Paris as the one who tried to kill him. The agency AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE was quoting Armenian sources as the base of its report. But the Turkish Foreign Ministry said the face-to-face meeting in Paris between Ergenekon and the Armenian militant proved to be well-worthy and gave the French investigators some clue about their next steps.

The Armenian militant was arrested at the Orly airport in Paris 10 days ago on charges of using a false passport. He had in his possession a Beirut-Milan-[word indistinct]-Beirut airline ticket and had a fresh gun shot wound in his left upper arm. Mr Ergenekon [words indistinct] would-be assassin and had later reported to have wounded him at his left upper-arm.

ANATOLIA REVIEWS PRESS ON RECENT EVENTS

[Text] Ankara, 20 Nov -- Friday's papers deal with various topics, with TERCUMAN columnist Mukbil Ozyoruk bitterly criticizing France for having "voiced support in an unprecedented way for Armenian terrorist attacks on Turkish diplomats," saying "it was inevitable that the same terrorism would become eventually a trouble for France herself. ASALA itself has become a plague for Mitterrand." Ozyoruk goes on to say: "There is only one way for France to stop these attacks; releasing Armenian detainees by French court orders. But is this so easy? Let them release those terrorists if they would like to. But they cannot possibly do it.

"The man in the street would immediately reject a French Government which bows down to blackmail. From now on, they (the French) should try to liberate victims of raiders (referring to the recent occupation by Armenian militants of Turkey's Consulate in Paris) rather than the raiders themselves. Let us now see the real power of Mitterrand."

Ugur Mumcu of CUMHURIYET stresses the difficulty of drafting a constitution, adding that in order to overcome the difficulties inherent in this job, the public opinion should be "fully opened up" to discussions about the future constitution and conflicting views should be permitted to surface in a climate of maximum tolerance. The public good would benefit from discussions and arguments on the future constitution since any mistake in the elaboration of the new constitution would cause sufferings for the whole nation. All sections of the community should be included with no discriminations against "left or right of this or that ideology" in the forum of constitutional discussions and arguments, he says.

Mehmed Barlas of MILLIYET says almost all members of the Consultative Assembly (which forms the Constituent Assembly together with the National Security Council) here functioning in a way that shows they are aware that they are working on behalf of the Turkish nation, adding: "So, after all, General Evren has been right and no one should have doubted that this nation would manage to breed new political cadres and assets. The powers of the Consultative Assembly are limited and its supervisory functions are not very comprehensive, at least on paper, but past events have shown us that soldier or civilian, all Turks are open to the aid and supervision of hardworking and constructive cadres who know how to shoulder responsibilities. In case the members of the Consultative Assembly share the current responsibilities and voice their own free will and convictions in a constructive way rather than evading these responsibilities, both wings of the Constituent Assembly will have equal powers. Short-and long-term interests of Turkey require this." Referring to the adoption of the internal regulations of the Consultative Assembly article under which death penalties will have to be approved by the assembly in order to be enforced, Barlas hails this development, saying: "It was all of us who brought Turkey to Sep 12. We will enable a return to democracy altogether too."

Teoman Erel (MILLIYET) says comments and criticism voiced by members of the Consultative Assembly enlivened the debates adding that the initial message was one of success with members with strong personalities making various remarks and the papers reflecting the discussions properly. Referring to a recent visit by Federal German foreign minister to Turkey, Erel quotes Genscher as saying he understood a timetable for a return to democracy in Turkey would be received soon, with the Turkish foreign minister making a parallel statement in Strasbourg. Domestic and external developments "came together in a certain channel and in case there are no blocks, waters will flow towards democracy and improved relations between Turkey and Europe," Erel says, adding that while making important decisions, one should think "what should we do" rather than "what will they say?"

Abdullah Uraz of SON HAVADIS says the recent ban on brokerage firms would not deter them from selling negotiable bank certificates of deposits since there is a demand for these in the market. An anonymous article in the same paper praises the recent decisions to allow civil servants to retire after 20 years of service saying this would ease the glutted establishment. But filling these newly-created vacancies by employing youths to diminish unemployment should be evaded, he warns.

Big banners on the first page of SON HAVADIS announce "the protector of the Armenian militant turns out to be the French interior minister," and "Turkes (leader of the now defunct Nationalist Action Party under trial facing a death penalty) says the smuggled arms were coming from Bulgaria."

HURRIYET criticizes the visiting Iranian health minister for distributing leaflets in Ankara gravely insulting a former Turkish president, Cevdet Sunay.

TERCUMAN ON INDEPENDENCE OF TURKISH REPUBLIC

NC241134 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 19 Nov 81 pp 1, 14

[Editorial by Nazli Ilicak: "Independence"]

[Excerpts] Rejecting every form of mandatory rule and every protective system, we have established the independent Turkish Republic. Independence does not necessarily mean rejecting all forms of economic, military and political alliances and plunging into a fearful loneliness. There are those who try to sever us from the West under the slogan of independence, as well as those who seek to picture our relations with the United States, IMF and NATO as proof of dependence. In veiw of the fact that the Marxist ideology lies at the foundations of these arguments, it is quite natural that the capitalist system should be shown as the main reason for our dependence. It is persistently argued that Turkey's debts to the West, IMF's "dictatorship!" over Turkey and the military bases are all the outcome of the present political system, and it is strongly suggested that we can achieve our true independence under a socialist system.

It is not only those who live behind the Iron Curtain who wish to rid themselves of Soviet domination. The Afghan people are trying to overthrow the Babrak Karmal administration, Kampuchea is waging a hopeless struggle against the occupation forces of Vietnam. The 300,000 Kampucheans living in Thailand and the 2 million Afghanis who have taken refuge in Pakistan are the exhausted human beings of this dark tableau.

When we look at the issue from an economic angle, it is very difficult to consider the political regime of the communist countries as an assurance of independence. Countries behind the Iron Curtain owe the West $70 billion. Poland alone owes the West $20 billion. Both Yugoslavia and Romania are members of IMF. The Soviet Union has opened its oil strata in Siberia to U.S. technology. Again, it is the same country which has purchased 25 million tons of cereals from the United States.

Naturally, economically strong countries can behave more independently compared with other countries. But linking independence with political regimes and economic preferences leads us to unrealistic evaluations. What is independence? Is Federal Germany, which accommodates 200,000 U.S. soldiers on its territory, independent? Is Finland, which has to choose a president who will be acceptable to the Soviet Union, independent? Or is the United States, which has to convince Begin to cooperate in pacifying the Jewish Lobby in the Congress in connection with the sale of the AWACS to Saudi Arabia, any more independent?

Turkey's independence as a state does not prevent it from taking part in this great net of interests. The intention of those who are after absolute independence in a country, which has won its liberty, is different. We can sum up this intention in two attention from the struggle of the Polish and Afghani peoples for a true independence, or at least to give the impression that we are sharing the same fate with these enslaved countries, so as to play down the seriousness of the situation.

Today, our relations with the West are strained. The suspension of democracy is an important reason for this tension. Those who see us as members of their free world come to Ankara with certain recommendations. Resolutions are adopted in the European forums against us. Such events should not be considered matters of national pride. Nor must they be deemed as interferences, damaging our independence. We must evaluate with contemporary minds their persistent demand that we comply with the conditions of the civilized world; what is valid today is not absolute independence but mutual dependence. If we feel embarrassed from suggestions which are of an advisory nature and alter our attitude toward the West, we shall be doing exactly what the exploiters of "absolute independence" want us to do.

NETHERLANDS

REACTION TO U.S. DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS MIXED

PM241431 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 20 Nov 81 p 5

[Text] Amsterdam -- In general the three government parties in the Second Chamber, the Christian Democratic Appeal, the Labor Party [PVDA] and Democrats '66 [D'66], have reacted positively to U.S. President Reagan's speech. The three are satisfied with Reagan's wish not to deploy the 572 new nuclear weapons in Western Europe, the so-called zero option. On the other hand, the peace movements have described Reagan's proposal as a "pseudo-offer" and "propaganda."

However, the PVDA noted that NATO support for the zero option must not simply be dependent on the Russians' dismantling all their systems. D'66 indicated that Reagan had not taken the French and British nuclear weapons into consideration and spoke of an "opening offer." The opposition People's Party for Freedom and Democracy considers that the Russians must abandon all their nuclear weapons targeted on Western Europe in exchange for the cancellation of the 572 new NATO weapons.

Bishop H. Ernst of Breda said on KRO-TV yesterday that Reagan's proposal shows the power of the peace movement. "He will not succeed," the bishop said. The bishop of Breda also stated that he supported all the demands of Saturday's demonstration.

Foreign Minister Backs Move

[Excerpt] The Hague -- In a guest lecture at Leiden University yesterday, Foreign Minister van der Stoel gave his support to the U.S. opening position for the coming arms limitation talks with the Soviet Union in Geneva. The Soviet Union will have to be prepared to abandon its medium-range nuclear missiles in exchange for a zero option on the part of NATO, the minister said.

In the original text of his lecture which had been distributed in advance, Van der Stoel had spoken of the call to the Russians to dismantle "a large number of nuclear weapons." After the minister had been informed by the Americans in Brussels on Tuesday of the emphasis Washington is giving now to the so-called zero option, the passage was changed to "should abandon its missiles." The original phrase, "The exact number and type of missiles will be determined in the negotiations," was changed to, "How this will be achieved in practice will be determined in the negotiations."

Van der Stoel made it clear that he thought that 2 years ago NATO should have given priority to arms limitation approaches in place of the parallel approaches of modernization [572 new nuclear weapons) and arms limitation. The international realities have changed, and this is important. However, we have to admit that the 1979 dual decision is a fact. But it is extremely important for us that the arms limitation negotiations that will start in Geneva shortly should be anchored firmly in the decision," Van der Stoel said.

Although Van der Stoel did not say a word about the major antinuclear demonstration on Saturday, the tone of his address was a response to the position of the peace movement.

ZERO OPTION HOLDS NATO NEGOTIATING POTENTIAL

For the person who thinks that no negotiations at all on the so-called Eurostrategic nuclear arms are necessary, such questions -- aggravated by the modernization decision -- are superfluous. The decision not to deploy the NATO arms does not need to be taken in Geneva: it can be made just as well in the councils of NATO. For those who think so, the zero option is at most a decision delaying the deployment of the arms. The question is whether the endeavors to bring about a reduction in the number of nuclear arms in Europe would be served by the zero option. In the final analysis it is not only a question of halting the NATO modernization project; it is also a question of freeing Western Europe from the dangers of the SS-20's. Negotiations to this end are vital.

The December 1979 NATO decision was unsound because it was unjustifiable on the basis of the actual Eurostrategic balance. But under strong public and political pressure it has now led to a situation in which the continuing nuclear rearmament in East and West could be reversed. There are now to be negotiations, and the world is watching these more expectantly than ever before. If under such circumstances Reagan is opting for the zero option merely to pacify his West European audience or to forestall further blows from the peace movement, he is running the very serious risk of losing all of his fairly small stock of credibility. Of course his declaration in part had a propaganda objective, but in the light of the Geneva negotiations it also contains some positive points.

First, the choice of the zero option seems to indicate that Washington is prepared to break out of the iron cage of the NATO "flexible response" doctrine. This doctrine means NATO will be able to answer any sort of Russian aggression with suitable military measures. It is precisely this doctrine which bears the major share of the responsibility for the permanent modernization process affecting NATO armaments. If Reagan were now prepared to review this doctrine, an important condition for controlling the arms race would be satisfied.

Reagan's zero option indicates that there is flexibility in the U.S. negotiating strategy.

SCHMIDT CONVINCED USSR INTENT ON ARMS REDUCTIONS

[Text] Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has been convinced by his talks with the Soviet state and party leader, Leonid Brezhnev, that the Soviet Union envisages "a step-by-step solution" at the disarmament negotiations with the United States, which is also supported by the FRG. According to the spokesman of the SPD parliamentary group, Knut Terjung, Schmidt also reported to the parliamentary group that it had further become clear that the Soviet side recognizes the necessity of compromising. There is no doubt of the serious intention of Moscow "to achieve substantial reductions in the medium-range field."

The chancellor assessed the talks with Brezhnev as "pleasant in atmosphere, but complicated in substance." But he could say already: "I am fully satisfied with the talks." This was also true of what was discussed behind closed doors.

In Schmidt's words, the talks with Brezhnev were held on the basis of mutual trust in the continuity of policies and personal integrity. At the same time, obvious confidence in the joint willingness for a partnership in security had become noticeable. "The other side is also concerned about the stability of peace," Schmidt said.

Schmidt again emphasized that the Germans had to play a "very important role as interpreter" in negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union. He had the impression that the Soviet leadership could not quite gauge as yet the intentions of the American Government. Through the reporting of the media, the misunderstanding had arisen that those things would be discussed at the Bonn talks which were the task of next week's American-Soviet talks in Geneva. Such negotiations between Bonn and Moscow were unthinkable," Schmidt said, but it is clear that also during the negotiations in Geneva "bilateral talks had to continue."

The German delegation had tried to set aside doubts, but it had not been able, and had not wanted, to remove some concerns of the Soviet side. The concerns of Moscow correspond in turn to the concerns of Bonn of a growing missile potential which is aimed at West Europe. The German side had made no secret of the fact that the political fate of the social-liberal government coalition was tied in with the NATO dual decision of 1979. The Soviet Union had felt Bonn's willingness for peace.

Concerning his private talk with Brezhnev, the chancellor reports that he told the Soviet party head that he had "never misled" Brezhnev in the meetings of the last 8 years. Brezhnev had interrupted him with the remark: "That is true."

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON U.S.-SOVIET POSITIONS

[Text] Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- FDP Chairman and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher is convinced that the East and West are interested in serious negotiations to reduce medium-range missiles in Europe. He told the FDP Bundestag group today that, in intensive talks with President Ronald Reagan American leadership wants peace and disarmament as much as its European allies.

He has no doubts that the Soviet side is also interested in serious negotiations and wants, by cooperation with the United States, to contribute to stability in the world and in Europe. He urged his Soviet partners to take seriously the proposals for limiting medium-range missiles put forward by Reagan in his speech last week, and to react to them positively.

Together with Wolfgang Mischnick, chairman of the FDP Bundestag group, Genscher this morning had a 30-minute talk with Brezhnev at Gymnich Castle. Genscher told the FDP Bundestag group that efforts to achieve detente and arms control, partnership in security matters and economic and political cooperation should, in a patient and sustained manner, create the conditions for a European peace system.

The Federal Government largely contributes to the holding of German-Soviet negotiations on medium-range missiles and has a major influence on the formulation of Western negotiating positions. This is also the case while the negotiations are in progress. The Federal Republic, he said, should use the continued dialogue with the Soviet Union and the other Warsaw Pact states to make a contribution to constructive and businesslike negotiations. "We will keep talking to the Soviet Union on this vital issue while the negotiations proceed."

BRANDT DETECTS SLIGHT CHANGE IN USSR POSITION

DW251059 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1900 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Text] [Question] Do you think there is any concrete chance at all that the Soviets will withdraw their medium-range missiles far enough behind the Ural Mountains so that they will no longer threaten West Europe?

[Answer] Something like this always depends on the position from which a person, or a great power, proceeds. With respect to the Soviet starting position, something has moved indeed. There is no question about this, and Brezhnev himself told me that he thinks they have already given themselves a nudge. However, this is not yet viewed that way everywhere. I do believe that anyone who has carefully listened to what has been said here will find that this is not a bad opening for the negotiations with the Americans. But nobody expects either side to lay its cards on the table now.

CDU OFFICIALS COMMENT ON SECURITY POLICY

[Excerpts] Bonn, 23 Nov (DPA) -- Deputy CDU Chairman Kurt Biedenkopf has expressed his support for the decisions on security policy adopted by the recent Hamburg CDU congress. Addressing a meeting of the CDU Executive on issues of security policy, Biedenkopf stressed today in Bonn that he stands by the NATO dual decision which is aimed at reestablishing a balance of forces between East and West. Biedenkopf likewise supports NATO's nuclear strategy.

Just before the Hamburg CDU congress Biedenkopf had expressed the view in a newspaper article that the nuclear deterrent strategy is unsuited in the long term for safeguarding peace, since it is based on the concept of the annihilation of man.

Defense expert Manfred Woerner gave an introductory report on the security policy of the West and the CDU, and tried to refute Biedenkopf's original article. The nuclear threshold situation described by Biedenkopf cannot be lifted since knowledge of the nuclear weapon cannot be erased. It is the task of politics to achieve arms limitation at the lowest possible level. The two CDU security and foreign policy committees will now deal with this problem.

Party Chairman Helmut Kohl expressed the view that security policy will continue to play a role in public discussion in the Federal Republic. As far as the CDU is concerned, the decisions of the Ludwigshafen program and the recent Hamburg congress remain applicable. With a view to Brezhnev's visit, Kohl stressed that the CDU supports the concrete proposals by U.S. President Reagan for the forthcoming talks on arms control and disarmament with the Soviet Union. The balance of forces between West and East at the lowest possible level remain the basis of the security policy intended to guarantee peace and freedom.

PRESS CONTINUES TO DEBATE NATO NUCLEAR STRATEGY

'Confusion in Strategic Thought'

DW161433 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 14 Nov 81 p 4

[Dieter Schroeder article: "Reagan Scares Europe"]

[Text] It is hard to say what effect Ronald Reagan's strategic assumptions have on the Soviets, but they certainly scare the Europeans. This certainly is not the President's intention. That is no reason, however, to be reassured. The question is whether Reagan assesses events in Europe correctly, whether he is in a position to judge and correct the "confusion" in the strategic thought of his most important secretaries, Haig and Weinberger, and whether he understands enough of foreign policy to restore the leadership of the Western alliance which had slipped from Carter's uncertain hands.

The answer is not very encouraging. Thus far the Reagan government has not brought about a foreign-political concept. By reducing its thought to the concept of military strength as a prerequisite for every foreign policy the government not only has discredited itself with many Europeans but has also forgone an advantage in dealing with the Soviet Union. It has left it to Brezhnev to pose as peace apostle and exposed itself to the suspicion that nothing is more important for it than the question of what circumstances require the use of nuclear arms.

The Americans will object and say that it is rather the Europeans which are the troublemakers in the alliance because they do not want to keep to the resolutions adopted, because they refuse to accept the protection America offers them at their own request and because they suddenly distrust a strategy which safeguarded peace for them over many years. This objection would not be unjustified. That the Europeans must rely on American nuclear arms is their own fault because they did not want to afford an adequate conventional defense.

But the Americans fail to see that the conditions of political-strategic agreement with Europe have changed. True, it is correct that there was no alternative to the policy of military balance and that the NATO strategy has preserved peace for 35 years, but this alone does not reassure the sceptics. It cannot be denied that many things have changed in recent years. This begins with the balance. The suspicion is growing that in reality it is reciprocal wangling to a point where it is impossible to control the destructive power. That peace can be preserved becomes doubtful if confrontation between the superpowers is dangerously growing and the technical modernization of nuclear arms makes a limited nuclear war "conceivable." Tensions are bound to emerge between America and Europe when the Americans consider detente indivisible and the Europeans, divisible. Among the Europeans the fear is growing of being dragged into a conflict which is not in their interests and could even spell their end.

All these fears have been jeopardized by NATO's counterarming decision. But this decision can still be defended because it is the only instrument at present for negotiations with Moscow and because the Soviets do not honor unilateral disarmament. But if one wants to renounce this instrument one has to talk as thoughtlessly as Reagan, Haig and Weinberger. On the one hand, Reagan considers a limited nuclear war as possible but on the other, as hypothetical and too risky. The Russians will be grateful to him for his irresolution and will wonder how flexible the strategy of flexible response really is. It is credible only if Moscow must assume that NATO is prepared to set a nuclear signal in the case of a Soviet conventional attack on Europe.

For the Europeans two questions are posed: If a limited nuclear war becomes conceivable and if the Americans are prepared to accept it to save their own skin, as Reagan indicated, will it then still be in their interests to station additional American medium-range weapons in Europe? But if it is not conceivable because it cannot be limited, what then is the use of additional medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe?

These questions are bound to complicate the counterarmament debate which is complicated anyway. Actually, Brezhnev has simplified it somewhat through his strategy of unflexible response. He denies the possibility of a limited nuclear war to prevent the United States from starting such a war and making his conventional superiority useless, but also because such a war would not be in the interests of Russia which is a part of Europe. Thus a limited nuclear war is still not very probable. But the question is inevitable of being the first battlefield of such a conflict and what a credible deterrent strategy could be like which would spare the Europeans making the first sacrifice.

Guenter Gaus has tried to give an answer which was, however, unsatisfactory because he wants to return to the strategy of massive retaliation which after all was abandoned because it is incredible for America to commit suicide to save Europe. Just as unhelpful is his proposal of a nuclear-free zone for the two German states because this would be the first step toward neutralization. For the time being, it is probably indispensable to consider whether the deterrent value of the conventional armed forces could be increased through an improvement of antitank weapons.

In addition, a disengagement of the nuclear arms of both blocs on either side of the East-West demarcation line should be considered, signalling their willingness not to stumble into a nuclear conflict rashly and thoughtlessly. The risk would not become bigger for us or smaller for Moscow. The strategy of flexible response, if it fails, also could not prevent occupation of a large part of the Federal Republic. A solid line would meet the same purpose as the threat of the use of the first atomic bomb, namely to gain time for negotiations. Over the result of these negotiations would still be looming the threat of nuclear war. If such a line were to have the function of a trip-wire and if it were to be credibly coupled with the American retaliatory power -- Reagan almost owes us this -- much less nuclear arms would be necessary. Europe's fears of a limited nuclear war would decrease and Moscow could no longer hope it can divide America and Europe over the necessity to automatically increase the number of medium-range weapons. At the same time, tables could be turned and the Soviet Union be put under pressure to reduce on its part the nuclear arms targeted on Europe.

The counterarmament decision and Reagan's policy have triggered a strategy debate which can hardly be stopped. It also must not stop at underdone offhand statements. If this alliance is to have a future and the danger of nuclear catastrophe is to be reduced, then this debate must be conducted to the end and be freed of outdated or immature cliches of thought.

U.S. a 'Security Risk'

[Ulrich Mackensen editorial: "Strategies for Europe"]

[Text] The present U.S. Government seems to be slowly developing into a security risk for the North Atlantic alliance. Contradictory statements from Washington on NATO strategy issues and particularly on nuclear war limited to Europe might have originally been interpreted as insecurities of a new administration, but this explanation is not acceptable anymore.

A few matters first: As before, the United States is the most important ally, the guarantor for West Berlin and for the working of the nuclear deterrence umbrella. Conventional U.S. forces stationed in Europe have so far guaranteed the external security of the Federal Republic together with FRG soldiers. High defense expenditures are made and the burdens are being distributed on many shoulders. Those who hold this view have so far been able to argue that these expenditures are necessary because NATO, an alliance of 15 states, distributes burdens and risks equally to avoid war through deterrence.

Deterrence is based on flexible response strategy, a combination of conventional defense, the possible use of tactical nuclear weapons (nuclear weapons in and for Europe) and finally strategic nuclear weapons with which both nuclear superpowers threaten each other directly.

This combination -- called triad -- is possible and effective only because of its unpredictability regarding the means to be used to respond to an attack.

European NATO politicians and military leaders as well as the renowned London "International Institute for Strategic Studies" agree almost unanimously that nuclear war cannot be limited regionally. That would contradict possible aims in war. Why should an aggressor planning to occupy a territory with its industrial potential use nuclear arms? A destroyed area which will be contaminated for many years is not a target for war. The conclusion: If the aggressor wanted to occupy an undestroyed, or mostly undestroyed area, would he not then have to 'eliminate' the adversary who could still threaten him with nuclear weapons from far away, thus hindering the aggressor in achieving his war aims?

Up until now these were very theoretical considerations. After all, deterrence is supposed to have the effect that no war is fought. In other words, in order not to wage war, including nuclear war, one would have to know how it could be waged. NATO partnership and the distribution of risks means and meant that the Europeans as well as the Americans are closely linked together. This was one of the points of view leading to NATO's dual decision.

Even if new nuclear arms were to be introduced, they must be considered political weapons as all nuclear weapons are. This is meant to demonstrate to the United States that the West Europeans are prepared to bear their part of the risk, and it is supposed to be a signal to the adversary that NATO is aware, as demonstrated in earlier negotiations, that arms control talks will be possible with Moscow only if there is something to offer.

Now Reagan is about to destroy this agreement in the alliance, he is about to destroy solidarity and promote insecurity which has involved broad segments of the people and which feeds the peace movement. Even if the other NATO views are correct -- particularly that an attack on a member country will be considered as an attack on the alliance as a whole -- the suspicion of some sort of secret nuclear collusion between Washington and Moscow arises. In any event the Europeans will be the losers.

Reagan may possibly state in the near future that he did not mean "nuclear detachment" of the United States from NATO's common risks. But mistrust is growing. It still cannot be said what effect Reagan's and Weinberger's attitude will eventually have on the nuclear medium-range weapon negotiations slated to begin late this month. But one thing seems clear already: The concern of many Europeans is becoming more understandable and fear more apprehensible.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS POOR SHAPE OF BONN COALITION

[Editorial by Bonn correspondent Eghard Moerbitz: "Government on Call"]

[Text] Signs are not good for this government which in view of increasing unemployment figures and bankruptcies is facing the worst winter since the years of reconstruction. So far it has been mainly the columnists and the electronic augurs who announced the near end of the social-liberal government period, but now one hears defeatist tones more and more often from those involved.

The chancellor complained in the recent cabinet session about the alarming lack of discipline in the social-liberal coalition and the tendency to create one's own image [selbstdarstellung]. In saying this he certainly had in mind those colleagues who frankly utter doubts whether the firm Schmidt, Genscher and company will outlast the next 2 months. The just reelected SPD faction chairman stated among other things that this was not at all unjustified pessimism. There is good reason why Herbert Wehner stresses the necessary mutual support "in the framework of the democratic entirety," stating again that divided Germany could not tolerate "irreparable hostility between Christian Democrats and Social Democrats."

In this situation the chancellor is particularly oppressed by the concern whether the sturdiness of the economically responsible -- trade unions as well as businessmen -- will suffice to stand through the next months. In doing this, he is fighting a war on several fronts. The fact that he must live with a pacemaker in all this trouble may still be the lesser evil.

The rapping of the coalition in this cabinet indicates that it is most intolerable for Helmut Schmidt not to be fully backed by the SPD and the coalition partner in such a critical domestic and foreign political situation. The fact that resigning comrades seriously toy with the idea of raising Willy Brandt once more on the shield, can leave Helmut Schmidt relatively cold; he knows better than anybody else that the link between the SPD and the FDP will hold only as long as the chancellor's name will be Helmut Schmidt and the vice chancellor's Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Everything else is pure illusion.

In view of all this it is just natural that the chancellor and the vice chancellor are getting more closely together again and that the FDP chairman keeps a close eye on the government chief. According to the Basic Law only the chancellor determines the guidelines of policy. In today's reality, however, nothing works without the liberal deputy, even if his position will end, as that of all ministers, as soon as the federal chancellor will be at his wit's end politically.

The chancellor and the vice chancellor have planned to implement the agreed package for the improvement of federal finances and for the stimulation of the economy, let it show its effect and stop the permanent deterioration of confidence. It seems more than questionable whether this will be achieved because the Federal Government has lost more credibility in the horrible summer and fall performance concerning the improvement of federal finances than it can make up for now. Moreover one must fear that revenue estimates and the newest employment figures from Nuremburg will appear as new bad news in early December. All experience indicates that the information available to the citizens in mid-December brings particularly strong influence to bear on the mood as a whole, because families discuss their own situation more intensely in the Christmas days than otherwise.

Tax estimates will also influence the decision-making process in the Bundesrat where CDU/CSU laender hold a majority and will considerably increase their resistance if revenues indicate new financial gaps.

The thing that keeps Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in office under such conditions is certainly not pleasure to exert power, but much rather the vexed insight that everything else would be interpreted as shunning responsibility. His vice chancellor is not much better off. But only the one who is successful in the end will be considered as having lived up to his duties.

DIE WELT: SOVIETS VIOLATED 1978 COMMUNIQUE

[Text] Leonid Brezhnev is showing a remarkable lack of understanding in Bonn. He refuses to understand at all why the West is so concerned about the SS-20 missiles. He is even playing the disappointed man and bluntly told the federal chancellor in the presence of the delegations that the Germans have asserted time and again that another war would never start from their soil yet, on the other hand, they are prepared to deploy U.S. missiles which can reach Soviet territory.

If this language by the Soviet leader contrasts with Brezhnev's efforts to appear as a kind and even friendly guest, then his German interlocutors will have been all the more startled behind the closed doors of the chancellor's office.

Yet Schmidt has absolutely no reason to be ashamed.

It was Schmidt who in 1977 sounded the alarm because of the Soviet medium-range missiles lead in Europe, and thus he was all the more satisfied when during his last visit in May 1978 Brezhnev agreed to include the following sentences in the joint communique: "Both sides consider it important for no one to strive for military superiority. They assume that approximate balance and parity are sufficient to guarantee defense."

For the chancellor to endorse in direct talks with Brezhnev Reagan's concept of a zero option means that Schmidt, who also hosted Brezhnev in 1978, feels deceived by the Soviet leader. The Soviet Union has unscrupulously violated the above two sentences of the 1978 communique.

According to normal practice among negotiators, as the one who made the error, it should be up to Brezhnev to correct a grave mistake, namely, the missiles lead. But he has no intention now of doing this. It is a delicate situation because Brezhnev's credibility toward his host is thus becoming the main aspect of this visit.

PRESS DISCUSSES BREZHNEV'S VISIT TO BONN

DW241341 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Press Review]

[Excerpts] Today the editorial writers view Bonn again, where German-Soviet talks concentrated yesterday almost completely on missiles. And now the opinion of WESTFALISCHE NACHRICHTEN of Muenster: The guest probably believes that everything would be quite different. If he saw himself prior to his Bonn visit in the role of a prince of peace who was about to accept well-earned homage, he must have been sobered by yesterday's beginning. As soon as the red carpet had been rolled up again, Federal Chancellor Schmidt made clear to him with pleasant frankness what bothers the Germans: not the American missiles, which are supposed to strengthen their security if need be, but the constantly growing Soviet medium-range arms threatening this security.

RHEINISCHE POST of Dusseldorf writes the following: Schmidt had stressed repeatedly prior to the Brezhnev visit that he feels cheated by the Soviet state and party chief because he had promised him on the occasion of his 1978 visit in a public agreement not to strive for superiority in the arms race. But this is exactly what the Soviet Union has done in the past 3 years.

The systematic deployment of at least 150 SS-20 missiles ready to be fired, that is, one missile a week since Brezhnev's last visit to the Rhine, has led to the unloved counterarmament decision of the West. If Brezhnev suggested another moratorium yesterday, that is a stopgap measure while maintaining the USSR's superiority. It shows with almost brutal frankness that the powerful Soviet Union claims a special position for itself in Europe.

KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER states: Due to its understanding of the military balance in Europe, Moscow cannot and does not want to accept the zero option for land-based medium-range missiles suggested by Reagan. He turns tables and almost threatens to take new measures if NATO's counterarmament is implemented. Schmidt had to and wanted to defy this. The confrontation, which was not kept a secret by the Soviet guests, demonstrates that Reagan's offensive made Moscow stand with its back to the wall. So the Russian bear needs the Bonn stage to let the world hear his irritated growling.

Now follows the opinion of NEUE RUHR ZEITUNG of Essen: Helmut Schmidt found the right point for a beginning when he reminded the top man of the Soviet leadership, as a partner and a neighbor, of the commitment to give peace a firm basis beyond the year 2000. This may sound like a phrase, but it is the core of world politics in the nuclear age. The common cause can be served only if the antagonisms are not kept secret but outlined to mitigate them. The chancellor pointed out that if negotiations should be unsuccessful, there will be counterarmament with U.S. missiles -- Brezhnev announced again that in such a case there will be Soviet countermeasures.

BADISCHE ZEITUNG of Freiburg writes: Preparatory work must be done prior to the meeting propagated by Schmidt. The Federal Republic can convince itself now how difficult this work will be: The basic approaches of the Soviets and of the Western alliance on the respective security demands, on starting positions such as with regard to the forthcoming missile negotiations in Geneva, are miles away from each other. Curtailing such differences and agreeing on the assessment of the existing arms potential -- that is a toilsome task costing very much time, maybe too much time if one bears in mind the advanced age of Reagan and Brezhnev as well as the unstable health condition of the Soviet chief of state. Yet the Federal Government must do everything to build bridges and to campaign for the exploitation of every possibility to reach understanding. That was the opinion of BADISCHE ZEITUNG.

MANNHEIMER MORGEN points out: If the Soviets intended to use the Bonn stage for bringing influence to bear on other NATO countries such as the Netherlands, Belgium or Norway against NATO's dual decision, Schmidt has at least set a counterweight. The Soviet politicians have always understood a frank word. It will probably promote Soviet-American talks if Brezhnev will be convinced during his Bonn visit that the West will firmly represent its position and that it will not be split up.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON SCHMIDT-BREZHNEV TALKS ISSUED

For the TASS version of the joint communique issued at the conclusion of talks between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and General Secretary Leonid Brezhnev, see the Western Europe section of the 25 November Soviet Union DAILY REPORT.

BRIEFS

AID TO EL SALVADOR -- Bonn, 24 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Government will decide on whether to continue development aid to El Salvador only after the civil war has ended, a spokesman of the Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation said in Bonn today. Last week Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher promised Foreign Minister Fidel Chavez Mena that the question of resuming development aid would be examined. The Federal Government's development aid was suspended at the beginning of 1980 because of the civil war. Bonn pledged aid projects worth DM 25 million to El Salvador. UNIONISTS TO GDR -- Geneva, 24 Nov (DPA) -- The FRG and GDR trade union leaderships are to meet in the first week of April 1982 in East Berlin. This was agreed on the sidelines of the European trade union conference in Geneva between the DGB chairman, Heinz Oskar Vetter, and the leader of the GDR trade union Federation FDGB, Harry Tisch, Vetter told DPA on Tuesday. The visit, which is to last 3 to 4 days, reciprocates an FDGB visit to Dusseldorf in 1979, and is to be quite independent of the planned meeting between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker, according to Vetter. CHEYSSON ENDORSES REAGAN'S ZERO OPTION

External Relations Minister Cheysson, who was also questioned as he left the Elysee, said that the "zero option" in the sphere of medium-range missiles was the "desirable solution." "I felt," he said, "that the expression 'neither SS-20's nor Pershings' which was used in demonstrations and on other occasions was a good expression." Recalling that the introduction of the SS-20 missiles brought about an "element of nuclear imbalance in Europe," the minister continued: "If there are no longer any SS-20's, that element disappears and the threat of the Pershings, which is necessary as long as there are SS-20's, no longer has any purpose." "Ronald Reagan's former statements," he concluded, "did not seem to take account of European public opinion. I am happy to see that this time his speech can be interpreted as being intended for European public opinion."

QUAI D'ORSAY 'GUARDED' ON SOVIET ARMS PROPOSALS

LD241838 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Excerpts] In the end, the Schmidt-Brezhnev meeting in Bonn will have served as a kind of rehearsal for the forthcoming Geneva conference. The positions of each side are known and discussions are now focused on the Soviet moratorium proposal. For its part, France is being very guarded as far as the Soviet disarmament proposals are concerned -- this is the Quai d'Orsay's reaction.

N-Deterrent Not Negotiable

[Excerpts] The Brezhnev-Schmidt summit has been very closely followed by the Quai d'Orsay and with good reason, [name indistinct] (Gosset) reports. Prior to the Schmidt-Brezhnev meeting France advocated the zero option proposed by U.S. President Reagan.

[(Gosset)] Indeed, up till now Paris has not made any definitive judgment on Leonid Brezhnev's reply to Ronald Reagan. At the Quai d'Orsay it is though that the Soviet leader's gesture does not change things very much as compared with what Moscow had already proposed.

Well, even if Chancellor Schmidt sees new elements in the Soviet proposals, Paris prefers to wait for the end of the Bonn summit before making a pronouncement, since Brezhnev may still play a surprise card to prevent the deployment of American missiles in Europe.

What is certain is that, contrary to what may have been understood in Bonn or Moscow, it is out of the question that France will allow the French deterrent force to be taken into account in future Soviet-American negotiations, whatever the state of talks between the superpowers on the subject of disarmament. Moreover, despite some rumors on this subject in the Federal Republic, Moscow knows very well that France will not compromise on this point.

And finally, it may be said tonight that the immediate result of the Brezhnev-Schmidt meeting is to have assured that good conditions will prevail for the resumption of the disarmament talks just between the Soviets and Americans in Geneva next Monday. After Reagan's gift to the pacifists and Brezhnev's minor gesture yesterday, the climate could perhaps not be better between the two superpowers.

UKRAINIAN GROUP RESPONSIBLE FOR CAR BOMBING

An anonymous phone call to AGENCE-FRANCE PRESSE just after the bombing claimed it had been carried out "to commemorate the rebirth of the Ukraine." The caller claimed to be speaking for what sounded to be the "Bande des Rats" (The Rat Pack) -- a designation whose link with the Ukrainian nationalist cause was not at first clear. A check with records, however, showed the reference to be to the Ukrainian nationalist militant Etienne Bandera -- a surname with identical pronunciation to "Bande des Rats."

Bandera, who in the 1930's was active in the cause of Ukrainian independence, was put in charge of a Ukrainian force by the Nazi armies of occupation. Disillusioned by his masters, he was accused by them of treason and deported at the end of World War II. In October 1959 he was shot dead by an unidentified assailant in Munich.

REAGAN'S SPEECH 'TIES' SCHMIDT'S, BREZHNEV'S HANDS

PM241617 Paris LE FIGARO in French 23 Nov 81 p 1

[Serge Maffert editorial: "What Dialogue?"]

[Text] The talks which Mr Brezhnev is having with Chancellor Schmidt in Bonn today and tomorrow are described as very important by both sides. Yet another conference on armaments will start in Geneva on Monday. It is already being forecast that this meeting, devoted to the Euromissiles, which is also the main subject of the German-Soviet talks, will be interminable and it will join a list which is already long and which includes the "big" Geneva "conference" on disarmament, the Madrid conference, the Vienna MBFR conference, not to mention the recurrent SALT negotiations which, according to Mr Reagan, are to become "Strategic Arms Reduction Talks."

Obviously no positive and precise result is expected from all that. However, the Bonn discussions are obviously important. They are the first serious talks between the Soviet Union's leader and a Western leader since Mr Reagan took office. It so happens that in the present situation Mr Brezhnev and Mr Schmidt have the same need to compare their views and strengthen their political positions.

The Soviet leader has committed his authority and prestige in the policy of detente with the West which, seen from Moscow, is most frequently considered to be negative for the USSR.

The German chancellor, opposed from within his own party, by the Christian Democratic Union opposition and by a section of German opinion, wants to demonstrate the soundness of his policy of balance and the middle way: loyal to the Atlantic alliance but open to any possibility of cooperation with East Europe.

Skillfully, for once, President Reagan has immediately, and even in anticipation, prevented any possibility of a real agreement between Brezhnev and Schmidt. The speech he made last week on armaments in Europe has tied the hands of both of the Bonn interlocutors. He has thus recalled that there could be no East-West agreement other than a direct agreement between Washington and Moscow (moreover Brezhnev does not really think otherwise).

As it happens the fundamental problem is still the same: Washington's difficulty in accurately assessing, if not its inability to accurately assess, Moscow's intentions and hence to gauge the real danger. The reverse is equally true. The result of this twofold failure is an arms race such as has never before been seen.

The American military doctrine is based on a massive buildup of arms and technology ensuring an advantage, presumed to be decisive, over the USSR. The latter, for its part, whatever its real intentions, is taking full advantage of its main ability: manufacturing a gigantic lineup of tanks, aircraft, and missiles which results in an extremely excessive capability in the sphere of conventional weapons.

The only way of breaking this spiral would be political discussion possibly leading to a political agreement. In any case the arms race can only be stopped after such a thorough debate. Only confidence could, possibly, lead to disarmament. It is not realistic to believe that the latter will precede the former.

AVANTI: PSI TAKES CREDIT FOR REAGAN ZERO OPTION

[Francesco Gozzano commentary: "Proposal Which Embarrasses Brezhnev"]

Washington's response to European fears constitutes a specific application of the principle of equal partnership among allies. Reagan has taken into account the positions of the Western countries, which were the first to express legitimate anxieties about the threat constituted by the SS-20's, and which asked the United States for appropriate weapons for an effective deterrent, or, better still, an agreement aimed at averting that threat by eliminating the Soviet missiles. This was the basis for the emergence of the zero option proposal, which was not originally espoused by Reagan. This is a victory for the Europeans and for those among them -- primarily the Italian and German socialists -- who fought to ensure that a real and better security would stem not from an adjustment in levels of armaments but from their reduction or dismantling. The method of mutual relinquishment, suitably verifiable, of the most destructive weapons is the main road to achieving a genuine disarmament that will free the European peoples from the nightmare of nuclear destruction -- a road that cannot be pursued with unilateral gestures but which requires the assumption of precise and mutual commitments on both sides.

How will Brezhnev respond? The Soviet thesis of a supposed parity in the various weapons systems will probably be confirmed and an attempt will be made to base negotiations on symmetrical "cuts" in the respective arsenals, or a request will be made to include U.S. strategic aircraft in Europe too, not just land-based missiles, among the weapons to be reduced or eliminated. Reagan's proposals have already been dismissed by Moscow as an excuse for continuing the arms race; in other words, the usual propaganda repertoire is produced at the right moment in an attempt to gain time and in the hope that the "mass movements" will manage to force the West to disarm unilaterally while the USSR maintains its alignment intact. Such a tactic seems bound to fail, because Reagan has made it quite clear that until agreement is reached the envisaged plans will continue to be implemented. If Moscow harbors any illusions in this connection it had better abandon them.

Some people might object that the proposals enunciated by Reagan yesterday seem too ambitious and are in danger of meeting the same end as other lofty initiatives in the disarmament field, which never got beyond acceptance in principle (this was the case with the agreement on the prevention of surprise attacks, given a new boost by Reagan, which has been under study in the disarmament committee for years), in fact it seems opportune that a link is being established between the weapons triad (conventional, tactical and strategic) because of the connection that exists in their possible future use according to the principles of NATO's flexible strategy. This link is also indispensable for achieving a fair balance in the three sectors and preventing the nuclear option -- that is, the danger of a total destruction of mankind -- or U.S. "disengagement" from Europe from proving the only one left open.

The tenacity with which the Socialists have fought to ensure that the formulation of U.S. negotiation strategy takes into account the Europeans' demands and anxieties has yielded an initial result; the close consultations that will be maintained during the Geneva negotiations will embody a further guarantee that the Americans will not seek any agreements with the Soviets over the allies' heads.

Last, Reagan's speech establishes the preconditions for strengthening the Atlantic alliance on the political plane — a solidarity which now seems all the more essential for ensuring the success of negotiations that in any case promise to be lengthy and difficult, and which for that very reason require that cohesion and vigilance be maintained.

ROME DAILY EVALUATES U.S. ARMS CONTROL PROPOSALS

[Text] Speaking on television yesterday, President Reagan launched a peace offensive whose huge political value is not nullified by the clear propaganda aims of the speech broadcast to half the world, by the suddenness of his conversion or by the attractive but misleading simplicity of certain stances. Suddenly the U.S. leadership has realized the danger of leaving the subject of peace to the Soviets and of losing the allies' trust on the way, and has realized the need, after so many contradictory and freewheeling statements and so many rash assertions about the disturbing prospect of a nuclear conflict, to reassert in a presidential speech the U.S. commitment to arms control and, if possible, reduction at all levels.

Discussing Reagan's speech with the press, the secretary of state emphasized the "good faith," the "responsibility" and "sincerity" of the U.S. positions, perhaps realizing that, under the circumstances, a questioning of intent would not be entirely unfounded. But whatever the reason and the intentions, the fact remains that the world public will from now on have to assess Washington's conduct with this yardstick. And, whether the Kremlin likes it or not, it is with this yardstick that the Soviet responses will be assessed; the objections to the U.S. proposals will have to be persuasive, and possible counterproposals must not be evasive.

Reagan seems to harbor no illusions in this regard. When one journalist asked him what kind of response he expects, the President shrugged and said nothing. Washington is convinced that everything that has come hitherto from the Kremlin is pure propaganda, and perhaps it believes that the Kremlin can be beaten at its own game by means of statements with the same propaganda value and cheap peace and disarmament offers, so that the two superpowers are then free to go their own ways.

But if this is the reckoning, it is a shortsighted one, because Moscow and Washington are now prisoners of what they have said, in the eyes of world -- and particularly European -- public opinion. In a sense, if there was a "bluff" on both sides, both sides have mutually exposed it. It will be very difficult and politically very expensive to turn back.

On the other hand, there are reason for moving ahead. Brezhnev has just announced to the plenum the disastrous state of the Soviet economy, and, however much the CPSU leadership may ignore domestic public opinion, there are clear limits to a further containment of consumption for the sake of continuing with the massive accumulation of weapons of the past decade and, if possible, keeping up with the Americans' rearmament plans. But in the United States, too, the contribution that the Pentagon's overblown budget is making to deficits, restrictive monetary policy, the squeezes in the industrial sector and in the availability of raw materials and specialized personnel is now evident.

What is equally evident is the cost, unlikely to be tolerated in an open society such as America's, that the arms race would try to unload onto not only the underprivileged sectors but also the middle class itself, since welfare spending cuts are not enough. Nor can the superpowers' leaderships permit themselves to underestimate the influence of public opinion, the increasingly widespread and clear signs of rejection of the logics which guide their leadership groups. The very fact that Reagan has now felt the need to come out into the open with a speech of this kind really is an acknowledgement of the influence of European public opinion, which only a few weeks ago people were pretending to ignore by dismissing the peace marches as marginal and politically suspect demonstrations. But within the United States, too, something has begun to move. Opinion polls confirm that the majority are in favor of negotiations and would not follow the leadership in rash policies, while a coalition of scientists, medics and churchmen is mobilizing to impose a decision for negotiated disarmament.

When the Catholic bishops gathered in the capital described the nuclear arms race — as they did yesterday -- as "the most serious moral issue in public life today" and proclaim the church's duty to "say a clear and resolute 'No' to the use of nuclear weapons," it is obvious that the issue of armaments and the related decisions has now become predominant in the public debate, with an importance which the political leadership can ignore only at its own peril.

Moreover, a dialogue, however circumspect and mistrustful but not without promising aspects, as Haig acknowledged this morning, is going on between the superpowers. In a message sent to Brezhnev, Reagan expounded the same proposals as he presented on television, and before leaving for Bonn the Soviet leader wrote to the U.S. President suggesting (according to columnist James Reston, who reported it) a meeting before U.S.-USSR relations get out of hand. The prospect of a summit remains unlikely for the time being, since the United States is convinced that it should be prepared for carefully and should produce results, so as to avoid failures that would exacerbate the situation.

Meanwhile on the diplomatic plane, work goes on to clear away the debris that accumulated with the collapse of detente. Haig announced today that he will meet with Gromyko on 26 and 27 January in Geneva, and the strategic arms limitation talks (which the Americans want to rename "START" to emphasize the principle of reduction as against limitation, as in "SALT") should begin soon after that. In this speech, Reagan placed these negotiations on the official agenda for the first time, and according to Haig, both the speech and the letter to Brezhnev constitute "a clear indication of the President's intentions to conduct a constructive dialogue and to seek a positive outcome."

These are not quite the same signals that Washington has been issuing for months, regularly placing the emphasis on the military solution of political problems, the constant devaluation of the negotiating option and the insistence on "linkage," that is, the connection between arms negotiations and the USSR's conduct worldwide.

According to Haig, just as there is no "automatic link" among the four areas of negotiation suggested in the President's speech, so the recognition of an "interrelation" between conduct and arms negotiations must not rule out the start of talks. Indeed, the secretary of state went as far as to acknowledge that the Soviets have themselves given signs of moderating over the past year. Obviously, the tensions created by previous actions (Afghanistan, Africa and the Persian Gulf) remain, and the United States is pledging itself to a dialogue "that will not only highlight the concern about this Soviet activity worldwide but will also advance specific proposals for a solution."

PRESIDENT EANES DEPARTS ON AFRICAN TOUR

LD241100 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0700 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Begin recording] My trip to three African countries, Mozambique, Zambia and Tanzania, fits into a foreign policy pattern dating back to 1976, whose concrete results have shown it to be positive and totally justified from the standpoints of Portugal, Europe and the African countries with whom we have close ties.

It is now clear that the Portuguese dimension of an African policy is welcomed by the African states and by Europe as a link to draw the two continents closer together, and that its implementation is an important conditioning factor for Portugal's case for EEC membership. It is equally clear that the establishment of just and lasting cooperation relations between Portugal and the African states is an objective that meets the interests of our economic recovery, by providing us with export-import markets in mutually beneficial conditions.

On the other hand, Portugal's knowledge of Africa's problems, especially of those still prevailing in southern Africa, makes it natural that we should contribute to the search for solutions based on consensus and sound negotiations which will finally provide that part of the world with the conditions of stability and progress to which it has long aspired. In this connection, we shall have the opportunity of reiterating Portugal's unswerving stand on the Namibian question, the condemnation of apartheid and racial discrimination, the guarantee that states' internal affairs will be free from outside interference, the demand for respect for the states' sovereignty and territorial integrity, and support for an international climate of cooperation conducive to the establishment of more just economic relations among countries and continents.

All Portuguese will be bound to attribute a very special significance to the strengthening of our relations with the People's Republic of Mozambique which this visit will naturally advance. In a context of honorable relations among states it reflects the reality of a broad basis of understanding being established between Portugal and Mozambique, with mutual respect for each other's sovereignty and for the specific natures of the two political regimes, and with the recognition that it is possible to commence and develop a kind of cooperation which will meet our converging interests.

For all these reasons, I am leaving with the clear awareness that I am carrying out a mission truly in the national interest, hoping that all Portuguese may share this certainty, conscious that it is with our eyes set on the present and the future that we must unite our efforts and skills so that our common interests may be asserted and defended. [end recording]

PAPER NOT OPTIMISTIC ON ZERO OPTION SUCCESS

[Editorial: "The Zero Option"]

[Text] On the eve of a new stage in negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on the limitation of theater nuclear weapons in Europe, scheduled for 30 November in Geneva, Washington has just made two decisions which could prove to be particularly influential on the results of that meeting.

The first and most important of these decisions is that which advocates the "zero option"; that is, the Americans refrain from deploying their powerful Pershing II in Europe if the Soviets withdraw their SS-20 armed with three nuclear warheads from the Warsaw Pact countries and from their own territory, where they are aimed at the West.

This is an apparently correct and balanced proposal which could constitute the beginning of bilateral disarmament and a significant step in the two superpowers' joint progress toward military denuclearization; however, Western observers do not believe that the Soviet Union will endorse it, or that, moreover, it will endorse any other proposal which entails the slightest concession in the military superiority which it in fact holds over the European countries belonging to the Atlantic alliance.

Intent on achieving their aims through the use and manipulation of Western public opinion, which is increasingly demanding and dangerously exacting as regards unilateral disarmament, the Soviets will attempt to gain time in the negotiations, while leaving to the more or less well intentioned, more or less convinced and more or less idealistic pacifist movements the task of hounding NATO, of rejecting its concern for parity in nuclear devices and of promoting the justification of the West's unconditional disarmament.

This skillful venture does not even run the risk of a countermove, since the rights to express opinions, assemble and demonstrate are dangers which are carefully forestalled in the Eastern bloc.

But, together with this invitation to a bilateral gesture of good will and commitment, Washington has made another decision which will very probably impair the atmosphere of the Geneva negotiations; the suspension for 1 week of Aeroflot flights to the United States on the ground that aircraft belonging to the Soviet airline deviated from their regular route and flew over "sensitive areas" of New England. It is appropriate to interpret this incident in a manner similar to the grounding of the Soviet submarine in Swedish territorial waters, very close to an important naval base.

Is it exaggerated confidence in their own efficiency or excessive negligence induced by the permissiveness of the democratic societies which explains these two grave Soviet "blunders"? However it may be, they both work to the disadvantage of the pacifist viewpoints conveniently sponsored by the USSR -- and also make it more difficult to expect that the "zero option" will succeed.

DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE SUMMIT BEGINS IN LISBON

LD241432 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Text] The revision of the constitution and the present political situation are the main items on the agenda of the Democratic Alliance summit meeting which started in Lisbon this morning. Pinto Balsemao, Freitas do Amaral and Ribeiro Teles [leaders of the Social Democratic, Social Democratic Center and Popular Monarchist parties respectively] are analyzing, among other issues, the attacks being moved from within the Council of the Revolution against the work of revising the constitution, in the light of the growing consensus that is emerging among the democratic forces.

Democratic forces are also hoping for a firm denounciation of the plot currently being hatched against the democratic regime, (as heard) part and parcel of which is the proliferation of petitions signed by prominent nonpartisan figures active in the corridors of Belam Palace, and its ramifications. Communist efforts to create social instability are sufficient for one to draw the relevant conclusions for blocking the way to what would appear to be a new 11 March in the offing [reference to 11 March 1975 moves by leftwing of the armed forces].

LD241654 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1230 GMT 24 Nov 81

[Text] A EUROPA PRESS dispatch says that an announcement on a new government could come any time after the long weekend of the Feast of the Immaculate Conception, that is, after Tuesday, 8 December. The dispatch says attempts to resolve the government crisis will begin on 29 November.

The agency quotes government sources to the effect that there will very likely be a return to the formula of deputy premiers in the new cabinet. One of them would oversee economic affairs and the other political matters. Specific names to hold these posts have already been circulated.

The dispatch adds that there is talk of turning what are at present the secretariats of state for tourism and health into full ministries. In addition the former ministry for relations with the Cortes could be resurrected; this has been vacant since the resignation of Ignacio Camunas, who was the first and last head of this nonportfolio department.

In this context it should be added that Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo will also have to make a decision on the four new members to be brought into the Executive Committee.

TOGOLESE PRESIDENT BEGINS OFFICIAL VISIT

LD231840 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 23 Nov 81

General Eyadema will attend a gala dinner this evening at the Oriente Palace, which will be hosted by the king and queen. During his 3 days here the president of Togo will have two official meetings with Don Juan Carlos and a meeting with Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo. The official visit could open up possibilities for trade exchanges between Togo and Spain. Such exchanges have up to now been few.

President's Itinerary

[Excerpts] On the second day of his official visit to Spain, the president of Togo, General Eyadema, will have lunch today with King Juan Carlos, a meeting with Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, receive the freedom of the city of Madrid, visit the headquarters of the National Institute of Industry and view military exercises by the Brunete Armored Division at the El Goloso base.

The president of Togo arrived yesterday with a large retinue, including several government ministers, for a visit lasting until tomorrow and aimed at stepping up economic and technological contacts between the two countries, especially at speeding up agreements on a number of industrial projects in which Spanish firms are involved in Togo.

The president was welcomed on arrival at Barajas airport by the king and queen, who later hosted a dinner at the royal palace. In his speech of welcome King Juan Carlos highlighted the dangers threatening the unity of Africa and stressed the serious problems of refugees thrown up by conflicts in Africa.

President Eyadema, for his part, praised the role the king has played in the transition and for his interest in African problems, an interest based on close cultural and historical links. He went on: Togo believes firmly that Spain can play a decisive role in a number of conflicts currently afflicting Africa and which represent a threat to peace.

DENMARK

OLESEN CALLS U.S. PROPOSAL 'A POSITIVE STEP'

PM241455 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 20 Nov 81 p 4

[Text] In a comment on President Reagan's speech Wednesday Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen said:

"U.S. willingness to begin serious arms control negotiations on both nuclear and conventional arms is a positive step. The fact that the United States has accepted the zero option, to which the European nations have attached such importance during consultations among the allies, must be greeted with satisfaction.

"The forthcoming negotiations in Geneva will be both difficult and time consuming. During the consultations within NATO Denmark has proposed that the U.S. negotiating package be as balanced, constructive and flexible as possible. For this reason we have taken careful note of President Reagan's statement that the United States intends to negotiate in good faith with a willingness which involves listening to and weighing the Soviet Union's counterproposals."

NORWAY

GOVERNMENT AIDES WELCOME REAGAN PROPOSAL

PM241507 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 19 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] "Opponents of the NATO decision to deploy new nuclear missiles claimed that the decision would hinder further disarmament negotiations. We now can see that they were wrong, that the decision has on the contrary been a precondition for serious negotiations on reciprocal disarmament," Norwegian Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad told the Conservative Press Bureau in an initial reaction to President Reagan's negotiation demarche.

He said that the Kremlin had threatened that the NATO decision would make negotiations impossible. The reverse is true. It is precisely this decision in the West to restore the balance which is now bringing the Russians to the negotiating table, Sjaastad said. "Norway is happy to welcome this initiative," said Under Secretary Kjell Colding of the prime minister's office.

The proposals include both nuclear and conventional arms, which must be viewed in connection with each other. One of the things confirmed by the President's speech is that the United States is going to the forthcoming negotiations in Geneva with a real and avowed desire to achieve the maximum reduction in nuclear arms on both sides. It is our hope that the Soviet Union will now accept the U.S. negotiation offer with a correspondingly positive attitude, Under Secretary Kjell Colding said. Conservative party Chairman Jo Benkow also stressed that the NATO decision was a dual decision. The West intended both to put an end to Soviet superiority and to proceed to negotiations on mutual arms reductions, Benkow pointed out.

PAPANDREOU 22 NOV GOVERNMENT POLICY STATEMENT

[22 November policy statement by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou at Greek Chamber of Deputies; recorded -- relay of Athens Domestic Service]

[Text] Mr Chairman, dear colleagues: National independence and territorial integrity, peoples sovereignty and democracy, self-supported economic and social development, our cultural revival, the revitalization of the countryside, the radical improvement of the quality of life in the town and in the village, social justice and, in conclusion, social liberation are the goals for our government and predetermine the course we will follow.

The course of change is a long-term project. Based upon the never ending strength of a unified and sovereign people, we will turn the vision into reality. Change is a vision and a course. It is, however, a daily act, a way of life and a way of work. It is the steady compass which will direct every option from the great national issues to the local problem.

We believe that with the support of the people we will create a Greece which will be nationally proud, with a national foreign policy which will be independent and multifaceted. We only have one duty: the national interest [applause].

Democracy, civil, social, and economic democracy are a state obligation and, at the same time, the citizen's right. Every Greek woman, every Greek man must feel and at the same time be free. Social and economic democracy are a target for conquest which demands great efforts. There is also political will, however, and our basic (goal) will be: Social benefit prevails over personal gain. This very principle will direct every one of our recommendations to the people, every one of our proposals to the nation's representatives. We do not oppose private initiative. Every one of its efforts which contribute to the country's development will be encouraged.

Our final goal will be social liberation. In every instance, social justice will rule our efforts, whether in connection with a distribution of the burdens or a distribution of social benefits. Social justice, however, does not mean indiscriminate acceptance of class demands when they are not coordinated with the social repercussions on a series of social classes or when they shake the social effort.

Contrasts and social differences cannot be abolished by aphorisms. This is a state duty. Only democratic dialogue can smooth out differences and finally lay down the course with the broadest possible consent of the people. The government of PASOK will strengthen, nationally and in action, the peoples participation, so that the consent of the people is assured. The steps toward change must be composed of the ripe goals of the people. The rate of achievement of these goals will always be in accordance with the relativity of forces, the tolerance of the economy and, most of all, the consent of the people's forces.

The basic institutions which we will utilize are: The Parliament; local self-government within the framework of a basic decentralization; trade unionism and the mass movement in the places where the people live, work and are educated; democratic planning; public administration with its democratization and cleansing. A considerable role will be played by the (?patriotic) and agricultural-industrial cooperative in the countryside.

With these institutions and with a firm and total exploitation of the human potential and the wealth-giving resources of the country, we will proceed with decisive steps toward a self-supporting development which at the same time will lead to a balanced regional development. It is in this way that we will revitalize the national society and give life to the region, the province, the town and the village.

The reconstruction of our national area, the revitalization of the Greek countryside will, at the same time, rid the urban centers of the current congestion. In this effort, the role of the representatives of the nation will be decisive. Democratic dialogue, full briefing, and constructive critique will open up new vistas for the country.

Based on the unity of spirit between the people and the armed forces, the government will lay down the foundations of a national defense policy which will effectively protect our country against any foreign imposition and which will strengthen peace. The first care toward this end will be emphasis on strict preparedness and battleworthiness of our armed forces.

It is obvious that in implementing change in the sector of national defense, as well as in foreign policy, which is directly related to it, the government will proceed by stages, step by step, always bearing in mind the necessity of guaranteeing the necessary military preparedness and strength for national defense planning and the correct deployment of the forces. The mission of the armed forces is to protect our national independence and our territorial integrity and to discourage any aspirations at the expense of our inalienable national rights.

Just as Greece does not claim anything from anyone, it also is not prepared to cede anything at the expense of its national territory. [prolonged applause]

However, beyond our attention for improving the organization of the equipment of communication systems and of supplies to our armed forces, we will study and face with interest the problems and living conditions of our army personnel. We will seek the natural progress as far as possible of our officers and noncommissioned officers in all ranks of the hierarchy. And we will face with a spirit of understanding their various other problems. Every possible moral and material assistance, particularly in questions of training and living, will be given. Along with this we will take all necessary measures to improve the life in general of our conscripted children. We will particularly increase our material assistance to recruited servicemen, reservists and others, who are facing special family obligations. Dependents of recruited servicemen will be given medical treatment from the state during their entire service and so long as income from every source does not exceed a certain limit.

The national defense policy will also be the mainstay and the necessary supplement of our independent multidimensional foreign policy. The allocation and use of such expenditures will be carried out on the basis of the soundest possible and rational criteria so that the highest result will be achieved through the smallest possible cost.

Our primary goal will be continuous modernization of military means, gradual change in the sources of armament and avoidance of (?unilateral) dependence. At the same time, we will pay special attention to the development of a modern war industry by implementing plans for parallel movment of business [word indistinct] in the fields coming under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of National Defense. We believe that the war industry in our country has very great prospects for development. The government will convert the existing industries from units of maintenance and assemblage to production units with all favorable repercussions for defense and economy. Along with this, we will strengthen scientific research in the fields of war materiel technology, and we will organize a state trade organization for the sale of war materiel abroad.

The selection of recruits and of reserve cadet officers according to specialization will be carried out on the basis of their special knowledge and abilities so that the right man will be appointed to the right post without intervention from the sinful dossiers [personal files on citizens] [applause].

The primary concern of the government is the shaping of an independent, genuinely Greek multidimensional foreign policy. Our firm goal is the development of friendly relations on a world-wide scale and particularly with the Balkans, the people of the Mediterranean, with Europe -- West and East alike -- and with the Arab national which constitutes a dynamic factor in the course of the world. This is our firm goal: Active contribution to detente, disarmament and world peace.

We build our national independence on the independent multidimensional foreign policy, as well as on the shaping of national defense policy.

Our foreign policy is: a policy of peace, a policy of realism, a policy of solidarity for the people struggling for their national independence or laboring for their non-aligned economic development -- finally, a policy which has as its starting point the fact that Greece is a country which simultaneously belongs to Europe, the Balkans and the Mediterranean. With these facts we are facing our national issues, with these facts we are developing our international relations.

In connection with our national issues, the government will follow a policy different from that of its predecessor in office. On the question of the Aegean, it must be made clear both to the neighbors and the Atlantic alliance that our land, sea and air borders as well as the Greek continental shelf limits in the Aegean are not negotiable. They are safeguarded by international agreements and treaties as well as by international practice.

We have clearly explained to Ankara our desire that our people may live in peace and friendship. At long last, the two countries must seriously think someday to put an end to expense armaments and to use the funds spent on armaments for health, education and the elevation of their people's standard of living. But we have also made it clear that we are not inclined to concede even 1 inch of Greek territory. The dialogue with Turkey has sense and can be welcomed in the measure that it would not concern unacceptable concessions of national sovereign rights as well as of arrangements based on international agreements which have delegated to Greece jurisdictions or authorities.

The question of Cyprus, we must recall, is primarily a question of foreign occupation. And for Greece it is a vital national issue. At the same time, it has developed into a major international problem following the Turkish invasion and military occupation of a large part of an independent and nonaligned UN member state. Our government does not forget that Greece is a guarantor power and also has a legal right and a duty to actively support the Cypriot people's struggle for the withdrawal of all the foreign troops, for the safeguarding of free settlement and movement, for the shaping of a constitutional charter which, while consolidating the unity and independence of the Republic of Cyprus, will give equal rights and the same obligations to all its citizens, to both the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish Cypriots.

Along with this, our government will undertake a crusade to brief the world public and to mobilize internationally all the forces which can contribute to the promotion of a fair Cyprus solution.

It is also necessary that we proceed with the opening of the dossier on Cyprus so that the Greek and the Cypriot people are informed about who is responsible for the tragedy of Cyprus.

Our strategic position in NATO, on NATO, stems from our vision which consists of the dissolution of the two psychological blocs -- NATO and the Warsaw Pact. Specifically on NATO, over and above the question of principle, over and above the nature of the Atlantic alliance, the Greek people remember that it supported the 7-year dictatorship in Greece, in the same way that they remember that it did absolutely nothing to stop the Turkish invasion of Cyprus.

There is also a more direct issue: It is meaningless for us to belong to the military wing of an alliance which does not guarantee our eastern frontiers against any possible threat and which, at the same time, as a result of the unlimited supply of military material to Turkey, upsets the balance of power in the Aegean.

At the same time, the government considers that the Rogers agreement, as it has been interpreted to date for over 1 year, questions the limits on Greek operational control over the Aegean. We consider this unacceptable. In other words, the military alliance does not strengthen our frontiers and the Rogers agreement is harmful to our national interests.

With the vote of confidence which the Chamber of Deputies will give to the government, we will simultaneously receive the mandate to proceed to those actions which strengthen our frontiers and protect the country's interests and the people's interests. [prolonged applause] Detachment from the Rogers agreement also falls within this very same framework.

In reference to the U.S. bases, during the negotiations we will be conducting during the first months of 1982 we will present clearly, as we have already stated, a firm schedule for their withdrawal from our country. [applause] Until that time their operation will be governed by the following prerequisites:

1. Control and supervision of their activities by Greece.
2. Possibility of annual revision and abrogation of the relevant agreements so that our national interests may be protected.
3. Curtailment of the activities of the bases whenever they endanger the rights of Greece which are related to our national security or which could harm the interests of our nation in relation with friendly countries in our greater area.

In reference to our international relations, our policy will be an active and dynamic policy which will create the complex of international interconnections which will guarantee the territorial integrity and independence of our country as well as serve its interests. This policy will also be based on the principles of peaceful solution of international differences, of strengthening international peace and of development of relations of friendship and cooperation with all countries.

For these reasons the alliances and coalitions which could lead to a world polarization, and particularly in the European or Mediterranean areas, are contrary to the philosophy of our foreign policy.

In the European area we orient our foreign policy on the basis of the principle that Europe is united, that close cooperation between European countries is dictated by a common cultural past and by common social and economic interests and that the vision must be to create not a new superpower but rather a Europe of the workers. [applause]

In the Mediterranean area our policy is aimed at promoting peace and cooperation. This policy is the sequal of an intensive effort PASOK undertook in the past through establishment of a policy of peace and cooperation between Mediterranean peoples. We believe the Mediterranean must belong to the peoples who inhabit it without the presence of the foreign superpowers and without the military maneuvers which endanger peace in such a sensitive and inflammable area.

Our traditional relations with the Arab nation are developing harmoniously, and the goal of the government is to expand them continually in all sectors so that they can become an example of brotherly cooperation between peoples and governments and be a decisive contribution to the preservation of peace not only in the area but throughout the world. We firmly support the struggle of the Palestinians for self-determination [applause] so that they may get their own fatherland and so that all refugees may return to their homes.

In the Balkan area the criterion of our foreign policy will be pursuit of firm friendship and constructive cooperation. The Balkan area has always been an area for threats by foreign powers and superpowers. We believe the special sensitivity of the area demands creation of a zone of peace so that the Balkans can become a nuclear-free area, not attached to (?a) political-military coalition [applause], and we will direct our efforts toward this end. [applause] At the same time we will strengthen existing political relations for the purpose of creating institutions which will guarantee permanent cooperation. More specifically, and in reference to a nuclear-free area, as a first step toward specific geographic areas, the government proposes creation of a nuclear-free zone in the Balkans. Greece, after the necessary consultations, will be the first to implement, and in a very short time [applause], this principle for withdrawal of nuclear weapons from its territory. [applause]

In conclusion, it is our aim to develop multifaceted relations with the countries of the Third World and a basic promotion of cooperation with the nonaligned.

The rules and regulations of the EC, to which we are obliged to conform as a result of accession, makes many of the economic problems we have to face more acute and also creates new ones. This situation is made even worse by the conditions agreed upon for accession. It is our aim to conduct a plebiscite in accordance with constitutional procedures, a plebiscite so that the Greek people may decide on this serious issue. We note that the decision for the conducting of a plebiscite rests upon the president. Naturally our position on the signing of a special agreement with the EC, allowing implementation of our development program, remains as firm as ever. This primarily will apply to the industrial and agricultural sectors and will strengthen our national independence. The government, however, will honor the decision of the Greek people no matter what it may be when the people do express themselves. In every eventuality and until the Greek people express themselves, we will fight within the organizations of the EC to protect the interests of the Greek people. We will exhaust all possibilities of escape and all margins provided by the Rome agreement and the accession agreement. We will not, however, hesitate to adopt the measures necessary to protect the workers and the producers and to develop goals independent of community obligations. [applause]

We will present these positions with all sincerity within a few days during the London summit conference of the EC states. This first conference which the new government will attend is primarily aimed at reorganizing the common (?agriculture) policy, the other community policies and the community's budget.

I consider it an event of primary importance that it is already being understood within the community that there are unacceptable inequalities within its framework. I consider that this problem of inequalities is of the utmost urgency and that it affects not only the prestige but also the cohesion of the community itself. At the summit conference we will present our problems in a specific way. This does not mean I am optimistic about their speedy solution. Naturally, we will follow these developments closely. It is, at the same time, our goal to develop broad commercial and more general economic relations with all countries.

Our policy options are based upon the principle that the people decide in a sovereign way, without force, after being informed, within a democratic state where there is true multiplicity of voices, political equality, full separation of the state from all parties and absolute respect for the constitution.

The fundamental establishment of people's sovereignty and democracy in the country's daily life are the first goal of the government, which will be implemented through the immediate introduction of institutional changes and reorganization. The principle of people's sovereignty is directly connected to a multiparty government and to the parliamentary government. The Chamber of Deputies is thus strengthened with additional authority in the decisive exercise of its role.

At the same time we will also strengthen the other two foundations of democracy -- local self-government and trade unionism -- both in the countryside and in the city. A decisive role in the function of democratic institutions will be played by the strengthening of the citizens' right for diversified and objective availability of information through the mass media as well as through the free exchange of ideas.

We proclaim, and we have already applied, the principle that we are a government of all the Greeks. [applause] Different political beliefs and party preferences are not only acceptable but necessary for the functioning of a democratic multiparty government. We will proceed immediately to all the legislative and other necessary changes aimed at national unification and unity of spirit.

Ratification of the recognition of the unified national resistance movement and the abolition of observances which tend to divide the people, abolition of the practice of keeping dossiers and the return of political refugees are the basis of our goals. [applause]

Implementation of political equality and national reconciliation will be undertaken with a strict observance of the laws in all directions and without exceptions. We believe that in this sector we will have the unstinted support of the people as well as the support of the other parties and organizations of local self-government and the social organizations.

We will promote legislative measures for the financial support of political parties. Adoption of the simple representational system of election will be accompanied by abolition of the cross of preference [applause] so that the level of political struggle and political life may be elevated. Recognition of the right to vote for 18-year-olds will be established [applause] starting with the municipal elections scheduled for 1982. [applause] Emigrant merchant seamen and students abroad will be given the right to vote in parliamentary elections. [applause] Equality under the law will become a daily act together with the constitutional provisions on citizens' rights, regardless of political affiliations or religious beliefs.

The government will morally and materially strengthen justice with the purpose of making it a bastion of democracy, for the purpose of establishing its full independence and the effective fulfillment of its national mission. The necessary administrative improvements affecting the human potential and the specialized personnel will soon be undertaken to achieve the speedy application of justice without excessive cost to the citizen. At the same time we will start the cleansing and gradual reform of the laws. Immediate priority will be given to the reform of family law to achieve equality between the two sexes [applause], and civil marriage will be established in parallel and legally equal to church marriage. [applause] Abolition of the death sentence will be implemented immediately together with protection against torture. [applause] Special care will be given to the purging of the penal system and the establishment of human conditions of life. The government will take all necessary measures which will lead to further reconciliation between the people and the security forces [applause] and to protect them. At the same time the government will deal with the increased problems of the personnel of the security forces as affected by conditions of work, hours of work, and unacceptable social prohibitions, and it will guarantee trade union affiliation within the provisions of article 23 of the constitution. [applause]

The Church will be freed to follow its own road without any intervention by the state. The separation of church from state will concern the administration and not its ties with the nation and the people. [applause] Special care will be taken to protect the clergy and those who work for the Church.

One of the basic aims of the government is the early, responsible and decisive creation of the institutional framework that will lead to true decentralization. This decentralization will make possible the decisionmaking at various levels by the people themselves, their representatives and organizations. Thus, the provision of article 101 of the constitution is met. Decentralization will be based on the liberation of the creative possibilities of the local self-government institution, on the immediate strengthening of the role of first-degree cells of people's sovereignty, the municipalities and communes; on the institutionalization of second and third degree and on their gradual activation.

In the first phase, the nomarchs' role will be revised and they will become representatives of the government policy in the nomes. The primary role of the nomarchs will be to prepare the ground for the completion of decentralization and their future replacement by genuinely elected organs. The transfer of jurisdiction from the center to the region and from the nomarchies to the municipalities and the communes will be carried out by means of a corresponding transfer of sources, of cadres and of specialized technical structure.

The municipalities and communes will become worthy organs of decentralized democratic authority, with administrative independence and with the goal of economic self-sufficiency to solve all local affairs. One of the measures in this direction will be the enactment of real estate tax of purely local nature. Until the activation of the second and third degrees of self-government, the nomarchs will be assisted by decentralized and soundly organized services and by nomarchy councils with their representatives. In these councils the participation of local self-government will be decisive. This will be done through the central union and the local unions of municipalities and communes as well as of the social organizations. Decentralization will proceed along with the setting up of the organs of democratic planning.

The Ministry for Northern Greece will play an important role within the framework of the first phase of decentralization. Decentralization will serve as main weapon to convert public administration from a dynasty to a servant of the citizen and at the same time a lever for self-sufficient development. Beyond geographical decentralization, vertical internal decentralization will play a decisive role through the transfer of jurisdictions from the highest to the lowest level so that every employee may have an individual area of responsibility.

Bureaucracy will be combated and the functioning of public administration will be improved by simplifying the (?contents) of procedures and by eradicating the practice of mutual covering up, of confusion and of conflict of authority. Clarity, lucidity and publicity will be characteristics of decisions, and modern methods and means of machine accounting and organization will be introduced.

We will proceed with resoluteness with the eradication of partisanship and with the combating of favoritism and corruption. Democratization of public administration presupposes termination of useless dealings, as well as discrimination against employees depending on their political affiliations or social origin. Our basic goal is to elevate the employees to the role of public officers who will act in a responsible manner, who will be adequately compensated and will not be wronged. Meritocracy, character and efficiency will be the sole criteria for progress. Well-known unbecoming phenomena will be radically dealt with, such as the holding of many positions.

Finally, the elevation of the standard of public officials will be sought, through systematic training, as well as through accelerated training at universities.

Trade unionism in cities and villages constitutes a foundation of democracy and a lever for change that leads to social liberation. The participation of the working people in the making of the decisions that concern them will provide a fresh dimension for the country's trade union movement. There will be immediate promotion of the abolition of all the undemocratic and antilabor laws -- such as law 330 of 1976, of 643 and of all the machinery [applause] that concern intervention by the state and the employer and maintain trade union paternalism. There will be security of freedom of action, development of the mass, class and politicized trade unionism -- without dependence on or patronage from the state, the employers or the parties. Trade union activities will be safeguarded. There will be effective protection of the trade union cadres, and all those who have been persecuted for trade union reasons will be reinstated. Therefore, we are looking forward to a trade union which struggles, demands and conquers but also participates positively in the drive for development. A prerequisite for this is the facing of organizational splitting and the gaining of trade union cohesion of the working people.

We consider it necessary to give a concise but responsible picture of the economic situation which we have taken over from the New Democracy government. This is important so that one may clearly see the size of the problems that the country is facing at this moment.

Since 1974 the drachma has lost about 2/3 of its purchasing power. The current rate of inflation exceeds 25 percent, more than double the corresponding one of the EEC countries. Productive investments have not only not been increased but have showed a decrease during the 1975-80 period in stable prices. Investments in particular dropped from about 8 billion drachmas in 1975 to 6 billion in 1980. It is obvious that this undermines the development potential of the Greek economy and has now led us to a zero rate of increase in the national product.

The Greek economy has lost its vigour of growth, as a result of which it became impossible to modernize the country's equipment and readjust production in a period of critical readjustments on a worldwide scale. The deficit in the state budget -- ordinary and investment budgets -- has increased from 22.5 billion drachmas in 1974 to about 190 billion in 1981. That is, it increased over eightfold. The corresponding deficit of the public sector -- state budget, management of agricultural products and public enterprises -- has gone from 128 billion in 1974 to 350 billion drachmas in 1981. The structure of deficits was also due to a huge increase in tax evasion, which is estimated today to exceed 150 billion drachmas. These developments in the public sector were of an inflationary nature because actually no improvement was noted in this sector's productive contribution to the economy. At the same time, the quality of services rendered has become significantly worse. The deficit of the current exchange will reach from $932 million in 1976 to $2.3 billion in 1981 and, moreover, this will be under conditions of economic depression. In the same period both foreign debts and their amortization have doubled. This state of affairs, without being critical, demands careful handling. For this reason the government will follow a foreign exchange policy as well as an import-export policy which will keep the balance of payments deficit at tolerable levels.

The developments in economic affairs which I have just mentioned and the policy of unilateral austerity have led to the aggravation of the unequal distribution of income and wealth at the expense of the weaker classes. These piled-up economic problems and their social consequences are accompanied by the overcentralization of the state, by the ineffectiveness of public administration which, in certain cases, reaches the point of paralysis of the state machinery.

This sad picture is completed by an undemocratic educational system, a society which is an economically and culturally abandoned open country for inhuman living conditions in the city and a low-quality system of social services.

Our basic goal is self-susbtaining economic growth and social development of the country; utilization of all productive potentials in combination with the more just distribution of national income and wealth among the local groups of population and the province. We are pursuing the gradual transformation of the economy's structures so that the basic economic options be determined by the entire society. The strategic sectors of the economy should be under substantive social control, without overlooking the positive role of private initiative. The crisis of the capitalist system on a worldwide scale, with the constantly increasing unemployment and inflation, has intensified international antagonism and increased the rate of centralization and the monopolistic structure of many sectors, rendering the traditional means of economic policy ineffective. Our options are based on the implementation of democratic programming, on the reformation of the framework of public enterprise functioning, on appropriate incentives for the private sector, strengthening of the small and medium enterprises, restoration of overindebted companies and on a nationally beneficial policy toward foreign investments.

The government will proceed immediately with institutional changes toward creating a national machinery for democratic planning and, for this purpose, it has a draft bill ready which will it soon submit to the Chamber of Deputies for debate and ratification. This machinery secures the timely setting up of the development program as well as the systematic control of this program's implementation. Above all, however, this machinery will be safeguarding the people's resolute participation in the decisions on all levels and standards. This form of planning, in addition to higher productivity, is interwoven with decentralization and safeguards the pace of development and change which can be realized and assimilated by the people. We are radically against bureaucratic procedures of planning which express the will and decisions of an inaccessible central organ which isolated from the people and from their needs and visions.

The government will proceed immediately with the creation of the technical pyramid of planning -- that is, of the central organization of the branch and provincial organs -- by fully utilizing the country's scientific potential. This pyramid will be composed of special services. The machinery of planning will be gradually completed with organs of popular representation on various levels. These organs will be the basic development committees at the level of local self-government. Their formation will be combined with the forthcoming municipal and communal elections. These bodies will be elected organs and, in an initial phase, will deal with local problems while at the same time they will create the prerequisites for the expression of the people's views on general issues of the development policy.

The government will proceed immediately with the preparation of a 5-year development plan for 1983-87 which will be submitted to and debated by the Chamber of Deputies before the end of next year. Of course it will be preceded by the Chamber of Deputies' discussion of the preliminaries of this program. Until the 5-year plan is put into effect, economic policy will move within the framework of a short-term economic plan having for its goals the control of inflation, recovery of productive activities and redistribution of income. This program aims at restoring the productive potential in the industrial, artisan and agricultural fields, which today are ravaged by a protracted crisis and (?function) under conditions of uncertainty.

In the 1982 investments program, priority will be given to investments of high productivity and to projects of a social nature. Within the framework of democratic planning, the plan for decentralization of public investments begins as of 1982. We will proceed with the immediate transfer to the nomarchies, municipalities and communes of the funds for nomarchy and local programs.

On a central level remains the responsibility for public investments of a national and provincial nature. Also a reappraisal will be made of all current projects in order to determine the usefulness of continuing them. The procedure for decentralization and reappraisal of projects has already started.

The government's revenue policy: The economic policy we will follow will restrain inflationary pressures. Regardless of the degree of inflation, however, we believe it is necessary to adopt measures to protect the income of working people and pensioners. The basic measures are two: automatic cost-of-living adjustment of emoluments and annual cost-of-living adjustment of the tax scale. The system of automatic cost-of-living adjustment, which we will implement as of 1 January 1982, is based on the following principles: A) Restoration of the purchasing power which was lost. Within this framework, as of 1 January a raise will be paid which will correspond to the difference between the cost-of-living increase and the raises given during 1981. B) Readjustment will be made after every 4-month period. C) Adjustment will be full for emoluments up to a level of tolerable living; for emoluments over this limit, the readjustment will be rated at lower levels. D) Adjustment will be made on the basis of the consumer price index until the drawing up of a new index of common acceptance by the working people, employers and the public. For this purpose, a special committee, including representatives of the working people, will be formed.

For fuller protection from inflation the government intends to implement the annual cost-of-living adjustment to the income scale with parallel reform of rates for a more even distribution of tax burdens. Other policy measures for a more even distribution of income and taxation burdens are: Increase in the minimum untaxable amount, increase in tax exemptions because of family burdens, increase in family allowances, tax exemption for those who live in their own homes and deduction of rental from taxable income up to a certain limit, abolition of tax on pensions up to a certain limit in conjunction with total income and gradual adjustment of minimum rates for pension so that all pensioners reach a socially acceptable standard of living.

Concerning the farmers, the government will proceed with the moral reform of the pension status so that the farmers gradually will receive the same pension protection as all other working people. For this purpose, OGA [Farm Insurance Organization] will become a social insurance organization exclusively.

At the same time, in 1982 the government will proceed with: A) Adequate and equal pensions for the woman farmer. This means [prolonged applause] -- this means that the married woman farmer will receive a pension equal to that of her husband and not half, as allotted her today. B) In addition to the above arrangement, a raise of 1,000 drachmas will be paid to all those eligible. Thus the married woman farmer will receive 4,000 drachmas per month instead of the current 1,500 drachmas [applause], an increase of 166 percent. A farmer couple will receive 8,000 drachmas instead of 4,500 -- a 76-percent increase. [prolonged applause] In addition to these increases, a leave allowance will be granted, as with the other pensioners, and expansion of free medical treatment for all farmers without exception. [applause]

Finally the basic direction of our revenue policy will be the participation of working people in the increase in the national product in such a manner that we will achieve, at the same time, the redistribution of income in favor of the low-income classes.

Price policy: The redistribution of income and effective combating of inflation will also be based on resolute price control. For this purpose we will promote substantive cost control covering production and all areas of marketing.

This will be gradually implemented in enterprises which are dominant on the market and in product categories of items for basic consumption or raw and semi-finished material for domestic manufacture. No administrative measures will be implemented that can lead to imbalances and disturbances in smooth supply of the market. However, the government will not tolerate profiteering increases which undermine the economic and social programs. At the same time, an antimonopoly policy will be followed and we will promote combating any unaccountability by middlemen, particularly in the transport of agricultural products, through the development of the cooperative movement. [applause]

Credit and monetary policy: The government's primary concern will be the complete reform of credit policy to put an end to the massive drain of the people's savings by profiteering investments, which feeds inflation and deprives production of necessary resources. For this purpose an effective policy of credit control will be implemented for the productive use of bank credits. Within this framework the treatment of small and medium-size businesses will be special. In order to cleanse the credits system, the monetary committee will be abolished and the regulating and auditing role of the Bank of Greece will be restored. Money, credit and exchange policies with the public finance program will be harmonized. Our government does not accept the formulas of monetarism, which have had dramatic consequences wherever they have been applied. However, the increase in the offer of money will be in relation to both the increase of production and productivity and the improvement of the structure of economy.

Public finance policy: The government's target is to cleanse public finances, which means correct management of public funds and an increase in revenues to the level necessary for the program's implementation in combination with the more even distribution of taxation burdens.

Revenues: The increase of revenues primarily will be based on the people's own desire to turn the change into reality. Installing consciousness of taxation in citizens so they declare their true income presupposes a socially just treatment of all citizens, implementation of laws in all directions and correct distribution of expenditures in satisfying basic demands of the people.

The just restructuring of the tax system and the aforementioned exemptions presuppose, of course, replenishing losses in tax revenues -- a replenishment that should fall within the policy of curbing inflation. We will start revising procedures and methods of control to enable detection of tax evasion. After all, everyone should realize that tax evasion is an offense against society and should be severely punished. It is inadmissible for citizens with high incomes not to pay their share of taxes. [applause] Tax evasion will be combated with drastic measures which will be announced soon. At the same time, we will proceed with the radical reform of the tax system, which would permit a reduction of bureaucratic formalities, an increase in the yield of taxes and a change in the ratio of direct and indirect taxes.

Expenditures: There are expenditures whose expediency is questionable, their productivity doubtful and probably nonexistent. These expenditures will be curtailed. All expenditures not concerning salaries, wages and pensions will be under strict control. Concerning the distribution of expenditures, first priority is given to (?defense), education, health and social welfare.

Public corporations: The present public corporations are functioning against the economy. They offer poor-quality services and present high deficits which feed inflation. The government will proceed with radical changes in the structure and functioning of public corporations. These changes presuppose a flexible administrative machinery which should follow businesslike criteria of efficiency. A gradual adjustment will be made in prices for services by public corporations and organizations with the aim of the earliest possible reduction in their deficits. Any government intervention in the formulation of a price policy, adjusted to its social and economic aims, will be accompanied by reimbursement of the corresponding charges -- a public financial reimbursement. Effective control will be implemented both as a precautionary measure -- through linking corporations with national planning -- and as a restraining measure on the basis of [words indistinct] results. The establishment of democratic management -- the participation of working people in the administration, planning and operation -- will contribute decisively to increased efficiency, cleansing of public corporations and to reduction in their operation costs.

Policy of socialization: The government's policy of socialization is a system of social control in certain basic, key sectors. This policy guarantees that the economy's functioning serves the broader social interests and, at the same time, improves the efficient utilization of resources. At the same time, this policy is of an antimonopoly and antidependency nature. Not only does it (?intensify) private initiative but strengthens it by promoting the interests of corporations -- particularly of the small and medium businesses, which are being undermined by the unaccountability of the big monopolistic capital. This social control will be accomplished either through complete redemption in accordance with constitutional stipulations or through acquiring the majority of shares. Within the framework of this policy, we will proceed with the immediate adoption of measures for the effective social control and the development orientation of the banking system. The small Greek banks as well as foreign banks will be under strict control so that they cannot exert a negative effect through their size and functioning on the credit, monetary and exchange policies of the country.

The insurance companies, which are now under state control, will be amalgamated into a unified insurance organization which will be placed under strict social control in order to reduce their cost and improve the quality of their services. The anticipated socializations include: energy corporations, public utilities, mass transportation and communications, exploitation by big corporations of mineral wealth, big shipyards, the steel, cement and fertilizer industries, the pharmaceutical industry and all those units which directly concern national defense. Socialization of the sectors which are already nationalized today or are under the control -- such as banks, public utilities, corporations, transportation, communications and energy -- means that the criteria in their targets, organization, operation and administration will be to serve the public as a whole and not the big private interests, as is the case today. [applause]

The element that will contribute decisively to realizing the development targets is the working people's participation and the representation of local self-government and social organizations in the administration of the socialized enterprises. The process of socialization will proceed after a careful study of the special conditions in every case. Special committees will be established and will assess property elements and compensations. Following consultations with professional organizations and the enterprises concerned, the capital of parent and subsidiary companies as well as the (?role) of those working in them will be determined. The matter of compensation will be dealt with in accordance with the constitutional provisions. In certain cases the government may follow the alternate solution of converting the bank loans into company shares when these are significantly higher than the capital itself.

Concerning private initiative, not only does the government not intend to discourage it but, on the contrary, the government will strengthen private initiative and guide it toward serving the national development policy. For this purpose we will use the credits and a new policy which provides for the revision of incentives and every sort of exemption and grants. Whatever facilities are maintained or introduced will be granted after strict appraisal and supervision of their correct utilization. Until the new incentives are formulated, the functioning of the present incentives will continue, but with substantive control over every case and full appraisal of the proposed investments. The government attaches particular significance to the adoption of measures for the mobilization of the enormous productive potential of the small and medium enterprises. These enterprises will constitute a basic lever in promoting the program for regional development of the country in order that the productive forces can be utilized, youth can find work in the country and the countryside may be revived.

The development of the small and medium enterprises will serve the goals of the more general industrial and economic policy and will give a new dimension and revival to business activity by utilizing new forms of organization and cooperation from specialized credit organizations. A basic lever for the development of small and medium enterprises will be their financing on favorable terms without necessarily demanding real guarantees. The covering of loans will be secured through the establishment of a special insurance organization. Moreover there will be a series of measures concerning taxation, vocational training, exports activity, promotion of (?partnership) organization and technological support for the small and medium-size enterprises.

Foreign investment: Foreign investments are welcomed so long as they contribute to the country's development and concern really productive units with advanced technology. Their financial management should be clear and national control safeguarded. We will also pursue [word indistinct] mixed investments in cooperation with Greek investors or with credit organizations which will secure reciprocity in the expected benefits and will fall within the country's development plan.

Overindebted enterprises: The government will put an end to the unacceptable status of the overindebted enterprises, which is the result of the credit unaccountability in force until today. The procedures to be followed in these cases provide for: investigation of viability on the basis of cost structure, productive potential, market prospects, number of employed people regardless of the financing structure of enterprises assets, reorganization and improvement of productivity and possible reorientation of production for all those which will prove viable. These enterprises, and I stress this, must operate with strictly privately financed criteria, partial or total conversion into shares of bank loan capital wherever this may be deemed necessary.

Other forms of cleaning up the overindebted enterprises will also be considered which may be suggested by those concerned themselves, particularly concerning the increase in their own capital. The present partners will be called upon to play their role in the management of enterprises. An advisory committee has already been formed from the overindebted enterprises and it will soon submit proposals to the government concerning the procedures and institutional arrangements which should be made. It is noted that the government has already adopted measures for the banks to handle immediately the urgent cases which are threatened with the immediate suspension of work.

The fundamental principle of our policy will be the balanced development, to the extent possible, of the agricultural sector along with the other sectors of Greek economy. We will attempt to ensure that the Greek people can receive basic commodities through domestic sources with a parallel reduction in our dependency on foreign sources for the supply of basic provisions necessary to the economy.

The basic directions of our agricultural policy will be: The farmers will participate substantively in making decisions; rational development and correct mechanization of agricultural economy; reduction of inequalities within the agricultural sector itself as well as the elevation of the economic, social and cultural standards of Greek farmers. A self-supporting agriculture presupposes a satisfactory and just income for the farmer. We will accomplish this by securing for the farmer prices that will cover production costs and will also offer a reasonable profit. This will be done through a combination of subsidies and income reinforcements, control of supplies and provisions from cooperative organizations and the transportation of agricultural products by the cooperative organizations, the increasing of the productivity of the agricultural sector, the reduction of costs and the creation of opportunities for parallel occupation with other professions in the provinces. There will also be a gradual improvement in the extent and terms of loans to farmers from the agricultural bank. During the first 4-month period there will also be a certain reduction in the price charged for electric power to agricultural concerns.

The agricultural sector will enjoy privileged treatment in the distribution of public investments for the reorganization of its structure and increase of its productivity. Farmers will be granted aid to purchase equipment, fertilizers, chemicals and animal feed while at the same time they will be assisted by special agriculturists, veterinary doctors and foresters. In the disposition of agricultural products we will follow a policy that will utilize and create opportunities with all countries of the world. The government will effect a final settlement of the debts burdening certain problem areas as well as certain production branches which it is essential to the nation that they develop. In cooperation with the farmers collective organizations, measures will be adopted to substantively prevent to the extent possible losses in agricultural production while at the same time there will be a progressive extension of passive [pathitiki] insurance to cover emergencies and unforeseen damage. This insurance will also cover all kinds of animal and agricultural capital. This entire sector of insurance will be transferred to a special organization in the Ministry of Agriculture. In this way, OGA will be occupied exclusively and effectively with the social insurance of farmers. The public [words indistinct] and farms which are offered for agricultural exploitation will be socialized and will be given to people who do not own land within the framework of [words indistinct].

The primary means of realizing our agricultural policy will be the voluntary, productive and agrarian-industrial cooperatives. [applause] With them the control of the entire spectrum of the agricultural economy will pass into the hands of farmers, who will maintain the sovereignty of their land. A new law will safeguard democratization in the reorganization and activities of the cooperative organizations. The farmers associations will be recognized through legislation as substantive organizations of agricultural unionism. [applause] Our basic aim is to place industrial activity within an aggregate planning which will have as aims balanced regional development, technological modernization, strengthening of viable units, creation of new productive units of particularly advanced technology and the harmonious classification of units in the physical, housing and cultural environment. The guidelines and criteria for industrial policy which should be followed by the public and private sectors are the vertical increase of industrial production, the formation of complexes of industrial units which will supplement each other, the increase of productivity and the creation of new employment opportunities. The institution of program agreements between public development organizations and the financed enterprises will be in force according to branches of industry with the aim of realizing specific goals of our development plan.

The energy policy will be based on the utilization of local energy potential, the application of modern technical methods and on the variety of energy sources. We will seek to avoid intensified exploitation of the energy sources, to protect natural resources and the environment and to utilize mild [ipies] and renewable forms of energy. At the same time, we will intensify the exploration and exploitation of Greek oil and the utilization of international cooperation while safeguarding our national independence.

In the field of energy there are big possibilities for cooperation with the Arab countries. At the same time, we will promote the establishment of a new institutional framework that will substantively safeguard our mineral wealth as national property. The exploitation of this wealth will be carried out on the basis of the principle that nonrenewable resources cannot serve the narrow profiteering purposes of private interests. Our target is to bridge the present technological gap which separates us from the developed countries in order to reduce our technological dependency abroad.

In research, priority will be given to national defense, energy and utilization of mineral wealth as well as agricultural and industrial development. At the same time, research in economic and social sciences will also be strengthened. In realizing this plan, it is essential that we formulate a new institutional framework which will utilize all scientific and social organizations and create conditions which will allow the repatriation of Greek scientists in the diaspora. Emphasis will be given to the establishment of programs for postgraduate studies at higher educational institutions, to the creation of a national information network for the detailed registering of national resources and the encouragement of innovations throughout the production procedures. We will proceed with the establishment of a ministry for research and technology while, gradually, we will increase the percentage of our gross national product allotted for research.

On the basis of the national town planning program, we will select projects that contribute to the utilization of the country's natural wealth, to the balanced development of the provinces and to the securing of a satisfactory level of social machinery. Showoff projects have no place in our program. Immediate priority will be given to projects that help in restricting the consequences from acts of God. At the same time, we are planning the coordination and united activity by various services both for giving immediate help and the restoration of those hurt from acts of God. The participation of self-government organizations will be substantive in drafting and implementing regional and local programs for public works; this participation will reduce the construction time and also restrict costs. We will immediately proceed with the cleansing of the study-supervision-construction-materials circuit in public and private projects in close cooperation with the Technical Chamber of Greece and the other scientific and social organizations.

The development of transportation, communications and telecommunications constitutes a basic prerequisite in realizing the goals of regional development and administrative decentralization. First priority will be given to the adoption of measures aimed at the gradual solution of the traffic problem and to the development and improvement of the quality of the mass transportation system. The state will render resolute support to the Merchant Marine in strengthening its competitiveness and in effectively supporting it in international organizations. Our efforts will be to establish a genuine bond between Greek merchant ships and the country's economy. Particular care will be given to the sector of training and social protection of seamen. An effective machinery will be established that will secure priority to the employment of Greek crews. [applause] In order to attract projects into the country, we will give emphasis to the shipbuilding and repair industry, we will also pursue its correct regional distribution and the promotion of a cooperative organization.

Concerning tourism, the development of this branch must be realized within the framework of a national and regional program with the reinforced role of local self-government in planning and realizing a tourism policy. All essential measures will be adopted so that all foreign exchange generated by tourism will benefit our country. We will pursue the development of tourist services in training and advertising. Incentives will be given for small units, harmonically spread in the natural and cultural environment, which will be distributed equally according to area planning. The construction of touristic "monsters" will be discouraged. The selling of Greek land to foreign concerns will stop. [applause]

The new institutional framework that will govern environmental, town and regional planning gives a leading role to local self-government and consolidates the people's participation. Our goal and guidelines stress the ecological, demographic and productive reconstruction and development of the country's regions. Our land policy is based on the establishment of a unified national land registry.

Housing will be viewed as a social benefit, the primary concern being to free it from the circuit of profiteering, to strengthen the organizations of housing development and to create programs for social homes and the backing of privately-built housing.

We will implement a long-term policy to reverse the destructive course and to lay strong foundations for the protection of the environment. There will be greater concern for prevention than for remedies. We aim at harmonious development, at avoiding waste of natural resources and at recycling raw materials. Immediate measures will be taken to reduce pollution from industrial production and vehicles. Particularly in connection with the smog and other serious problems, we will not hesitate to take -- without wavering -- any measures that are considered necessary.

Concerning education, the government considers this a national cause. Education is not merely a beneficial investment; it is an end in itself for man. Therefore it is a benefit that the state wishes to offer to all regardless of sacrifice. Education is a cause for all the people, and care for education is a state affair. Therefore expenditure for education has absolute priority. With this spirit, the increase in the allotment to education from the gross national product and the state budget will be continuous so that free education for all the people may become a reality.

1. To change the contents and directives of education and studies. Faith in human values, in man himself, respect for and utilization of tradition will govern the whole of education. The contents of studies will be linked with the productive and social process and will be adjusted to the country's needs. There will be a change in study programs and textbooks, and the dhimotiki language will be consolidated at all levels of education.

2. To take appropriate measures to abolish barriers which exist today in education so that every male and female who wants to and can study at any level of education will not encounter obstacles. We have already taken the first step in this direction; we abolished the entrance examinations from the gymnasium to the lyceum. [applause] With the abolition of university entrance examinations as well, fair ways of evaluation will be introduced and will include unlimited possibilities for effort by all those who want to carry on with their studies, from education and production to the universities. The introduction of vocational guidance will contribute in this direction.

3. To secure conditions of equality in connection with education opportunities for everyone who labors for knowledge. Thus our goal is to eradicate paraeducation and abolish private education and privileged schools by taking measures that aim at their harmonious integration in the national public system of education, with safeguards for the rights of working people. Special measures and scholarships will assist working school children and students.

4. To create equally high quality education with a sound material-technical infrastructure in every corner of our country. For this purpose, priority will be given to expenditures for border, island, mountainous and semimountainous areas as well as to the low-income areas of urban centers. Education functionaries will be assisted in every way so that they will be fully devoted to their functions. The government will immediately promote the approval of a legislative framework for universities. This framework will institutionalize radical changes for the democratization and modernization of university education as well. This bill will also include the proposals of organizations on university studies. Special emphasis will be given to the field of postgraduate studies that do not exist today; such studies will be institutionalized at every university. A new institution will be introduced to coordinate contents of studies, research programs and the procedure for the selection and evaluation of teaching personnel on a national level. The institution of continuing education and cultural training of our people will be decisively strengthened. There will be proper utilization of educational television through radical reformation; local self-government in the field of free, open universities will be assisted. The reformation and elevation of technical and vocational training constitutes a prerequisite for the total, qualitative elevation of education and for meeting the needs of the productive process. In order to achieve this goal, a number of measures and incentives will be enacted. Along with this, closed compartments among the various levels of education will be abolished. The contribution of education organizations to the social organizations for the shaping of studies will be decisive, while the social controls that will be introduced will be continuous.

The government knows that the revival of education is a giant task which requires continuous effort and participation by both the state and by educators, organizations and the people.

In the field of health, the government will take a series of measures which will gradually lead, according to plan, to creation of the national health organization. [applause] This organization will characteristically be decentralized and will render services with the participation of responsible and scientific organs in the planning of the measures for the protection and improvement of the Greek people's health. The first measures for implementation of this goal include the reorganization and the operation of social services.

In the field of out-patient hospital treatment, special emphasis will be attached to the creation of an organization and effective network of health and social welfare centers which will cover all of Greece. In the field of hospital treatment, measures will be taken for the qualitative elevation of treatment and the effective functioning of hospitals in Athens and the countryside. The participation of working people and of local self-government in the administrative councils of hospitals will be settled through legislation. Measures will also be taken that will lead to the effective handling of emergency cases in urban centers and agrarian areas.

Clean-up measures will be taken in connection with medicine which will affect all phases. For this purpose, an organization will be established to import raw materials that will ensure a high quality of medicine and proper costs. Along with this, procedures for establishment of a national pharmaceutical industry will be put into effect immediately. There will be strict control of the quality and quantity of production. A national prescription book will be introduced. This, along with a sound information campaign, will combat the great number of medicines used.

In the field of social welfare, special emphasis will be attached to protection of sensitive groups. Measures will be taken for the social protection of the family, motherhood and the child, as well as for increasing the birth rate. Emphasis and priority will be given to vocational training and the social resettlement of handicapped people so that they will enjoy a self-sufficient and dignified life.

The government, aware of the weaknesses and problems in the system of social insurance, will carefully and gradually proceed with the necessary measures to deal with them in the best possible way. The minimum pension paid by the Greek craftsmen's and tradesmen's insurance fund, the social insurance foundation and by other insurance organizations will be increased, the goal being that these pensions should be equal to 80 percent of wages received by unskilled workers. Objective prerequisites will be secured to expand social insurance foundation coverage to the whole country.

The question of pension payments to indigent elderly people will be settled by the first bills to be prepared. The reserve funds of insurance organizations will be released so that they may generate interest; the establishment of an organization for their proper utilization will be considered.

There will be an expansion of successive insurance with the state and OGA. Military service will be counted in the calculation of pensions. Finally, an independent ministry of social insurance will be established to respond to the task of effective insurance coverage for all the people.

The combatting of unemployment, which is particularly hurting youths, is a basic element for our economic and social policy. For this purpose, one of the basic criteria for the evaluation of investments will be the creation of new jobs. Along with this, there will be a reorganization of the labor force employment organization and of the labor exchanges; furthermore, medium- and long-range planning will be implemented.

The problems of safety and health conditions at work sites and the prevention of labor accidents will be handled through special legislative and administrative measures which will provide for the participation of the working people in the pertinent controls.

The government will proceed with the consolidation, the gradual expansion for all the working people -- of the public and the private fields -- of a 5-day work week, a 40-hour week and annual leave of 4 weeks. [applause] Special measures will be enacted for working students, for seasonal workers, for working mothers and for those employed in heavy and unhealthy trades.

The policy of change will be based on all Greeks, inside and outside Greece. The government will proceed with the establishment of a repatriation organization which, in cooperation with the communities of immigrants and the repatriated people, will go ahead with the planning and implementation of the policy on immigrants. Our policy will aim directly at solving the immigrants' problems at the places where they are employed, on the basis of bilateral agreements, but mainly at their return and harmonious integration into our country.

Incentives will be introduced for productive investments by immigrants. We will also attempt to solve such problems as employment, social insurance, adjustment and education of the immigrants' children and their housing. Along with this, the government will strengthen ties with Greeks living abroad and will properly utilize their great possibilities both for the sake of national issues and for the prosperity of the country.

The realization of the equality of two sexes at all levels of political, social, economic, family and cultural life of the country is an advance goal of the government. Equality will be one of the basic tenets of the fresh contents of education. Measures will be taken for training families in issues of structure and operation. Our goal is equal treatment of and compensation to men and women at work sites, as well as the abolition of discrimination of professions for men and women.

Within the framework of the government's social policy there will be special care for the social protection of women in the field of welfare for motherhood, bringing up children, family planning and protection against abuse. The broader and substantive participation of women in the decisionmaking centers is an indispensable prerequisite for change. Thus a special office will be established to check on the proper implementation of the principle of equality. [applause]

The desires of the new generation will be handled through a number of measures, such as a reduction in military service without reducing the readiness of the armed forces; a special policy for the employment of youths in new posts; securing employment and housing for young couples; combating narcotics and the causes of juvenile deliquency and making efforts to stop the departure of young students for studies abroad. Finally, as we have already announced, we shall proceed with the establishment of a ministry for the new generation.

The government considers athletics as a basic factor in education, health and cultural elevation of the Greek people and as means of fraternization among peoples. The government will seek full reformation of the structure of Greek athletics so that mass athletics will be promoted without disregarding the importance of competitive athletics. Special assistance will be given to athletics for women and the countryside, as well as care for the development of amateur clubs. A significant role will be entrusted to local self-government by the general secretariat of athletics with parallel subsidies for necessary credits.

The primary issue for people who are struggling for their national independence is their reaction to their cultural organizations and to the broadest cultural development -- a development based on dialogue, on many voices and on freedom of expression and creation. The respect and spreading of creators' contributions, the freeing of natural popular creations and opening cultural education will dominate our efforts. Based on our own roots, we will promote the revival of the people's memory. We will enrich tradition by assimilating whatever is creative that recent cultural currents offer. The people are not only receivers but also agents of recent cultural creations. The government's intention is that books, art, music and the theater should reach every corner of the Greek countryside.

Deputies, the government's policy statement that I have had the honor of outlining to you is basically the statement that the people approved with their votes on 18 October. [applause] For our part, we are determined to honor our contract with the people. [applause] Our faith is unshakable that the people, who have so much enthusiasm and love for the government and who see its promises turned into deeds, will support and participate in the course of change. Thus the vision and the hopes of so, so many generations for a Greece which will be nationally proud and socially fair will be realized. Dear colleagues, we believe the dialogue and criticism which will follow will again justify the determinitive role of the representatives of the nation in the functioning of democratic institutions. [applause] With a sense of responsibility as well as of optimism at carrying out our work, we ask for a vote of confidence from the representatives of the nation. [applause]

RALLIS REPLIES TO PAPANDREOU POLICY STATEMENT

NC250858 Athens NEWS in English 24 Nov 81 pp 1, 12

[Text] Replying to the new government's policy statement, as enunciated by Prime Minister Papandreou Sunday night, opposition leader Rallis yesterday said the statement contained many promises, some of them "beneficial, if carried through, and others injurious." However, Rallis charged, many of the promises which would be beneficial are already being violated, as for example the one about meritocracy in public service, which is being sacrificed on the altar of partisanship with wholesale dismissals of public officials and their replacement by party faithful without any regard for the merits of the appointments.

The partisan position-grabbing, Mr Rallis charged, has even reached as far as the transportation system and the hospitals, which have been directed by the public services minister not to hire without his authorization even though the minister is not empowered by law to get involved in hospital hiring.

All public employees live in fear, Mr Rallis said, and two employees begged New Democracy deputies who wanted certain information not to use their names.

Referring to government charges that the previous government had monopolized the media, Mr Rallis said it was untrue and that the new government was already emasculating opposition announcements.

The Greco-Turkish dialogue regarding the Aegean should be continued, the former prime minister said, and all the talk about a campaign to inform international public opinion on the problem of Cyprus was a sham, in that his government had been carrying on such a campaign for years. Rallis strongly defended NATO from the new government's charges that it does not guarantee our eastern frontiers by saying that the alliance predated our entry and that for NATO to undertake such a guarantee, unanimity would be required -- unanimity which could not reasonably be expected either from the Scandinavians or the Turks. Our withdrawal from NATO, he said, will benefit nobody but the Turks.

Calling the American bases essential to our national defense, Mr Rallis said the terms mentioned in the Papandreou state of the nation message were essentially the same terms which had been propounded by his government in the protracted Greek-U.S. negotiations. As for the nuclear weapons in Greece, they were "antiquated," Mr Rallis said, and they could never be used without the consent of the Greek Government.

"When the Greek economy was in a bad shape, you Mr Papandreou, were not opposed to our joining," the former prime minister said, "but now you talk about bad repercussions from our entry." What bad repercussions? We have already realized countless benefits Mr Rallis contended, adding that the new government's foreign policy lacked integrity. "They don't know what they'll do tomorrow and they don't remember what they did yesterday."

Concluding his remarks, Mr Rallis described the government's announced intention to change the electoral law to simple majority, instead of the existing reinforced majority system, as a bad idea, in that the present system prevents undue fragmentation of political forces.

Advancing to the podium following Mr Rallis' remarks, Prime Minister Papandreou said that as regards the charges of partisanship, "I shall say only that...two or three days before the election...the New Democracy government was concluding important agreements committing our country for years." The media were transmitting opposition views faithfully, Mr Papandreou said, "and if, New Democracy leader, there is an instance in which any part of your speech is left out, I beg you to call me on the phone."

He simply could not remember how many trips he had taken in the past, Mr Papandreou said, without any TV coverage. The opposition leader would be kept fully briefed on all matters any time he so requests, Mr Papandreou said.

KKE LEADER SPEAKS AT GOVERNMENT POLICY DEBATE

[Text] The Chamber of Deputies has been in plenary session since 1110 today, continuing the debate on the government's policy statement. The debate will be concluded by midnight, when the vote of confidence in the government will be taken.

Today's morning meeting opened with KKE Secretary General Florakis as the first speaker. Among other things, Florakis stressed that the winner in the October elections was the democratic forces which, in one way or another, were proclaiming the change. Mr Florakis said: For the first time in many years the rightwing has been removed from the government.

Mr Florakis continued: The KKE will judge the government's policy statement from the viewpoint of change, which as our party understands it is needed by the country. The so-called system of private initiative, he went on, has historically proven unable to give solutions to the problems of the people and the country. It already appears clearly as an objective need that the country's true development and progress should be placed on a radically new basis: an antimonopolistic and anti-imperialist basis which will open the road to socialism.

The KKE secretary general said that on this great issue the government has basically confined itself to declarations which, in addition to everything else, show a lack of specific means and methods for implementing.

Concerning the economic field, Mr Florakis expressed reservations on basic points of the government's economic policy which, as he put it, do not stem from bad faith from inefficiencies, obscurities and gaps in the government policy itself. He noted that the adjustment of salaries and wages is insufficient. He also said that the nationalization proposed by the government should have an antimonopolistic and antidependency character, adding that the nationalization of foreign monopolies is essential. Mr Florakis said: The KKE places itself in favor of economic cleansing, democratic reformation and expansion of the state sector of the economy. He also asked the question what will happen with the scandalous agreements signed by the dictatorship, pointing out that PASOK's demand was their abrogation.

Mr Florakis added that he was expecting a revision of the scandalous institutional status which actually exempts shipowners from their tax obligations.

On the Common Market, Mr Florakis said that the agreement and the EEC's status in general will be an obstacle in the course of change and in implementing a policy of independent development to the benefit of the people. He said: We believe it is necessary to adopt measures to reject the consequences of our integration. In the agricultural field, he asked for securing markets for agricultural products regardless of the strings imposed by the EEC. Concerning the industrial field, Mr Florakis requested that measures be adopted to confront the competition from the EEC products and that, in all sectors in general, the government proceed with signing bilateral or multilateral interstate agreements, regardless of the committments imposed by the EEC, with the aim of restructuring the country's international economic relations on the basis of equality and mutual interest.

Concerning the profits of industrialists, Mr Florakis said the time has come for big capital to pay a part of the excess profits they have been pocketing all these years with the assistance of the rightwing governments. Because, if this is not done and there is no limit to the profits of monopolies and a consistent antimonopolistic policy, then we cannot talk about justifying the people's demands. This, he said, also answers the question of where can we find resources for the implementation of a pro-people policy. He went on: If the government moves courageously -- with the support of the working people -- in the right direction, it will not have a problem of resources.

The KKE secretary general described as positive many of the government's promises relative to the questions of democratization, such as the establishment of trade unionist activity in the security corps. He also asked for meaningful protection of trade unionist activity within the spheres of work, for legislation providing severe sanctions on employers who prevent such activity, and for securing genuine elections within the trade unionism sphere. He also said that there should be corresponding prerequisites in the representation of the farmers. Mr Florakis affirmed that recognition of the national resistance, abolition of the holidays of hatred, and the repatriation of political refugees are correct steps.

The speaker then said that the independent and multidimensional foreign policy and change are incompatible. He demanded the immediate denunciation of the Rogers agreement and Greece's immediate withdrawal from the military wing of NATO, so that we may implement an anti-imperialist, peace-loving policy and set a time schedule for the removal of the U.S. bases. Mr Florakis said that this time schedule should be fixed and short. He said that he is in agreement with the removal of nuclear weapons and the Balkan nuclear-free zone and proposed that Greece, along with all the peace-loving forces, undertake an initiative aimed at preventing Cold War Plans.

In conclusion, Mr Florakis said that the KKE will judge the government's policy not on the basis of some juxtaposition of positive or negative factors, but on whether this policy as a whole expressed the meaning of the substantive change needed by the country. From this point of view, he said the KKE believes the policy statement lags behind on critical issues of the change and that there are deficiencies and ambiguities. The impression is being given that the substantive goals of the change are being postponed indefinitely. Specifically, these are goals connected with ridding our country of foreign dependency. We will not vote against the government, he said, but we cannot consequently give a postive vote either.

MINISTER OZAL RETURNS FROM VISIT TO LIBYA, UAE

[Text] Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has been away for over a week. He visited Libya, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, where he held various contacts. Ozal returned to Ankara today and made the following statement at Esenboga airport:

[Begin recording] As you know, we went to Libya to attend the meetings of the joint economic committee. Naturally, we also held other meetings in addition to these meetings held annually. We review various issues because there are great developments in our relations. Meanwhile, there have been false commentaries in the press concerning Libya's payments. I would like to state immediately that these commentaries are not true. Furthermore, our relations are very good. New fields are opening up to Turkish contractors -- especially in the infrastructure and industrial projects. Until now, the emphasis had been on housing projects. As you know, according to our estimates the projects our contractors have already started or are about to start in Libya exceed $6 billion. There are 102 firms and over 80,000 Turkish workers in Libya. We expect our exports to Libya to exceed $400 million this year. We purchased 2 million tons of oil from Libya last year. We later purchased an additional 250,000 tons. We have agreed to get some 2.5 million tons in the coming year. However, we may possibly purchase more.

This was our first visit to the United Arab Emirates [UAE]. In other words, these are the first contacts, the first high-level contacts. I would like to state now that we were very well received both in Libya and the UAE. We are highly regarded in these countries. We were shown more attention than we expected in the UAE. We met with many officials including high level officials and ministers. Our trade with the UAE is not very significant but the trade volume can greatly be expanded. This is the conclusion we reached. Secondly, more work can be undertaken by Turkish contractors in that region. These issues were discussed. We mainly discussed joint projects. There is an Abu Dhabi fund which is similar to the Kuwait fund. Only the Petrochemical Corporation [PETKIM] received a loan from that fund last year.

We requested that interest be shown in some of our highway and irrigation projects. We also discussed the issue of Abu Dhabi investment authority's participation in some joint projects. I would like to immediately add that we cannot expect immediate results from these. However, I believe that -- as has been the case in Kuwait -- relations will gradually increase and, as a result of these relations, various projects may be financed and joint projects may be undertaken as has been the case between Kuwait and Turkey. I believe that an immediate tangible result will be reached in interbank relations. Turkey has obtained a short-term bank loan to purchase oil. [end recording]

NC251123 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 19 Nov 81 p 5

[Excerpts] Tripoli (AKAJANS) -- State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal, who has come to Libya to attend the seventh session of the Turkish-Libyan joint commission conference, has been received by Libyan Head of State al-Qadhdhafi. Ozal is reported to have given the Libyan authorities a new package of proposals.

According to information received, the following is a summary of the proposals included in the package:

1. To secure the participation of other Arab countries in the $100 million holding company in which the Turkish-Libyan joint agricultural and maritime company is a partner.
2. To expedite and expand the activities of the firm engaged in the promotion of the joint Turkish-Libyan planning, engineering and advisory services.

3. To establish direct relations between the Turkish and Libyan banks without any mediators, and to see that the Turkish-Arab Bank creates more useful fields of activity.
4. The Libyan purchasing delegations to attach more importance to industrial, exporting and trading firms.
5. Due consideration to be given to the Turkish enterprises in the construction of the Bergen-Misurata railway line and the petrochemical complex. The Turkish oil joint-stock company and the Turkish railway lines administrations are capable of undertaking such an assignment.
6. Maritime transport services to be expanded.
7. Cooperation in the fields of education and culture to be expanded.
8. The field of activity of the Turkish contracting companies to be widened.
9. To attach importance to technological work.
10. To include on the agenda talks on the problems of the Turkish contractors and workers in Libya.

Libyan leader Al-Qadhdhafi has received Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal. At this reception, Al-Qadhdhafi stressed the importance which Libya attaches to relations with Turkey and added: "I hope that these relations will further develop and assume the form of an exemplary brotherhood relationship throughout the Islamic world." Al-Qadhdhafi further stated that Libya would exert all the necessary efforts in this direction.

TRIAL LINKS POPE'S ASSAILANT WITH NAP LEADER

[Text] Ankara, 24 Nov (AFP) -- An alleged letter from the young Turk who shot Pope John Paul II linked him today to Turkish right-wing leader Alpaslan Turkes. The letter was introduced in the court martial here of Mr Turkes.

The military prosecutor said the letter indicated that Mehmet Ali Agca, who tried to kill the pope in Rome last May 13, had assassinated the editor of the Turkish newspaper MILLIYET in 1979 on instructions from Mr Turkes. The latter replied that the letter was a fake, that he had never met Agca and that Mr Turkes' Nationalist Action Party (NAP) never dealt with him.

The prosecutor said Agca sent the letter to Mr Turkes from West Germany after escaping from an Instanbul prison where he was awaiting execution for the slaying of the editor. The letter said: "I am happy to have accomplished the mission entrusted to me in the name of our great cause." The letter also thanked Mr Turkes for his "paternal interest" and "all the help" for my Idealist Brothers (a right-wing group).

Mr Turkes, 65, and many militants of his party and of the Idealist Brothers are charged with 634 other political killings. The prosecutor has requested death sentences for 210 of the defendants, including Mr Turkes.

POLISH DEBTS -- In 1982 Poland has to pay 5.6 billion schillings in debt repayments and interest payments to Austria. SINAI FORCE CONTRIBUTION TO NUMBER 100 TROOPS

[Excerpt] Britain will contribute about 100 troops to the 2,500-strong peacekeeping force in Sinai following the withdrawal of Israel, Mr Humphrey Atkins, the lord privy seal, told the Commons today.

But Mr Atkins sidestepped questions from shadow Foreign Secretary Mr Denis Healey, who wanted to know more about how troops were to be used, and under whose command they would come. "These details remain to be worked out," said the minister. But later Mr Atkins told MP's that UN peacekeeping force arrangements would apply.

Mr Atkins said that the United Kingdom, along with France, Italy and the Netherlands, had agreed to contribute to the multi-national force and observers in Sinai. "We believe that the international community has a duty to play its part as necessary and with the agreement of the parties concerned in peace arrangements in the Middle East," he said.

Mr Atkins went on: "We regard our support for the arrangements associated with the implementation of the Egypt-Israel peace treaty as quite distinct from and independent of the rest of the Camp David process." Mr Atkins pledged support for the Egyptian Government and its EEC partners to "continue to work for the achievement of a comprehensive peace in the Middle East in all ways consistent with the principles to which we hold."

Mr Atkins said Britain's participation -- with France, Italy and the Netherlands -- would be "without prejedice" to its policies on other aspects of the Middle East problem. The government's decision was "a symbol of our determination to achieve a comprehensive peace settlement," he said.

POLITICIANS ASSESS RESULTS OF BREZHNEV VISIT

Schmidt Interviewed

DW261005 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 25 Nov 81

[Reporter Hans-Joachim Reiche interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn -- recorded]

[Answer] No, it was not at their expense. There were individual talks between the deputy premier on the Soviet side and the minister of economics on our side regarding economic cooperation between both states, which has very positively developed in the course of past years and which will continue to expand, such as the gas-for-pipes deal. Other aspects of German-Soviet relations have been also discussed in a positive way.

[Question] The general secretary left his suggestion behind in Bonn on the limitation of medium-range nuclear arms in Europe, mentioning this in his toast. Next to it, so to speak, is the suggestion of the American President which had been published a week ago. Are both documents a sign indicating that a political struggle for Europe between the two big powers will begin, Mr Federal Chancellor?

[Answer] The expression "political struggle for Europe," as if Europe should be pulled in one or the other direction, this expression would be incorrect. The Soviet delegation, Mr Brezhnev and Mr Gromyko, have left Germany in the same frame of mind in which they have come here. They said in their talks that they would not make an attempt because it would be unrealistic to try to separate the Federal Republic or pull it out of its close ties with the Western allies and particularly the United States. In this sense the term political struggle for Europe would be wrong. The Soviet leadership does not have this in mind. But a political struggle for problems which are of greater importance for Europe than for other parts of the world, namely medium-range arms, will begin next Monday.

I am firmly convinced after the Soviet visit here to Bonn that not only the American side will negotiate with the serious will to achieve a result -- we knew that already -- but that also the Soviet side is very interested in a concrete result of the negotiations. The concern is great that one could be threatened by the end of 1983 by Western, by American missiles. They are seriously interested to avoid that by making significant concessions themselves. One can clearly gather their preparedness from the words Brezhnev spoke publicly here in Bonn.

[Answer] Both would be correct. It is a great chance because both world powers want to negotiate seriously. The Soviet Union knows that the Western suggestion of a bilateral zero solution, that this suggestion is considered as very plausible in the whole world and that it enjoys much credibility. The people realize that if one is not supposed to have any missiles, why should the other have any with which one could eliminate each other? A danger exists naturally in the fact that if negotiations will produce no result, a new turn would be made in the armament spiral. The Soviets have turned it up somewhat before with their weekly deployment of a new SS-20 missile. The West would then follow suit. At present, however, I consider the chance to be greater than the danger.

[Question] Let us discuss Geneva again. You mentioned it already because one looks at Geneva now where disarmament talks between the United States and the Soviet Union will begin on Monday. You touched on it already, but I would like to ask once more: Do you think that the chance for Geneva is better now after Brezhnev's visit?

[Answer] I as always am convinced that the Soviet Union would be prepared to negotiate seriously, but we have learned on the occasion of this visit how strong the will and the interest are to reconnoiter the seriousness of the Western position, we have felt it more clearly than 1 year and 3 months ago when Mr Genscher and I visited Moscow.

[Question] German-German relations play a significant part in East-West relations. Will you go soon to the GDR after the talk with Mr Brezhnev here in order to see Mr Honecker, maybe even this year?

[Answer] The intention of such a meeting exists on the part of Mr Honecker as well as on our part. We cannot do everything at once, Mr Reiche. We will make preparations for this meeting. It does not seem to me too important when it will be. It seems important to me that we should not find ourselves in circumstances where a postponement for the third time would appear to be necessary. The meeting has been postponed once at the request of Mr Honecker, another time upon my decision. This time it must work.

Chancellor Comments Further

[Text] Bonn, 26 Nov (DPA) -- The United States and the Soviet Union are entering the negotiations on the limitation of medium-range nuclear missiles, beginning Monday in Geneva, with positions which "cannot be united into an agreement," in the words of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. Schmidt further said in an ARD television interview tonight that both sides therefore had to "come down from their high levels of unlimited demands to somewhat more realistic levels, to make concessions, so that compromises are possible." He is firmly convinced that the Russians and the Americans "want to reach an agreement" in Geneva.

For propaganda reasons, too, there is a tendency at present in America in the view of the chancellor, to underestimate in public their own military strength. In the Soviet Union, on the other hand there is a tendency to overestimate American capabilities. There is, "to me, a psychologically comprehensible need to underestimate on both sides. Each side wants to pretend to be weaker than the other."

Looking back on the Bonn visit of Soviet head of state Leonid Brezhnev, Schmidt said the Soviet side now understands "much better" the American negotiating position and its willingness to negotiate. However, he left open the question whether the Soviets already "completely" understand the Americans. There is a pressing interest for the Germans that both sides should understand one another. "At present, we are probably the best interpreters in the world between the two sides," Schmidt added.

Schmidt considers it urgently desirable, but also possible and probable, that a summit meeting between Brezhnev and President Reagan take place "in the latter part of 1982." "They have to get close to one another and realize that neither is a warmonger," Schmidt said.

Genscher Cites Significance

DW251515 Saarbruecken Saarlaendischer Rundfunk Network in German 0715 GMT 25 Nov 81

[Text] [Question] In your opinion, is the building of confidence, which Federal Chancellor Schmidt cited, one of the important results of Brezhnev's visit to Bonn?

[Answer] One must differentiate between two things: In making this remark, the federal chancellor had the fact in mind that he had met Mr Brezhnev several times. There will naturally be a building of confidence when one has discussed international problems with somebody very often and very thoroughly over a long period of time. This is the case here.

The same applies to me and the Soviet foreign minister. When I stood with him in Gymnich Castle, we both noted that my meetings with him were the most frequent I had with any foreign minister simply because he is the senior foreign minister and because I have been in office for a relatively long time as well, while other foreign ministers have changed during that period of time. This cannot, however, replace agreement on concrete subjects, and this does not exist with regard to important problems. But the flexibility exists to get to the substance of matters.

I believe that this was the most important thing about meeting -- that both sides explained their positions most clearly so that the Soviet Union knows very well the Western position prior to the beginning of negotiations on medium-range missiles on 30 November. They also know the sincerity of our will and that of the Americans to achieve reasonable negotiation results. On the other hand, however, we received an explanation about the aims of the Soviet Union regarding these negotiations. We assume that after this visit the Soviet Union will try to achieve results, while we -- the Federal Government -- have left no doubt that we and our allies would prefer the so-called zero solution.

[Question] The U.S. Department of State expressed cautious optimism this morning regarding Brezhnev's preparedness to reduce nuclear medium-range weapons. Has there been a definite movement regarding the disarmament problem?

[Answer] Things can progress only at the negotiating table. But if the visit had the effect of convincing the Soviet side of the serious will of the West to negotiate so that they will also sit at the table with serious intentions to reduce weapons -- and we assume this is true -- then I would say that this was a good result.

[Answer] Our position is not one between the world powers. We are partners and allies of the United States. But we also are a party that is affected because if negotiations are fruitless, medium-range missiles will be deployed in our country. We are affected even now because the Soviet missiles are trained on us. This explains why the Federal Government played a decisive role in preparing the NATO dual decision and also in preparing the West's negotiating position, including the introduction of the zero solution.

This also explains why the Federal Government has made such a great effort to induce the two great powers to start these negotiations. Moreover, it will be our role to contribute also during the negotiations by participating in the disarmament group of the Western alliance and also by contacts with the Soviet Union, because there is no denying that we live in the heart of Europe. We Germans live in two states. This is not what we desire, but we have to live with it.

We would be the ones affected if a catastrophe occurred. This is why we are, and must be, keenly interested in doing everything to prevent war from occurring here in Europe, to prevent a nuclear disaster from occurring. We must do everything to achieve progress in disarmament and arms control. In this respect we are not taking on more than we can accomplish, and we do not intend to step on the toes of the world powers. Yet, we do have the duty -- and anybody in our country supporting the government has that duty -- to ensure that our people's interests are preserved in this difficult international situation.

Cabinet Assesses Visit

[Text] Bonn, 25 Nov (DPA) -- In a comprehensive appraisal of the Brezhnev visit, the Federal Government stressed at a cabinet session the further possibilities and scope for agreement with Moscow. As an example, Government Spokesman Kurt Becker, mentioned at a government press conference the joint desire to deepen cultural, technological and scientific contacts, which hitherto have come to grief in spite of existing agreements, because of the absence of a clause on Berlin. Becker hinted that in the future there must be more practical action in this field.

The Federal Government attaches great significance to the reference in the final communique to the natural gas pipelines deal, which envisages a connection to "Berlin (West)." Becker wanted to make no comment on the state of negotiations with the GDR on laying the pipelines. There is agreement in the government in its overall appraisal that the Soviet Union "can be assured of the unchanged and firm Western position on the problem of medium-range weapons," Becker said. Federal chancellor Helmut Schmidt made it absolutely clear that the NATO dual decision with its provision on counterarming will come into force at the end of 1983, if by then there have been no results from the Geneva negotiations.

Furthermore, it was important for the Soviet Union to learn the motives of American intentions at the Geneva negotiations, above all because it was the Federal Government's impression that each time there is a change of government in the United States, Moscow has difficulties in forming an evaluation. The "honest assessment" of the American desire for cooperation which the chancellor put to Brezhnev was also in the interests of the FRG.

According to Becker, it was also stressed during the cabinet meeting with regard to the Brezhnev visit, that a high value must be placed on the Federal Republic's influence on the West's disarmament plans. It must have been clear to the Soviet guest that the federal chancellor and his foreign minister played a "very great" role in bringing about the talks beginning in Geneva on Monday. This influence has also extended to the subject of the negotiations, including the mutual desire for a zero solution.

The start of the Geneva negotiations on 30 November does not end contact with the Soviet Union, Becker stressed. Whereas constant mutual briefing in the Western camp is guaranteed in the special consultative group, the contacts with Moscow will be continued via diverse diplomatic channels. It was repeatedly and emphatically stressed during Brezhnev's visit that the primary aim is to have results by summer 1983. After all, the Federal Republic is one of those countries most affected as a target for Soviet missiles and as a country where missiles would be sited in NATO's counterarming.

The Federal Government gained the impression, however, that Moscow seriously wants results to come out of the negotiations. Bonn's long-term relations with the Soviet Union must be regarded in this respect as an important contribution to European security. The general assessment of the federal cabinet, however, does not overlook the fact that a major problem lies in the Soviet Union's claims that an approximate balance in medium-range weapons already exists and that this claim is backed by figures, which, although in general are very similar to Western statistics, are nevertheless open to very different interpretations as far as their classification in different categories of range is concerned.

BUNDESTAG DEPUTIES CRITICIZE DEFENSE MINISTER

[Excerpts] Bonn,27 Nov (DPA) -- The CDU/CSU opposition has launched a heavy attack on Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD). In the Bundestag debate on the Bundeswehr, CSU Deputy Alfred Biehle said on Friday morning that Apel has not mastered the problems of the armed forces. The trust of the soldiers in the political leadership of the Bundeswehr has been shaken.

CDU Deputy Lutz Stavenhagen told DPA that the Bundestag Budget Committee again cut the defense budget by DM 386 million on Thursday evening. In the debate, SPD Deputy Paul Neumann said that the Bundeswehr will fulfill its task.

BUNDESTAG DEBATE ON BREZHNEV VISIT SET FOR 3 DEC

[Text] Bonn, 25 Nov (DPA) — The Brezhnev visit to Bonn is to be the center of a major debate in the Bundestag on 3 December. It was learned in Bonn that it will probably be an all-day debate on the Federal Government's foreign and security policy. Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will probably both make statements.

WARRANT ISSUED FOR SUSPECTED BULGARIAN AGENT

According to the investigations, the Bulgarian, who is being held in custody, is said to have betrayed to his superiors in August 1980 the escape plans of two GDR citizens and their two West German friends. As a result, these four persons, who were on vacation in Bulgaria, were arrested. The two women were deported to the GDR from Bulgaria and sentenced to long prison sentences. The Federal Republic citizens were released after 1 month in custody in Bulgaria on payment of DM 50,000 each.

The two GDR citizens are now in the Federal Republic as part of a recent East-West exchange deal. Investigations against the accused man are continuing.

PAPER COMMENTS ON BREZHNEV'S ARMS PROPOSAL

DW251209 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 25 Nov 81 p 12

[Text] To put it mildly, the "job of interpreter" of the federal chancellor in his talks with Brezhnev is turning out to be difficult. Schmidt has defended the German position with determination. What the other side has said does not sound very encouraging. First, the proposed "reduction" of medium-range missiles in the European part of the Soviet Union is linked with an unacceptable moratorium on the deployment of missiles (not to be mistaken for production) and, second, it is completely vague. "Reduction" can mean many things. But according to all earlier experiences, we would be well advised to consider it only the removal (revocable at any time) of some of the missiles to areas on the other side of the Ural Mountains. This would not help anybody. Brezhnev tried above all to fan the fear of war in a well calculated way in Bonn. His threat to take massive countermeasures in the event counterarmament followed this line. After all, he brusquely rejected Reagan's suggestion to work toward a "zero solution" in the forthcoming negotiations on medium-range weapons. When Government Spokesman Becker said that the federal chancellor had taken much time and used many arguments to point out to Brezhnev the serious intention of the American leadership to negotiate, Soviet spokesman Zamyatin, known for his agitprop style, replied that the Soviet Union is able to assess the intentions of America itself.

This remark was aimed less at Becker than at Schmidt. Brezhnev talked in a moderate way, while Zamyatin demonstrated all the arrogance of a world power that is firmly determined to implement its intentions. Contained in this was a lesson which obviously also impressed foreign journalists, particularly since the contents of the Soviet statements were made in such a rigid form.

DIE ZEIT ANALYZES BREZHNEV'S BONN VISIT

[Excerpt] Illusions definitely are out of place; the positions of the Americans and the Soviets are too far apart for that. Granted, both advocate a "zero solution," but each of them understands something different by that: Reagan feels that NATO counterarmament will become unnecessary if and when the Russians scrap all their medium-range missiles (SS-20, SS-4, SS-5); Brezhnev thinks it means that Western counterarming will not be implemented, for which he at best promises a vaguely described reduction of his own medium-range weapons in the European part of the Soviet Union.

But this is not yet final. "Zero is better than nothing: -- this humorous headline of THE GUARDIAN already hints at the fact taught by experience that the great powers have always adopted maximum positions prior to the opening of any talks but that these positions are not at all unalterable. This has always been the case. Why should it be different this time?

Not that the talks will be simple. Inevitably there will be, to begin with, a phase of "pea counting" in which the negotiators will be trying to come to an understanding about the arsenals at the disposal of the powers. Then the realization will prevail that neither side can enforce a zero solution of its own gusto. Finally the compromise packages will be wrapped and tied and staged plans and phased programs devised. Helmut Schmidt has announced already that he will exert great influence in the course of the negotiations "so that something reasonable will come out of them." In this connection, conference crises cannot be ruled out; nevertheless, they will ultimately come to terms.

Reagan's Dream Role

The chancellor may claim the credit of having cranked up the dialogue of the great powers again. His constant talking -- and perhaps also the psychological pressure emanating from the European peace movement -- induced Ronald Reagan to coherently formulate his concept concerning disarmament for the first time in the 11th month of his term. I will take any bets: Had Reagan done this earlier, had similarly clear and well-weighed words from the White House promulgated U.S. world policy earlier instead of the martial ricochets from the Pentagon and the State Department -- the peace movement never would have proliferated as dramatically as it did. There is no longer any talk about a linkage: about arms control presupposing Soviet good behavior throughout the world. Nor is there any word being uttered about the events in El Salvador or Nicaragua or Chad being more important than the relationship between Moscow and Washington, or about the concern about our nuclear weapons world being absolutely unfounded. The U.S. President's adaptation to reality has made considerable headway. It cannot be ruled out that the role of peace president will turn into the dream part of the former movie actor.

Will Brezhnev do as the new Reagan? Or will Soviet policy climb hand over hand along the lines of the impertinence served the German public by Kremlin spokesman Zamyatin: That the SS-20's have been in existence since 1975; that nobody has ever said that they threaten Hamburg, Cologne or Bonn; that -- implicitly -- a threat to Soviet territory by Western medium-range weapons is not the same as a threat to West Europe by Soviet missiles? Helmut Schmidt explained this entirely differently to the Kremlin bosses several times -- in 1978, 1979, 1980 and again now: We understand that the Soviets are worried, yet conversely, they must comprehend that we, too, are worried. Has Brezhnev comprehended this?

He is bound to have understood at least one thing: that the chancellor will have the new NATO weapons deployed in late 1983 if the negotiations fail to produce any results by that time.

It is amazing indeed: Three and a half decades after the war the Federal Republic has become the interpreter between the superpowers; not the broker, not the troubleshooter, not the mediator -- but the interpreter. Helmut Schmidt explained the U.S. position to Brezhnev; the general secretary reciprocated with the hope that the chancellor would likewise elucidate Moscow's stance in Washington. And all this happened without even the ghost of a doubt arising that the Federal Republic is about to turn into a floating kidney.

The chancellor did not compromise himself, but neither did he give anything away. Just the same, in difficult times he acted in keeping with the motto which he once thusly phrased in a private circle: "We are not small enough to always keep our mouth shut -- yet we are too small to do more than just talking." And without in the least betraying Western overall interests he expressly introduced into the game the special German and European interests.

It is a basic German interest to really avoid confrontations that can be avoided. As long as we keep reunification in mind we must tell ourselves at the same time that nothing would be less beneficial to it than a number of crises or even clashes between East and West. Our present policy, which is aimed at the least possible problematic life of the two states together on the basis of the temporary (or perhaps final?) nonreunification, would not benefit either.

The Tasks of the Europeans

Parallel to this there is a basic European interest to avoid or defuse confrontations because this alone makes possible a salutary development of convergence of the states of our divided continent. This means: Wherever this promises success it is necessary to prevent tensions in remote regions of the world from having any impact on Europe. It is the task of the Europeans in both camps to keep exerting a moderating influence on their respective leading power all the time and, all concern about their own security notwithstanding, to keep the future prospects of cooperation open. This is particularly important especially before and after changes in leadership in Washington and in Moscow.

Interpreting cannot, however, be any substitute for the direct contact between the responsible people in the Kremlin and in the White House. This is why the chancellor was well advised to call on Ronald Reagan and Leonid Brezhnev to meet in 1982 and to desist from dealing with each other via third parties. The world does in fact need a signal that the leaders of the two superpowers do not avoid each other but want to listen to each other.

Too long have they reacted to each other after the principle of the Rorschach test, after the dramaturgical law of the film Raschomon, or with the indifference of automobile stickers. Under the Rorschach test everybody derives from ink spots his own hopes and anxieties; in the Raschomon movie the same plot is being played by various participants in an entirely different manner -- everyone claiming right and truthfulness for himself; on automobile stickers long chains of thought deteriorate to deadening slogans: Detente -- no thanks; capitalism -- nix good. This just creates tension. Misunderstandings occur which then gain their own momentum and become miscalculations. The mobilization spirit takes the place of the will for cooperation, careless readiness for confrontation replaces the continuous pursuit of conflict management.

For all of 2 years Helmut Schmidt has tried to extricate the two superpowers from this dangerous attitude -- not unsuccessfully. The charge that he thereby bit off more than he could chew is a clear miss. The chancellor abided exactly by the recipe of his book "Strategy of Balance" (1969): "Should a Federal Government overstrain our freedom of action it may be bad medicine for us. The proper sense of perspective for what is possible is the most important attribute needed by German politics between the two world powers."

The chancellor has given some impetus. Something has begun to move again in world politics -- for the first time since the Iranian hostage crisis and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. It is now the turn of the superpowers to make the next move.

GOVERNMENT TO TAKE PART IN SINAI PEACE FORCE

PM251621 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Nov 81 pp 1, 6

[Maurice Delarue report: "France Will Take Part in Sinai Force"]

[Excerpt] This Monday, 23 November, France, Britain, the Netherlands and Italy were due to officially announce their participation in the "multinational force" which will guard the Egyptian-Israeli border in the Sinai starting next April. A statement to this effect by the four countries is accompanied by a statement by the 10 EEC members indicating that this participation facilitates an all-embracing settlement in the Near East.

Announcing the French decision, the Quai d'Orsay described France's policy in the Near East as "clear, realistic and coherent," and recalled that it is based on four great principles:

"1 -- The security of the states in the region, including the future Palestinian state, which must be able to live in peace in borders established by consensus;

"2 -- Justice for all the peoples in the region including the Palestinian people who must be able to establish the structures of their choice in their homeland and determine their future, which will naturally tend toward the formation of a state;

"3 -- The unacceptable character of any action contrary to the fundamental rules of international law and especially of the Security Council decisions;

"4 -- The need to deal with Near East problems by negotiation among all those concerned in the region; foreign powers having a duty to facilitate and guarantee the settlement."

"All the parties which accept these principles should be able to take part in the negotiations," the Quai d'Orsay spokesman added, "including the Palestinian people and consequently the PLO which strikes us as a representative body."

"The French Government," the spokesman also said, "is thus demonstrating its twofold intention to use its potential for dialogue with the adversaries in the service of peace. Our rule is to talk the same language to everybody. Finally, France thinks that any progress, even partial, is beneficial for an all-embracing settlement, of which the French Government is not losing sight."

The spokesman concluded that it was part of France's responsibilities "to face the situation resulting from President as-Sadat's death. The French Government has closely examined its consequences for Egypt and relations between Egypt and the Arab world," he said, "and it has concluded that it ought to contribute to withdrawal from Sinai by the Israeli forces." The four countries informed the Egyptian, Israeli and U.S. Governments of their intention on Sunday. The European decision was a particularly difficult one to take, and since the Israeli-Arab dispute is echoed within the European ten, it will be very controversial both in the Arab countries, other than Egypt, and in Israel.

PRESS STATEMENT ON MURUROA ATOLL NUCLEAR TEST

[Text] Paris, 25 Nov (AFP) -- France announced today that it had conducted an underground nuclear test in the Pacific region on November 11, but denied earlier reports that it was a neutron bomb. The Presidential Palace, in a press statement, said the explosion at France's Mururoa Atoll site was part of a French series of nuclear tests, and usual precautions were taken regarding neighbouring countries in the region.

Yesterday New Zealand's seismographic laboratory said that it detected a two-kiloton nuclear test explosion at Mururoa on November 11. Members of the Greenpeace Ecology Movement, announcing the November 11 test on Tuesday, said it was the ninth French test this year, and the fifth since Socialist Francois Mitterrand became president on May 10.

GOVERNMENT TO RESUME NUCLEAR POWER PLANT PROGRAM

[Text] Paris, 25 Nov (AFP) -- The French Government today decided to resume France's nuclear power programme by authorising work on six sites which were frozen during the summer until parliament debated the matter in September.

Five reactors each of 1,300 megawatts, envisaged under a two-year plan adopted by parliament this autumn, are to be built at Chooze near the Belgian frontier, at Cattenom near the frontier with Belgium, Luxembourg and West Germany, at Nogent in central France, at Golfech in the south west, and at Penly near the channel. The sixth is a 900 megawatt reactor to be built at Chinon in central France, but two other 'frozen' sites at Pellerip near the Atlantic and Civeaux in central France are to be studied further.

Before giving to its commitment to consult local bodies which came out in favour of construction. [as received]

The Chooz and Cattenom sites have been strongly attacked by ecologists in neighbouring countries, and the French Government said it has informed the governments concerned that it intends to continue exchanging information. The center-right government defeated in elections in the spring of this year had planned to build nine nuclear power stations in 1982 and 1983.

LE MONDE COMMENTS ON CHEYSSON YUGOSLAVIA VISIT

[Text] Belgrade -- There are some official visits in which the political talks are merely symbolic. This is not true of the first visit to Belgrade by a member of the current French Government. Mr Cheysson, arrived late Friday morning, scarcely stopped talking with Yugoslav Foreign Minister Josip Vrhovec and with Federal Executive Council Chairman Veselin Djuranovic, constituted a very long and at times very detailed review of the international situation. Bilateral problems, essentially the development and balancing of trade, were to be discussed on Saturday morning and will be discussed in particular on 7 and 8 December when Mr Jobert visits Belgrade.

Friday's talks were dominated by what must be termed the many Yugoslav anxieties. These anxieties are of several types. The most marked are probably not about East-West relations but about the regional situation. Mr Vrhovec talked at length and emphatically about Yugoslavia's bad relations with two of its neighbors, Bulgaria and Albania. But he suggested that an outside influence was playing a role in both the Macedonian problems ("Bulgaria is not just Bulgaria") and in the Kosovo problem. Belgrade readily recalls that since 1948 Albania has always been close to Yugoslavia's "worst enemies." Mr Vrhovec also revealed to his guests that Yugoslav troops had been sent to patrol the border with Albania.

The French side took note of these accusations but refrained from adopting a stance in such a delicate matter as the Kosovo question, in which "Moscow's hand" clearly cannot explain everything.

The "Romanian problem" was not raised during the talks with Mr Vrhovec. However, in private, Yugoslav officials are not unwilling to express their anxieties at the deterioration in the economic, social and even political situation in a neighboring country with which they intend to have good relations. "Is there still time for Mr Ceausescu to remedy the situation?" This is the leitmotiv of the discussions which may be going on, although the press is prudently avoiding any allusion to these matters, probably in order not to hurt the friend in Bucharest. Nonetheless, there seems to be no fear that the Romanian affair will deteriorate "Polish style," but rather that Moscow will try to exploit the situation.

With regard to Poland -- another subject discussed at length -- the two sides readily agreed in expressing the firm hope that there will be no interference in that country. The Yugoslavs are less afraid of contagion from the phenomenon than of an increase in the irritation it is arousing in many Eastern bloc countries.

In the sphere of East-West relations, Mr Vrhovec avoided taking a clear stance on Mr Reagan's recent proposals on banning Euromissiles, but in private, officials are describing them as "maximalist." On the other hand, he strongly emphasized the need to avoid a failure at the Madrid CSCE Conference; Mr Vrhovec seemed to favor a final meeting at foreign minister level to break the deadlock. This idea, launched by Mr Colombo and Mr Genscher, is undoubtedly gaining ground. For its part, France is not hostile to it. Mr Cheysson, however, repeated to his hosts that there was no question of the French nuclear force being taken into account in possible disarmament negotiations.

The other subjects discussed were Afghanistan, Kampuchea, North-South relations and the Near East. Major differences of emphasis emerged between Paris and Belgrade on the last subject.

LE MONDE REPORTS LATEST ON GAS NEGOTIATIONS

[Bruno de Thomas: "France and the Soviet Union Have Reached Agreement on a Minimum Price"]

[Text] The discussions between the USSR and France on the supply of Siberian gas have made progress over the past 3 days, but the contract will not be signed before the French-Soviet Joint Commission meeting in Moscow on 14 and 15 December. The Soviet delegation headed by the deputy foreign trade minister, in Paris since 16 November, is actually due to go on to Essen in the FRG. Agreements between the USSR and the FRG are apparently to be signed during Mr Brezhnev's visit to Bonn on 23 and 24 November.

The supply of 40 billion cubic meters of Soviet gas per year to West Europe -- including 8 billion cubic meters per year to France -- thanks to the construction of a 5,000 km double gas pipeline from Urengoy (West Siberia) to the Bavarian-Czechoslovak border, involves three stages: negotiations on the price and quantities of the gas supplied; a financial agreement, since the total investment ($10 billion) will be made largely by the Western countries; and finally industrial contracts since the Soviets will buy from the West pipes, pumping stations, turbines and other equipment.

The Soviet delegation reached agreement in principle with Gaz de France on the minimum guaranteed price for initial supplies. To protect their investments the vendors were demanding a minimum price of $6.05 per million BTUs throughout the contract period no matter how the indexing system develops. The agreement reached apparently sets that guaranteed minimum price around $5.70 per million BTUs.

The drafting of the indexing system has apparently also been virtually completed: it would be partly based on the price of fuel oil and low-sulfur heavy fuel and would be at most 25 percent based on a crude oil average.

Since the West German negotiators have succeeded in establishing that the crude oil element will be less than 25 percent, the French would like this to account for some 20 percent of the system.

But the discussions remained very difficult and it seemed rather unlikely that they would make much progress on 19 November on the choice of indexes (Gaz de France seeking to obtain national indexes) and above all on the basic price. The agreement which is reached on this price between the USSR and the FRG will, as we know be a determining factor.

However, Paris maintains that things are moving toward a "reasonable" price at a little over $5 per million BTUs since agreement has been reached on the principle of a small rebate (around 10-20 cents) for France -- the country furthest away from the vendor -- to compensate for increased transport costs.

In the finance sphere the Soviets enjoy the terms laid down in the 1980 French-Soviet agreement. That agreement defined in a conventional manner the total interest (15 percent), the length of time for which the credit is given, and its starting date. Until 30 September the interest rate was fixed at 7.8 percent on 85 percent of the credit (purchasing or supplying) granted (note: 7.75 percent in fact, owing to a bonus for the French Foreign Trade Insurance Company).

Creusot-Loire's signing of a contract which incorporated both reference to specific equipment (pumping stations) and a total package lays down the old terms for all the mechanical and electrical equipment. Similarly the Thomson contract was signed before 30 September.

Although the credit offered by France could be more than Fr 10 billion any new contract would be based in the absence of new financial negotiations, on the so-called consensus terms, in other words the 8.5 percent rate now accepted by the industrialized countries for their export credits.

As regards the industrial part of the agreement, several contracts have already been signed with West German, French and Italian companies for the supply of 41 pumping stations and some of the pipes.

The supply by Thomson of Fr 1.8 billions' worth of electronic equipment and computers to equip the Soviet gas pipeline network, some of which is regarded as "strategic" has raised some problems in Paris.

People are now saying that "It is no longer a major obstacle," while admitting that it is necessary to ensure that Thomson does not supply equipment regarded as strategic. With the time necessary to implement the second stage -- called Yamal 2 -- of this gas pipeline, (around 1985-1987), there is every reason to think that the equipment which is now "strategic" will no longer be so in 5 years time. Moreover the rivalry between Thomson and MATRA should be settled by licensing contracts between the two firms.

The Thomson "affair" had provided some people in France with an opportunity to express "their anxieties" over increased dependence on the Soviet Union. After the failure of a new American deterrence mission in Europe at the beginning of last week, Congress now recognizes that the United States has "no means of influencing" its European allies on this question.

So American tactics could change, as some congressmen recommended on 17 November, the objective being henceforth to draw up "safeguards" with the Europeans to free them from any possible Soviet blackmail.

PREMIER SPADOLINI DISCUSSES EUROPEAN ISSUES

[Philippe Pons and Marc Semo interview with Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini: "Europe Cannot Be Neutral Between East and West"; date and place not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] Prime Minister, your meeting with Mr Mitterrand during your visit to France will be the first meeting between a "secular" Italian Government chief and a Socialist French president. How could these changes influence bilateral relations between the two countries and European policy?

[Answer] I now lead a government which decided from the start to strengthen the ancient and traditional relationship of friendship and cooperation between France and Italy. This objective strikes us as having come closer since the arrival in the Elysee of Mr Francois Mitterrand, a fervent defender of the European cause and of Atlantic solidarity and, like us, committed to consolidating peace in an area of such vital importance to our two countries as the whole Mediterranean. The London European summit, which is to take place soon, will involve France and Italy in a prominent way. I expect a great deal from my talks with President Mitterrand with regard to reviving dialogue on European unity and giving new impetus to the community process. Europe has no future unless France is one of its protagonists. This is a role inherited from its highly developed civilization and one which Paris rightly intends to make it play in the world today.

Strategic Choices

[Question] The Italian Government's decision to fix the location for the future deployment of the Euromissiles in Sicily at this stage and the increase in military spending at a time of budgetary austerity have prompted the Communist opposition and some pacifist movements to criticize what they see as Italy's excessive alignment with U.S. positions.

[Answer] As far as the increase in military spending is concerned we have kept to the 3-percent increase in real terms fixed by joint agreement with our allies. In any case, this increase was necessary to strengthen our defense and hence our security.

I do not see how such a decision can weaken our position in favor of the most rapid possible resumption of negotiations on the Euromissiles. Negotiation, in other words, dialogue, is still the main line of our foreign policy. On this point too our analysis of international relations coincides both with that of President Mitterrand's France and Chancellor Schmidt's FRG. It was in keeping with this that we fixed the location for the deployment of the Euromissiles. We want to negotiate, but in a situation of strategic balance. Our long-term objective is still the "zero option," in other words, the non-deployment of the Western missiles in exchange for the withdrawal of the Soviet missiles targeted on Europe.

In the past few months, we have worked in agreement with our allies for a rapid resumption of East-West negotiations on a balanced and monitored arms reduction. But take care: The peace which we want for Europe cannot be confused with neutralism. Some of the slogans on the peace marches held in the European capitals over the past few months worry me. These phenomena must not be underestimated, but we must nonetheless not forget that a Europe which is a protagonist in its history and mistress of its own destiny can under no circumstances be neutral and incapable of deciding between East and West.

A New "Style"

[Question] Many observers think that, since your installation as prime minister, you have given a "new style" to Italian politics. On what points do you think you have made practical progress?

[Answer] This government was born at the wish of President Sandro Pertini at a very delicate point in our national life. It was to settle four urgent problems: the morality of public life, the economic crisis, the terrorist threat, and the international situation. It is based on a broad alliance of democratic parties and wants to improve its relations with the opposition, and primarily with the Communist Party.

In the sphere of public morality, the government has decreed the dissolution of the P-2 lodge and has shown that centers of occult and corrupting powers will no longer be tolerated in the future. A chapter was closed once and for all with the P-2 affair. At the economic level we must simultaneously overcome inflation and recession. We have established the broad outlines of an economic policy aimed at limiting the inflation rate to 16 percent for 1982, which is the first step toward reducing the increase in the cost of living to the European average within 3 years. This means removing parasitic and unproductive spending and also establishing control over the different variables in economic growth. The government has played its role in this sphere with the presentation of the finance law to Parliament within the alloted time. We will ask the social partners to make a similar effort, notably as regards labor costs which are still too high compared with those of our main European partners.

To tackle the terrorism problem we have restructured the secret services and put forward a law which encourages armed groups to disband. We have also given the forces of order more resources. But we are aware of the fact that terrorism is still a threat to all our institutions. Any optimism in this sphere would be misplaced.

At the international level, Italy is fighting to make Europe a "political subject" in a period of high tension. This is a point which brings us particularly close to Mr Francois Mitterrand, but we must act quickly because there is a danger; that of seeing the crisis factors which are invading the industrialized societies weaken the ties of solidarity and cooperation among our countries. Thus we are aware of the fact that between now and the year 2000, North-South dialogue will be as important as East-West rapprochement for our security and survival as a free Western nation.

COLOMBO ADDRESSES CABINET ON SINAI PEACE FORCE

[Text] Rome, 25 Nov (ANSA) -- Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo made it clear that Italy's support for a (?nuclear) Middle Eastern peace also involving the Palestinians should not be seen as "in contradiction" with the Camp David agreements in briefing the Rome cabinet here on the Italian decision to take part in the multinational peace force for the Sinai Peninsula.

Addressing the cabinet yesterday evening, Colombo was bringing his ministerial colleagues up to date on the final stages of talks between the EEC Ten on the statement issued Monday justifying the decision taken jointly by Italy, Britain, France, and Holland to take part in the force.

According to Colombo, the Italian commitment to a global Mideastern [as received] with negotiations also involving the Palestinians is not in contradiction with "appreciation" for the Camp David process started in September 1978, since it sees the latter as an "initial step towards the same objective."

He also stressed that participation in the peace force does not imply "any change" in the Italian Government's position. Rather, he explained, it is a "concrete gesture for arriving at complete Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula in line with Resolution 242 of the United Nations Security Council."

UN DELEGATES GET APPROVAL ON SPACE ARMS RACE BAN

The resolution document, the minister said, stipulates in particular that the Geneva Committee for Disarmament give the go-ahead for negotiations for an agreement which would forbid satellite arms systems as the potentially most destabilizing of possible space weaponry.

Colombo also remarked that this initiative can be linked again to Italian actions in this regard which have been going forward for years now in the attempt to stop an arms race in space.

Voting tallies on the resolution project were 114 in favor, 14 abstentions, and no votes against.

ROME PAPER ON ARMS TALKS, USSR VIEW OF EUROPE

PM261135 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 21 Nov 81 p 13

[Excerpts] Moscow, 20 Nov -- What the Soviets expected (and partly still expect) from the Brezhnev-Schmidt talks is clear enough. This is not just another visit -- or even just a slightly more important one -- to a Western country. In fact, Brezhnev's arrival in Bonn signifies a great deal more. For one thing, it is the first real Soviet-European reconnection since the Afghan trauma -- a much more significant resumption of relations than the Brezhnev-Giscard meeting in Warsaw or Schmidt's Moscow visit halfway through last year. Moreover, there is the new impetus imparted to economic cooperation (centered on the final agreements on the gas pipeline from Siberia to Central Europe) between the Communist world and the West at a time when, for the first time since the war, the Soviet economy is moving toward stagnation. And last, there is the propagandist insertion of Brezhnev's message (the rejection of the nuclear first strike, of the neutron bomb and of the new NATO missiles in Europe) into the framework of the major pacifist movement that has developed in recent weeks in the major European countries.

Amid these calculations and expectations, Reagan's proposals, yesterday, of a "zero option" on the Euromissiles feel like a bucket of cold water; the SS-20's should be removed from the USSR's European territory and in exchange NATO will abandon the deployment of the new nuclear weapons. Now it is true that Reagan's offer seems oriented more to propaganda than real negotiations, since Washington knows full well that the Soviets are unprepared to accept it. But the change of image, the psychological impact on the European public and the effects caused by the extraordinary sense of timing of the initiative is bound to affect relations between the USSR and Europe.

Unexpected Offensive

The central themes of the visit to Bonn have been suddenly upset by it. Basically, Brezhnev was arriving in Europe in the wake of a number of U.S. excesses -- one day a speech about the specific possibility of a "limited nuclear war" and the next a reference to a "precautionary" nuclear strike, while for the past 10 months there has been a continuous succession of hardline statements, stubborn attitudes and increasing tensions with the European allies.

This was the context within which the pacifist movement gained increasing strength and Brezhnev prepared to project an image of the USSR as a moderate and responsible power closer to European feelings (since, as Moscow states repeatedly, the USSR has experienced the tragedy of war just as Europe has) than the United States can be, having remained unscathed in both world wars.

But the Soviet peace offensive has unexpectedly come up against the U.S. peace offensive. Among other things, it demonstrated the concern with which Washington was now watching the atmosphere in Europe, the governments' dissatisfaction with Reagan's rigidity and the public movement against nuclear rearmament. The Reagan administration therefore decided to take the initiative, and the result is that not all, but certainly some of the Soviet arguments in the dialogue with Schmidt (and indirectly with the European public) have now been weakened and blunted. Did the Kremlin not always stress that the Pershing IIs and cruise missiles are not tactical but strategic weapons (since they can hit the Soviet ICBMs in their silos)? Well, Reagan is abandoning their deployment. But how can Brezhnev in turn fail to give up all, or most of his SS-20's?

In short, Reagan's proposal heals some of the ruptures that have occurred lately between Washington and Europe, especially with Chancellor Schmidt. The U.S. administration has realized -- albeit belatedly -- that its repeated refusals to conduct a dialogue with Moscow were dangerously weakening the Schmidt government and that the advent of a Christian Democratic majority in Germany would have meant the transformation of that country (hitherto the most stable in the alliance) into another of Europe's tottering uncertainties, with disorder in the streets and a new government every 10-12 months. So it moved toward Schmidt's demands and Schmidt cannot fail to acknowledge the U.S. change; he knows that Reagan's proposal is not as sincere (or even feasible) as he would like it to appear and that the negotiations on the Euromissiles remain very difficult, partly also because of U.S. reluctance; but at least he can show a more presentable United States to the left of his own party, to the pacifist movement and in the dialogue with Brezhnev.

There is now a large office in the CPSU Central Committee Secretariat that concerns itself with social democrats throughout the world. And the results are clearly visible. Bookshops are starting to carry publications unthinkable a few years ago (on the social democrats and nuclear weapons, for instance, or on the social democrats and Africa or Latin America -- all of them eulogistic, of course), and the television newsreel on Monday 1 November opened with a report on Willy Brandt's visit to Hungary.

I discussed this with friends at the institute of the international workers' movement and noticed that the subject immediately prompted some embarrassment. The fact that the German and Dutch social democrats, Palme, Foot and Healey and Andreas Papandreou are leading the pacifist movement rather than Marchais or Carrillo prompts twofold feelings; on the one hand, the satisfaction of being about to say: "You see, it certainly is not Moscow that is leading the peace movement"; and on the other, disappointment (where are the communists?), mitigated only by the enthusiasm with which Berlinguer has joined in.

But when I underlined the spectacular nature of this new sympathy for the social democrats, the support for demonstrations organized largely by young anarchists or ecologists, I saw that I was causing real uneasiness in my interlocutors. Indeed, when finally (determined by them to be lenient) I asked what they thought of the fact that the street movement is anti-American but also anti-Soviet, they gave the following awkward, bewildered reply: "It does not matter; it does not matter; the essential thing is that they are people who support peace."

But the fact remains, as Aleksandr Bovin told me in his office at IZVESTIYA headquarters (with his usual perspecacity and with the authoritativeness conferred on him by his proximity to the government), that "a change is beginning to occur in the USSR leadership group's view of the situation in Europe and the West as a whole, whereby there is a growing understanding of political phenomena at one time neglected or even condemned."

Hence the great enthusiasm for the social democrats and hence the view of Schmidt no longer as merely a major economic interlocutor but as an essential political interlocutor, the most important intermediary through whom to maintain relations with the West, to prevent them from foundering amid the billows of the cold war.

PAPER RESPONDS TO SOVIET WEEKLY'S CRITICISM

[Text] Rome -- L'UNITA published yesterday with some prominence on an inside page a report on the attack made by the Soviet foreign policy weekly NOVOYE VREMYA on Romano Ledda's latest report to the PCI Central Committee. The PCI daily follows the Moscow dispatch with an editorial commentary confirming the stances contained in the report.

"We did not at all conceal the responsibilities of the present U.S. administration," the commentary states, "in the exacerbation of international tension, but we also pointed out that there is a bloc and power logic which jeopardizes detente on both sides; Soviet policy too has not been devoid of it.... This was also the prevalent opinion in the major peace demonstrations that have pervaded Europe." Basically, NOVOYE VREMYA had accused the PCI of putting the United States and the USSR on the same level.

CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATS, PCI DIFFER ON REFORMS

[Text] Rome, 26 Nov (ANSA) -- Attention in Italian political circles here remains focused today on the "big assembly" which the relative majority Christian Democrat Party called with the avowed aim of inspiring a renewal in party ranks and ideas. Observers have put off initial comments on the discussions however, preferring to wait for the pronouncements of the most authoritative party representatives and other prominent personalities of Catholic inspiration from the financial, industrial, and cultural worlds, which will take place today and tomorrow. It was noted however that one element which the Christian Democrats reportedly expected to bring to the assembly, the news of a breakthrough in their relations with the Communists -- the nation's second largest party occupying the opposition benches -- was not forthcoming after the conclusion of a meeting held on Tuesday between delegations of both parties headed by their secretaries, Flaminio Piccoli and Enrico Berlinguer, on the matter of institutional reform.

Communist reaction to the proposal advanced by Christian Democrat Senate President Amintore Fanfani, for a joint house commission study of proposals on state reform, in fact was a negative one. The Communists maintained that the most urgent problems can be resolved with the constitutional and parliamentary instruments already available, and that delaying the reforms until the results of a commission study would mean a significant delay in finding approval for the most urgent measures.

In a strong reaction to the Communist position, a representative of the Social Democratic Party made it known yesterday that the meeting between Piccoli and Berlinguer was considered "absolutely negative" by his party. Luigi Preti, an MP from the Social Democrat Party which together with the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Liberals and Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini's own Republican Party, make up the present coalition, also said that the meeting signalled a "step backward" for the Communist secretary "in respect to previous affirmations by (Communist Party member) Giorgio Napolitano".

In an apparent denial of this insinuation of divergence among the leadership of the Communist Party, information emerging from a meeting of the leadership on Wednesday indicated that they had unanimously approved the position taken at the meeting by Berlinguer. Napolitano is a member of the party leadership, which also announced a meeting of their Central Committee slated to take place on December 3.

TOGO'S EYADEMA PROLONGS LENGTH OF VISIT

AB251158 Paris AFP in French 1001 GMT 25 Nov 81

[Text] Madrid, 25 Nov (AFP) -- Gen Gnassingbe Eyadema, president of Togo, has decided to extend his stay in Spain by one day, it was learned here from official sources. Mr Eyadema's official visit will end on Wednesday, but the Togolese president and his suite will stay on until Thursday in order to hold talks with various Spanish representatives of the private economic sector, the same sources stated.

Tuesday evening General Eyadema received several African ambassadors accredited to Madrid, including those from Algeria, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ivory Coast, Gabon, Mauritania, Nigeria, Sudan and Zaire. During the meeting, the Togolese head of state stressed the need to safeguard the peace and economic independence of the countries on the African Continent. On Wednesday the Togolese president will attend a parade and military maneuvers at the El Goloso barracks, 15 kms from the Spanish capital.

MANUEL AZCARATE VIEWS CONTINUING PCE PURGE

[Text] Madrid, 17 November -- Santiago Carrillo continues his purge of the PCE. The latest people to be hit are five members of Madrid's Municipal Council, who have been expelled from the PCE. On this serious crisis and on its political repercussions we sought the opinion of the principal defendant, Manuel Azcarate, who was head of the PCE's foreign policy section for 14 years and was expelled from the Central Committee last week together with five other leaders for "splitism."

"Very serious things are happening in the PCE. Carrillo has said that they are more serious than the expulsions of Semprun and Claudin. He is right: unless the regressive trend toward a traditional, monolithic party with limited outlooks is stopped. Six members of the Central Committee have been expelled. Several provincial committees (Salamanca, Valladolid and others) have been dissolved. Today five Madrid councillors were expelled from the PCE and the threat of further expulsions exists."

[Answer] We were accused of forming a splinter group, but there is no proof of it. We explained our position. We accepted the congress decisions and party rules, but were expelled all the same. They wanted us to sign statements drawn up by Carrillo acknowledging that we had committed a political error and had attacked the party by organizing the meeting for the two Basque leaders, the communist Lertxundi and the Euzkadiko Ezquerra leader Onaindia. In fact the two Basque leaders' talk was also organized by noncommunist representatives.

It was not a party event. On the other hand, our dignity prevented us from saying anything under the threat of expulsion. Consider how shameful it would have been if the newspapers had said that the six Central Committee members had retracted: It would have seemed like a return to other eras, which we all want to forget.

[Answer] The political solution attempted by leaders such as Nicolas Sartorius and Marcelino Camacho was prevented by the stubborn position of Carrillo and the hardline nucleus of the party secretariat. Carrillo cited to the Executive Committee the example of the "manifesto" group and its expulsion from the PCI. But the debate on the manifesto group lasted about a year: in our case we were expelled in 2 days. There was a bloc vote: The "yes" vote was to expel all six of us, and there was not even a vote on each individual. The following morning another four members of the Communist Party of the Basque Country Central Committee were expelled. In 2 days the PCE Central Committee expelled 10 members -- a 10 percent amputation.

[Answer] Our backing for Lertxundi's meeting was interpreted as support for a merger with the revolutionary forces of nationalist origins. But irrespective of party problems, I believe that our position reflected a political will to keep the dialogue open between Spain's communist and revolutionary forces and these new revolutionary forces that are trying to create in the Basque country a new Marxist and democratic party, that corresponds in substance to the concept of Eurocommunism. This is a historic event not only for the future of the Basque country but also for the strengthening of democracy in Spain and progress in our country.

[Answer] I believe it was very important that one-third of the Central Committee refused to approve the expulsion. And that leaders such as Sartorius and Camacho and others tried to intervene for a political solution. There is a substantial force in the Central Committee that has a different view from the majority's. Every day I receive expressions of sympathy not addresed to me personally but which reflect a broad current in the party against the sanctions do not resolve problems. It is natural for a spontaneous impetus to emerge against such measures. Just today the Cordoba provincial committee, following those of Malaga and other provinces, spoke out publicly against the sanctions.

[Answer] It all depends on an erroneous conception rooted in the tough nucleus of the Secretariat. To tackle the imminent political and electoral battles they believe that it is necessary to clean out the party and to set it in order. But not in the direction of seeking the new forms suited to a Eurocommunist party -- open debates and new ties with society -- but in the direction of a return to the traditional style vertical party, in which everything comes from above. This will not help the party, but will in fact do it much harm.

[Question] Does this step not perhaps call into question your handling of the PCE's foreign policy secion?

[Answer] I make no personalizations. I hope that the party will continue to pursue an independent policy. But evidently the old, traditionalist concept of the party prevails among the hardliners. If their influence increases, this could be reflected in an international stance different from the one which I have personified in this period -- for an independent Eurocommunist policy that can combat both blocs and denounce at the same time both the evil plans of U.S. imperialism and the negative aspects of the Soviet Union's big power policy.

OPPOSITION SHOULD NOT TAKE WIN FOR GRANTED

[Text] Have the Social Democrats conceded the Folketing election? The minor defeat they suffered in the local elections must have lowered their expectations of how things will go 8 December. But the voters would be wise not to assume in advance that the second election will go like the first. There were some clear trends in the local election results. But there were also a number of discrepancies as reminders that the electorate's mood is as changeable as the weather.

However, it is impossible to ignore the impression that there is a clear trend among the voters against the Social Democrats, and an equally clear trend in favor of the Conservative People's Party. Anker Jorgensen and the whole enormous apparatus which the party and the trade union movment have at their disposal will undoubtedly make great efforts in the coming weeks to reverse these trends. They have a strength which must not be underestimated. The opposition parties should not therefore assume that the one election victory automatically leads to another. They should warn themselves against overestimating what happened in the local elections.

Two immediate lessons can be drawn from the local election figures, and these will also play a role in the Folketing election. One is that the Socialist People's Party and the Left Socialist party are having success in the major urban areas. The Socialist People's Party takes votes from the Social Democrats, and the Left Socialist takes from both of them and could even make inroads into the communist ranks. Social Democratic losses in the Folketing election would seem to give the leftwing parties a stronger placing. Such a swing to the left would inevitably have an effect on the Social Democratic attitute in important areas.

The second lesson is one to do with individuals. A number of election results show that voters like to support politicians who have demonstrated their ability to lead and govern, who act on the basis of reason, and that they do not fall for popular appeals or exaggerated claims from others if such a local government exists. This is shown by the results from Fredriksberg, Gentofte and Hilleroed, and these three localities are not the only examples. This means that the voters are saying that for them the election is a question of confidence, and the politicians should be in no doubt that the Folketing election will to a great extent also be a vote of confidence. The question is who the voters will believe to have the ability and the will to lead government. What policy do people believe in? Who do people believe in?

FINLAND

VAYRYNEN NOTES IMPORTANCE OF SOVIET CONFIDENCE

PM261231 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 21 Nov 81 p 16

[Jan-Anders Ekstroem report: "Soviet Confidence Being Ignored"]

[Text] Kuopio -- According to Center party Chairman Paavo Vayrynen, the debate surrounding the presidential election has shown that "President Kekkonen's long work of education" has not borne fruit. According to Vayrynen, People are at present ignoring the importance of Soviet confidence in Finland, contrary to the president's oft-repeated reminders.

"It is being claimed that Kekkonen has gotten foreign policy into such good shape that anybody at all could look after it. People are saying that it is now possible to choose a president for internal political reasons. There is good reason to take a serious look at these erroneous views which are common among Finland's citizens," Vayrynen said.

According to Vayrynen, we should take an even more serious look at the fact that "conscious attempts are being made" to strengthen these views and to use them for political ends.

"I stress once again that the election of the republic's president is primarily a foreign policy decision. We should strive to elect -- expressly bearing in mind the formulation of foreign policy -- the best possible person to fill this leadership post: the most competent, the most experienced and the most deserving. It is precisely in this decision that it is important to remember President Urho Kekkonen's lessons," Vayrynen said.

He also pointed to the paradox which President Kekkonen often pointed to: the greater the confidence the Soviet Union has in us, the better we are able to look after our interests in the West. President Kekkonen has also stressed that there are no permanent achievements in foreign policy. Confidence must be maintained through ongoing, consistent and persistent work, Vayrynen said.

Vayrynen only expressed these views as "certain general reminders." He promised to go into the matter in greater detail today when the party's delegates will make a recommendation about who should be selected as the Center party's presidential candidate.

NORWAY

AFTENPOSTEN WELCOMES U.S. 'DETENTE PLAN'

PM260925 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 20 Nov 81 p 2

[Editorial: "The U.S. Peace Strategy"]

[Text] President Ronald Reagan deserves all the praise he has received from West Europe for his disarmament offer to Moscow. For the first time since he took over as leader of the American superpower he has dealt with an area of foreign policy in a convincingly confidence inspiring way. He has gone a long way to disposing of the worries which have been expressed in Europe and the United States over the great importance he has attached to strengthening the U.S. military potential. The content of Reagan's speech on Wednesday morning is an encouraging sign that disarmament will form an important part of the new president's foreign policy.

Those in power in Moscow reacted swiftly to President Reagan's demarche. They gave a clear 'nyet' to his proposal to rid Europe of medium-range nuclear missiles. This negative reaction is by no means surprising. In an interview with the West German weekly DER SPIEGEL, President Brezhnev made it clear that the Soviet Union will not dismantle its SS missiles if the United States refrains from deploying similar weapons in West Europe. But this official rejection of President Reagan's challenge does not necessarily mean that it will not be studied with interest in the Kremlin. It is at the negotiating table, once the two superpowers meet in Geneva, 30 November, that we will see whether Moscow is taking Reagan's challenge seriously.

Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has enthusiastically described President Reagan's plan for the negotiations as "the U.S. peace strategy." The fact that the West German Government chief uses such strong words is not only due to the point about the medium-range missiles in Reagan's speech. He is also referring to Reagan's wish to discuss strategic nuclear arms limitation with the Russians and to the President's assurance that "the United States will be willing to listen to and assess proposals from the other side" in Geneva. Thus this is not an all-or-nothing offer from Reagan. It leaves room for opportunities for a serious U.S. assessment of Soviet ideas on how military tension in Europe can be reduced.

U.S. allies will note this positive U.S. approach to the negotiations with great satisfaction.

With his detente plan President Reagan has wrenched the initiative from President Brezhnev, who arrives in Bonn over the weekend for a meeting with Federal Chancellor Schmidt. The U.S. demarche has robbed the Soviet Union of a good deal of the propaganda value of Brezhnev's visit. As on so many occasions in the past the Soviet guest is bound to give solemn assurances that he will do all he can to halt the arms race. But he will not seem credible if he totally ignores President Reagan's remarkable speech. It is up to the Soviet Union to give millions of Europeans new hope that /both/ [word italicized] superpowers are willing to disarm in practice and not just in words.

PAPER NOTES POSITIVE ASPECTS OF REAGAN OFFER

[Text] President Reagan himself has called his proposals and offers to the Soviet leader on nuclear arms limitation a historic step. Reactions in the West have expressed pleasure and optimism. We would also like to express our pleasure, but think that there is every reason to keep a tight rein on the optimism as far as the actual issue is concerned -- the removal of nuclear arms in East and West.

Part of the pleasure is that the major powers now look as if they are taking more account of public opinion than in the past. This means that public opinion is important and that there is a point in saying what one thinks. Nor can there be any reason to doubt that the superpowers also have a deeply felt need to improve mutual relations and contribute to creating a more secure world. But we run the risk of rejoicing too soon if we believe that the major powers are obliging European opinion merely for our beauty.

Neither the United States nor the Soviet Union can afford to bear the economic burden which our century's symbols of power place on society. The use or the nonuse of nuclear arms -- either they will remain primitive signs of who is the stronger, or they will completely annihilate us sooner or later -- is the paralyzing thought which causes the frustration of our age. But now suddenly there is a gentle hand brushing away the despair and uncertainty simply for the sake of goodwill.

Hardly. It is rather that the social consequences of security and military policy are forcing the major powers to the negotiating table. Reagan must face the fact that he is not going to get the defense budget he originally envisaged or, more correctly, the budget which the arms industry and military planners said was necessary. There is a paradox here: It is ironic that the U.S. administration's economic policies are knocking the ground from under its own defense policy. The arms industry is dependent on private capital and that capital's profit-making capacity. But when confidence in the U.S. Government's economic line falters, capital suddenly becomes reluctant. In such a situation reduced public income must cover defense spending to a greater extent than envisaged.

The Soviet Union has a different social system. But there too the economic problems are becoming acute, though they have different causes from the U.S. problems. One can therefore be quite sure that people in the Soviet Union are right to claim that belts can be further tightened if necessary. But as long as U.S. farmers and manufacturers sell grain and combine harvesters to the Soviet Union and gas and oil leave the Soviet Union for the West, this reveals that the reality is somewhat different from the picture which official announcements are intended to paint.

From the viewpoint of the West's security policy Reagan's demarche has had another positive effect -- West Europe and the United States are once again in line.

Reagan has found it wisest to repair the damage which his careless demarche on the neutron bomb and his speculations on the possible effects of a limited nuclear war inflicted on the alliance in the middle of its preparations for the forthcoming negotiations on nuclear missiles in Europe.

We believe that the proposals which Reagan has now made to the Soviet Union are unrealistic. They form part of the preliminary skirmishes, in the same way as the Soviet preliminary gambits. A zero option is hardly likely to survive the first day of the negotiations. The views of what are strategic and what are tactical weapons are much too divergent for this to be possible. The asymmetry is great -- both in the two sides' composition of their armed forces and in the geographical considerations they have been constructed to meet. But what has happened before the negotiations start in Geneva already shows that the two sides, each in its own way, have expressed a clear desire to create good conditions for talking together. This is what is positive.

The actual results will be a long time in coming. We should not expect concrete answers to arms questions which affect Europe in isolation until the two sides also meet to discuss their total strategic nuclear forces.

SWEDEN

VKP'S LARS WERNER CHIDES SOVIETS, HITS U.S.

PM261237 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 21 Nov 81 p 6

[Aake Ekdahl report: "Constructive Soviet Criticism"]

[Excerpt] Soedertaelue, 20 Nov -- "We feel disappointed when violations are committed in the name of socialism, but U.S. imperialism is the enemy of the people and the greatest threat to world peace!"

This was how Left Party-Communist [VKP] leader Lars Werner apportioned the risks of war between the two superpowers, when he opened the VPK congress in Soedertaelue Friday [20 November].

Moscow's TASS and Beijing's NCNA had reporters on the spot to cable home what the VPK leader had to say about communism in Sweden. It was what Werner called constructive criticism of Soviet violations, and a hellfire-and-brimstone attack on NATO and the United States. The best calculated attack was to do with nuclear arms.

"We are all just as afraid of nuclear missiles, regardless of whether they have SS-20 or Pershing written on them," he said. Werner warned all those trying to use the Soviet Union's violation of Swedish territory for attacks on and campaigns against the peace movement. He was here thinking primarily of the Moderate Coalition party which had made pointed statements against the peace movement in the last few days. "The peace movement needs more people from different parties and organizations. The preservation of world peace is not a question merely for communists but for everyone," he said. "It is also very important that we defend our country's neutrality and nonalignment. It is important to unmask those 'who know where we belong' and who want to move Sweden closer to NATO," the VPK leader said, referring to Defense Minister Torsten Gustafsson's remarks.

He then voiced his support for the skepticism shown by the Soviet Union toward President Reagan's demarche concerning the so-called zero option in the negotiations between the major powers in Geneva 30 November. "Reagan is making an unashamed attempt to bring about the position of military strength in Europe for which the United States is striving. It is not a zero option since not a single NATO nuclear weapon in Europe would disappear. It is merely an attempt to mislead public opinion and divert its attention from NATO's arsenals, which are already massive," Werner said.

CARRINGTON VIEWS ON NATO, SINAI PARTICIPATION

PRESS ASSOCIATION Report

[By Simon Walters, PA Parliamentary staff]

[Text] Lord Carrington today refused to be drawn into the row over whether NATO had plans to fire a nuclear warning shot to the Russians in the event of war. But the foreign secretary was 'satisfied' the Soviet Union was in no doubt as to how NATO would respond to any invasion of Western Europe. He told the Commons Select Committee on Foreign Affairs there was no need for a special meeting of NATO chiefs to sort out confusion over the warning shot plan. NATO chiefs met regularly and the matter was almost certainly discussed in detail at a recent meetings, he said.

"I do not think that to the general public you can go into detail as to what the NATO response would be in any given situation," he said. When pressed for his own view of the row over the warning shot plan, Lord Carrington said politicians under interrogation did not always have "the right words in front of them" and he did not want to run the risk of being misunderstood. "There surely should be no misunderstanding on the part of the Soviet Union on the consequences of invasion of NATO. I do not think there is much worry about the Soviet Union misunderstanding that."

The foreign secretary also said he was opposed to nuclear free zones in NATO countries. It would be unfair if certain countries in the alliance were exempt from the risk of attack.

BBC Interview

LD251202 London BBC Domestic Service in English 2200 GMT 23 Nov 81

[From "The World Tonight" program presented by David Sells]

[Excerpts] Britain, and three other EEC countries today agreed to send peacekeeping forces to the Middle East. They'll participate in a small, multinational army to police the Sinai after Israeli troops have completed their withdrawal next April and handed it back to Egypt. The declaration was coy and positively byzantine in its ambiguities. It seemed to be an attempt to propitiate all the Arab states who declined to recognize Egypt's peace treaty with Israel and the Camp David agreements proposing Palestinian Arab autonomy in the West Bank and Gaza. The EEC contingents are anyway of token size only, so I asked Lord Carrington why we were bothering at all.

[Begin Recording] [Carrington] The Americans, and the Israelis and Egyptians, I think, set a good deal of store by having an international force which is fairly representative. If you remember, in the Egypt-Israeli peace treaty it was contemplated that there would be a United Nations force, and this was vetoed, and consequently United Nations forces are not possible, and I think that the Americans and the other two wish to put together a force which looks internationally credible because of the participants who are in it.

[Question] Are we aiming then to develop something separate from Camp David? Do we have that in mind?

[Answer] What we've said is that this is separate from Camp David, which indeed it is. This is as a result of the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty. Our views about Camp David have really been fairly widely advertised.

We wish Camp David every good fortune, and we've done everything that we can not to hinder and to help, but we have made plain in the Venice Declaration what our views about what an ultimate settlement in the Middle East must contain -- the two principles which we've talked about for a long time -- and in the end I think we believe that an acceptance by both sides of those two principles is the way in which a comprehensive peace settlement will be reached.

[Question] But in the short term we have specifically linked participation in this force with the Venice Declaration, although Mr Begin in Israel has categorically stated that this was not acceptable to the Israelis, and on the other hand the Arabs, through the Arab League, have advised us against participation.

[Answer] No. You haven't if I may say so got that quite right. What we have done is to say that without any conditions at all. we are prepared to take part in this force, but we don't want there to be any misunderstanding that our policy has changed, and therefore we have spelled out what our policy is in a straightforward and honorable way.

[Question] But aware, nevertheless, that the Israeli prime minister has stated that if we were to link our participation, as we have done in this statement....

[Answer -- interrupting] It's not linked. What we've done is to state what our policy is. Mr Begin is very well aware, and the Israeli Government, of what the European policy is and what was in the Venice Declaration. I don't think for one moment that Mr Begin would expect us, coming in and offering to take part in this force, to renege on what we've already said. I'm sure he wouldn't.

[Question] There was a very interesting reference in the statement about participation to the possible use of this or a similar force in other Israeli-occupied territories. Is that a thought for the future?

[Answer] No. That was in the Venice Declaration, too. We've always said that we would be prepared to take part in peacekeeping forces if it helped and it was on the way toward a comprehensive peace settlement. There's nothing new there.

[Question] But by going into the Sinai with a multinational force, and stating that we're prepared to use it in other occupied territories, we are really thinking of the possibility of the West Bank, the Golan?

[Answer] But this has always been the position of Europe. We've always said that if there was a peace settlement there -- and we hope that there will be -- we would be prepared to do our bit, as we are now.

[Question] Do you worry at all about the apparent Arab opposition to our participation in the force?

[Answer] No. I think that the Arab countries will understand why we're doing it. After all, as I said earlier, we made plain that our position is unchanged and that we have not altered our views, and in the conversations that we've had with our Arab friends I think they've understood that our reasons for doing this are because we believe that it acutally does help and that there is the hope that if all this comes off, as we hope it will, then we are on the way to a further breakthrough in the appalling position which exists in the Middle East, which is satisfactory neither to Israel, nor to the Arab countries, nor to anybody. I think all of us want to see a peace settlement.

[Question] Do you think there are perhaps a number of Arab countries who sympathize, perhaps, more privately with such a force and our participation in it than they're prepared to admit in public?

[Answer] I think there are a number of Arab countries that understand full well the reasons why we want to do this. Yes I do. [end recording]

DEFENSE MINISTER VIEWS 'ZERO OPTION' ARMS TALKS

[Text] Britain, like the FRG and the other north European countries, has not been spared by the pacifist movements. People in the Labor Party ranks have gone so far as to propose that old Britain which, with France, is the only country in Western Europe to have nuclear energy firepower, should take the initiative in unilateral disarmament. But however strong the movement, and when convictions which she regards as essential are at stake, Mrs Thatcher is not a person to allow herself to be frightened. Nor is her Defense Secretary John Nott. On the eve of Leonid Brezhnev's visit to Bonn, Jean-Louis Arnaud interviewed this former commerical banker, who is regarded as one of the most determined men in the cabinet, on the British Government's determination, the modernization plans on the other side of the channel and British views on collaboration among allies, with France in particular. He also asked him what he thinks of the famous "zero option" (abandonment of all Eurostrategic weapons in the East and in the West) which Ronald Reagan pulled out of his hat in a spectacular way last week when Brezhnev was packing his bags to go and meet with Chancellor Schmidt.

John Nott: I fully support this "zero option." We are going to tell the Soviets: If you are prepared to dismantle your SS-20, SS-4 and SS-5 missiles, to withdraw and destroy them, we will not pursue the modernization of our theater nuclear forces. I am not saying that we will succeed, but in setting that objective we are clearly demonstrating our sincerity.

LE MATIN: Do you think that the Russians could be won over by that proposal?

John Nott: That's their business. We must show that our ultimate objective is to secure an arms balance at the lowest possible level. The lower the level -- provided it is balanced and can be monitored on both sides -- the better the world will be and the sooner we will devote our spending to more desirable ends.

LE MATIN: To what do you attribute the Europeans' growing anxiety and the parallel development of pacifist movements, especially in Britain?

John Nott: To a combination of events: The plans to deploy cruise missiles, our own plans to modernize our deterrent force with Trident, the invasion of Afghanistan, the situation in Poland, our own civil defense efforts with preparations down to parish level and, of course, the new American administration's attitude. Unlike the Carter administration, Reagan has given wide publicity to his own anxieties and to what is termed the widening gap between Soviet and U.S. military capabilities. This is what has led people to feel that the dangers in the world are greater than they thought.

LE MATIN: Do you share the American anxieties?

John Nott: Certainly, and I am deeply disturbed by the idea that a "window of vulnerability" is going to be opened in the course of the next 5 years since, even by stepping up our spending on conventional armaments, we cannot prevent the gap from widening even further during this period.

LE MATIN: Would you say that the West's security is not assured at the present time?

John Nott: I would say that we are not adequately equipped at the present time from one end to the other of our range of facilities.

LE MATIN: In these conditions how can a feeling of security be restored?

John Nott: First by continuing the modernization of our conventional and nuclear forces. But at the same time by convincing people that we are not doing it for the pleasure of adding one new weapon after another. We must combine the modernization of our facilities with a real effort to secure multilateral arms reduction. That is why the theater nuclear arms talks which are going to start between the Soviets and Americans at the end of this month are so important for convincing European public opinion that we desperately want to bring about a general reduction in armaments on the two sides and reverse the arms race, which is madness.

LE MATIN: Is it not inconsistent to condemn this madness and modernize at full speed?

John Nott: All our recent experience shows that unless we modernize our conventional and nuclear weapons the USSR will refuse to sit down at the negotiating table. Moreover why should it do so if it thinks that it can maintain its qualitative and quantitative superiority without the Europeans' doing anything to restore the balance? That is why the NATO dual decision (to modernize and negotiate) is the right one, since it shows the Soviets that we will not allow them to further extend their advantage.

LE MATIN: How can the need for public debate in our democracies be reconciled with the principle of deterrence, which is to leave the adversary in ignorance?

John Nott: It is important to differentiate between two things. On the one hand it can only be advantageous for the USSR to hear me state, as I am doing to you, that Britain is determined to go ahead and modernize its nuclear force. That increases deterrence and can only help it. On the other hand there are some aspects of deterrence, and more especially the plan which we would follow should deterrence fail, which I think, should not be debated in public.

LE MATIN: Nonetheless that was done recently in Washington with conflicting statements being made.

John Nott: I think the media quoted Reagan's statement out of context, making it conspicuous and hurriedly spreading it round the world. I also think that the statements made by Haig and Weinberger could easily be reconciled, but it is true that the way in which they were presented made them seem contradictory. Whatever the truth was, that damaged deterrence. General Rogers, the supreme allied commander, Europe, was absolutely right when he said the other day that he did not see what was to be gained by publicly discussing what NATO would or would not do in the event of conflict. That can only undermine deterrence.

LE MATIN: As far as Britain is concerned, do you advocate maintaining a nuclear deterrent at all costs?

John Nott: Without any doubt, I think it is necessary for this country to maintain its independent strategic nuclear deterrent.

LE MATIN: At any cost?

John Nott: No, not at any cost. But the cost of that method must be compared with the costs of other defense methods. Our program to build the Tornado, the new fighter-bomber which we are constructing with the Germans and Italians, will cost twice as much as the Trident system which is to replace the existing Polaris deterrence system.

LE MATIN: Is there an alternative to the American Trident for your strike force? Cruise missiles for instance?

John Nott: No, and that is what we examined once again last month. We think that only ballistic missiles launched by a submarine ensure a credible independent deterrent. In our view the only question is which Trident to choose: the C4, which is at present operational in the United States: or the future, more sophisticated D5.

LE MATIN: When will you announce your decision?

John Nott: Probably early next year. There is no hurry. The argument in favor of the D5 is that, despite the higher initial investment cost, it could ultimately prove less costly because we would have the same system as the Americans and maintenance costs would therefore be reduced.

LE MATIN: If France and Britain had constructed their missiles together, would the cost not have been reduced?

John Nott: Yes, but in the nuclear sphere we are talking but I am t sure that we are making much progress.

LE MATIN: To what do you attribute this lack of progress?

John Nott: I think you are leading me into delicate areas.

LE MATIN: Yes, but they are revealing.

John Nott: I would be tempted to attribute it to veiled mutual suspicion. Each of us is tempted by access to the other's technology, but when it comes to the real point of cooperation the aim is to acquire the other's technology rather than to pool technologies.... Moreover it is true that there is a historical tie between us and the United States in the nuclear sphere. Our arrangements with the Americans are good. We are satisfied with them, but I am not hostile to cooperation with France in the nuclear technology sphere. I would tend to favor it and I intend to discuss the matter with Mr Hernu when I see him in Paris shortly.

LE MATIN: Why have you not yet met?

John Nott: Probably because we were both very busy and, I think, because during the Franco-British summit in London in September Mr Mitterrand did not want to include defense in the talks.

LE MATIN: The golden age of Franco-British military cooperation was 10 years ago. Is there any reason for reviving it?

John Nott: I would like nothing better. But I am more attracted by a division of specialization between us than by cooperation on one project, which I do not think would necessarily ultimately be a source of savings.

LE MATIN: Whatever form the cooperation takes, it presupposes a political will. Does that will exist?

John Nott: To be perfectly frank I think that it does. I think that close cooperation between France and Britain in the defense sphere would be extremely important, especially now that Mitterrand has adopted a firm defense policy. We warmly welcome that, and it creates the right atmosphere for very useful talks.

PAPANDREOU GOES TO PARIS VISIT,UK EEC MEETING

Meets Mitterrand

NC251224 Paris AFP in English 1209 GMT 25 Nov 81

[Text] Paris, 25 Nov (AFP) -- New Greek Socialist Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou arrived here from Athens today for an eight-hour stopover en route for London, and was later lunching with French Socialist President Francois Mitterrand. Mr Papandreou was welcomed at Orly Airport by French External Trade Minister Michel Jobert.

Paris Press Conference

NC252001 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1900 GMT 25 Nov 81

[Excerpts] Official France welcomed today Prime Minister Papandreou on the occasion of his brief visit to Paris on his way to London for the EEC conference. French President Mitterrand gave a luncheon in Mr Papandreou's honor.

According to the armed forces radio correspondent Theodhosopoulos, Mr Mitterrand and Mr Papandreou referred to the critical questions that concern our country and the situation prevailing in the region, and particularly in the Mediterranean area. From the Greek side, Greece's positions on the question of Greek-Turkish relations and on the question of NATO were put forward. Mr Mitterrand showed understanding for Greece's position toward NATO. There was also exchange of views on defense questions, and each side explained its positions in this field.

Speaking to newsmen after the working luncheon, Mr Papandreou stressed: Indeed, I am deeply moved because during my long talk with Mr Mitterrand and his colleagues we had the opportunity to examine the problems which concern Europe and socialism. Both of us arrived at the conclusion that these two changes, in France and in Greece now are historical steps, I repeat, probably historical steps of huge importance, probably decisive for the course of the countries of all Europe. With this sense of responsibility, President Mitterrand, his colleagues and myself and my colleagues are viewing the question of change. And we frankly believe that this road that opens for France and Greece will lead to peace, progress and change.

Asked if he has anything to state on the eve of the EEC summit conference in London, Mr Papandreou said: We did not discuss this question very much with President Mitterrand. We talked about the problems which are being faced by the new Greek Government which is promoting socialist transformation. Problems which, I would say, refer to the change in the EEC rules will be discussed in London tomorrow and the following day. And the Greek side will be given the opportunity, within this framework, to raise the Greek problem as well, as the Greek people know it from last Sunday's government policy statement.

Answering a question as to whether President Mitterrand will visit Greece, the Greek prime minister said: Yes, he will visit Greece. I have invited him, and he has accepted. But, naturally, since he is the president of the republic, the invitation must come from the Greek president, Mr Karamanlis. But there is no doubt that the visit will take place in the near future, although the date has not yet been fixed.

The Greek prime minister answered more questions that were put to him. These questions referred to our country's relations with NATO, our country's position toward Israel, the positions of Greece, France in the defense field and so forth.

Referring to our relations with NATO, Mr Papandreou said that the problem is both major and quite complicated and this is not the moment to examine it here.

On the EEC, the Greek prime minister said that Greece does not object to the EEC decision for the participation of European military forces in the Sinai peace force. However, it is made clear that the Greek Government does not accept the Camp David agreements as a way to resolve the Middle East problem. The Greek Government believes that if the Palestinians do not participate in the solution of the problem this problem cannot be solved. Mr. Papandreou denied that Greece is observing an anti-Israeli attitude and made it clear that we are in favor of freedom and self-determination for all the peoples and the ethnic communities in the region.

In connection with nationalizations in our country, the prime minister said that the problem is common with France and that its solution is proceeding very well. He added: I am sure that we will proceed very well in Greece too, just as in France.

After the working luncheon, the prime minister went to the French Ministry of Defense and met with Defense Minister Hernu. During the meeting, they discussed questions of reinforcing Greece's armament with modern technological material for all three branches of the armed forces. Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos was present at this meeting which decided, in principle, the exchange of military experts during the coming months. These experts will study the question and later a decision will be made on the way of implementation of this reinforcement. During the meeting, Mr Hernu, who has known Mr Papandreou from the past as well as from the Corfu socialist meeting, spoke very highly about the Greek prime minister to whom he gave a medal.

Comments on EEC Meeting

[Excerpts] [Question] Mr Prime Minister, many people would like to know how this, your first confrontation -- after the election -- with the other nine [EC] leaders, went.

[Answer] I was given the opportunity, right at the beginning, to present the Greek problem in reference to our relations with the community. I gave a short summary description of the economic situation which our country faces. I made it clear that under present conditions -- meaning the fixed prices for agricultural products and the big inflation rate we have, as well as the major institutional differences that exist between our Mediterranean economy, a regional economy, and that of northern Europe -- the rules which apply to the community are rules which can perhaps be applied painlessly to developed countries of northern Europe but they clearly cause considerable damage to an economy like ours. And, I believe, to an economy like that of Spain or Portugal tomorrow.

I explained that the PASOK government desires to proceed with a plebiscite, to which our people are entitled and which has been exercised by all the countries added to the Common Market. I explained, naturally, that this is the prerogative of the president of the republic; however, the goal of the plebiscite is to establish a different relationship, a special agreement, a special status. I emphasized that insofar as this plebiscite may require time or be impossible to hold, our government will be obliged to insist -- through its policy within all community organizations -- on a different treatment for Greece, and that without this different treatment in applying the Common Market rules, serious damage will be done to the economy of Greece which we as a government cannot accept. There was no discussion. This was a presentation of views. They promised that the question would be fully examined at some future stage and not at this meeting.

Naturally, they would also need a certain amount of time to think and study this new position of Greece.

There is also the vast question of adjustment of the rules applying to the participation of each of the countries in the community's budget. Clearly the matter polarizes the situation within the framework of the 10 and discussion on it will be continued tomorrow. It is difficult for me to see a balanced solution of this very difficult issue over which there is polarization among the large, strong countries of Europe.

I feel and believe that we have been given an opportunity to present the Greek problem, that this problem was understood, that there will be a possibility -- I hope in the near future -- to have the Greek matters discussed and, I hope, these positions and efforts can be solved. One must bear in mind that the national income, the gross national product of the member states, is not only at a standstill, but there could also be a negative development during this period. Under these conditions, it is very difficult for one to forecast that the EEC will proceed with more open-handedness toward the weak and relatively underdeveloped areas such as our country. We are taking up the battle and we will continue within the EEC organizations and, naturally, we always bear in mind the possibility -- which does not rest with me -- of a possible plebiscite which could lead to a change in relations with the Common Market.

I must state that today, this first day, they listened to us without taking any positions. If a battle was waged, then it was a silent battle. There was no question of dialogue with Greece. This was only a presentation of our positions. My impression is that truly there will be hard negotiations but I sincerely believe that there are considerable margins, always bearing in mind that we are in the middle of a hard and protracted economic crisis which does not make things any easier. I could say that both the foreign minister and I made a strong presentation and irrespective of future developments on a possible plebiscite, I believe that we must have some improvement of our relations with the Common Market. I cannot forecast the future but Greece, the Government of Greece, tonight took a position, made a presentation and, for the first time, presented the Greek problem in its true dimensions.

PAPER QUESTIONS POSITION ON SINAI PEACE FORCE

[From the "Radical" column: "Why the Retrogression?"]

[Text] It is definitely a sensation that the Greek Government departed from its initially declared positions in accepting participation in the Sinai peace force of four EEC countries (France, Britain, Italy, Netherlands). The wording of the decision does not change much to the goal being pursued in deploying troops nor does the explicit distinction from the procedures envisaged by the anti-Arabian Camp David agreements. The EEC goal is to back U.S. positions in the region as the four countries which are willingly sending troops to the Sinai have clearly hinted. However, the Arab people do not seem to share the reasons cited in the communique of the 10 EEC member states. On the contrary, they believe that the participation of the four EEC countries in the Sinai force expresses support for the Camp David agreements and cooperation with the American [as published] occupation of Arab territories; this can be seen from the official Syrian Government protest to the Italian ambassador in Damascus. The government of our country, which has very rightly declared that it favors the maintenance and even further development of the traditional friendly relations with the Arab world, should have been more careful with the handling of the question and, at any rate, should not have disregarded questions of principle or Arab reaction.

SCHMIDT: ECONOMIC SITUATION REQUIRES EEC UNITY

[Text] [Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, you wanted to prevent German contributions to the Common cashbox from growing without end. Other people say that you cannot develop. Did you prevail in this respect in London?

[Answer] We introduced no motions. We were the only country that did not introduce motions to promote national interests in some field or other. However in view of the fact that we pay annually over DM6 billion more to the community than we got from it, we said that this cannot continue like this without any limitation. And everyone actually realized this.

[Question] So far much has been settled with money in the community. Now there is hardly any money left to be distributed. Did you realize in London that the policies of the community cannot be continued unless there is money as a lubricant?

[Answer] There is much more money available in this budget than in the last one -- and not just sections of the budget increased for inflation but a truly higher budget. A considerable part of the German contribution is being used for this. It is true, though, that in the difficult financial and economic situation in which most European Community states find themselves -- and some are much worse off than we are -- nobody can take any more; there is no fat left to cut. The important thing is for Europe not to lose its unity in such a quarrel. The world economic situation certainly requires cooperation with North America in all these economic fields, and it certainly requires European unity. The European states cannot afford to fall apart in petty quarreling in the face of the powerful Soviet Union in the East and the great American alliance partner in the West.

Genscher Comments

[Excerpt] Bonn, 28 Nov (DPA) -- In Bonn today FDP Chairman and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher expressed his concern at the present state of the European Community. Presenting EC President Gaston Thorn with his party's Wolfgang Doering medal, Genscher said: "Europe is going through a particularly difficult phase in which the community's ability to act and its internal cohesion are seriously threatened." In this time of challenge Europe needs personalities who will resist national egoisms and resolutely defend the community interests.

SCHMIDT SAYS USSR READY TO 'NEGOTIATE SERIOUSLY'

The chancellor said that the pressure of time in the Geneva talks applies to both sides. The FRG also stressed to the United States that less than 2 years remain for the negotiations to reach an outcome. Schmidt emphasized that the Federal Government and he personally had linked their political fate to the NATO dual decision. Thus, this also meant with the negotiating part of this decision. "If there are no serious negotiations -- whether on one side or the other -- then a lot will be at stake for us as well," the chancellor said.

The chancellor said that after his talks with the Soviet state and party leader, Leonid Brezhnev, he could foresee that a solution to the missile problem might be reached in the first phase of the Geneva talks if at the same time agreement is reached in principle for the next phase, in which the remaining medium-range weapons would have to be balanced against each other. The chancellor said that the Federal Government has painstakingly cooperated "down to the last sentence" on the Americans' negotiating plan for Geneva and that it would continue to cooperate within the NATO alliance if positions had to be changed during the negotiations. This is necessary, because there can be no compromise if both world powers insist on sticking to their initial positions.

The chancellor expects his meeting with Brezhnev to have positive effects on the meeting planned between him and the chairman of the GDR State Council, Erich Honecker.

The text of the interview was provided in advance by the radio station.

GENSCHER OPTIMISTIC ABOUT DISARMAMENT TALKS

[Text] Hamburg, 28 Nov (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) has expressed optimism about the disarmament negotiations beginning in Geneva on Monday between the Soviet Union and the United States. In an interview published in the Hamburg news magazine DER SPIEGEL, Genscher said that never before had such a concrete definition of the subject of the negotiations been possible. He said he therefore believes that the time remaining before the deployment of American medium-range missiles in Europe at the end of 1983 is sufficient to achieve results.

"Why should there not be step-by-step negotiations?" Genscher asked, pointing out that Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev had hinted at this possibility with the aim of bringing about the total abandonment by both sides of land-based medium-range weapons. If it were possible to agree on such an abandonment by both sides, this would have an effect on future disarmament negotiations.

"We really do want to start afresh in this important sphere," Genscher said. The political and psychological significance of this should not be underestimated. In many areas of disarmament, however, there could have been more progress if the Soviets had been more prepared to accept verification. Thus openness and verification are the main subjects of future disarmament talks and negotiations."

To the question of whether he sees in disarmament policy a new justification for the existence of the SPD/FDP alliance, he answered: "Unequivocally yes."

SPD'S EPPLER COMMENTS ON SOVIET PROPOSALS

[Text] Augsburg, 28 Nov (DPA) -- SPD Presidium member Erhard Eppler on Saturday warned of the danger of "simply sweeping off the table" the Soviet state and party leader's proposal on disarmament. Eppler made the comments in an address to some 3500 participants in a peace march through the Augsburg town center, which the town youth league, the SPD local district party and the local trade union federation [DGB] called upon people to participate in.

Eppler said that he thought the proposal of a moratorium -- to freeze weapons arsenals during negotiations and to withdraw some of the Soviet missiles in advance -- was "worth looking at closely."

CARSTENS VIEWS PROSPECT OF REAGAN VISIT TO EUROPE

[Excerpt] Bonn, 27 Nov (DPA) -- Federal President Karl Carstens would welcome it very much if U.S. President Reagan carried out his intention of visiting Europe soon. In an interview with DIE WELT (Saturday edition) Carstens said that this is necessary "so that everybody here can satisfy himself about the attitude of the United States." He is certain that the anti-American note which can occasionally be heard in the Federal Republic will not lead to a permanent clouding of German-U.S. relations.

BUNDESTAG DEPUTIES OPPOSE DEFENSE BUDGET INCREASE

[Text] Hamburg, 28 Nov (DPA) -- The SPD deputies on the Budestag Budget Committee are rejecting the increase in the FRG's share of the NATO infrastructure program. It is to be increased from the existing DM 250 million to DM 500 million next year. DER SPIEGEL reports in its latest edition that the reason given by the SPD politicians for their attitude is that part of the money is for construction projects which would be needed for the stationing of the new American medium-range missiles in the Federal Republic. The SPD deputies argue that there should be no preparations for deployment while the Americans and Russians are negotiating in Geneva on a zero option and moratorium.

DEFENSE MINISTRY DENIES BUDGET SHORTFALLS

[Text] Bonn, 29 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Defense Ministry strongly denied a report in WELT AM SONNTAG today that there are identifiable shortfalls in the defense budget up to 1986 totalling DM7 billion. The newspaper referred to a financial document within the ministry that says that commitments for this amount cannot be honored.

A ministry spokesman asserted that the 5-year plan for the Federal Army for the years 1983-1987 will be presented to the political leadership of the Bundestag by military officials this coming week. This document is in complete harmony with the financial plans and thus maintains financial expectations. Heiko Leopold, Defense Ministry spokesman, termed the report on new shortfalls "pure nonsense."

FDP DEFENSE EXPERT CALLS FOR INTERNAL REFORMS

[Text] Bonn, 29 Nov (DPA) -- The FDP expects Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD) to make early decisions on structural reforms of the Federal Army. Speaking with DPA on Sunday in Bonn, the FDP spokesman on security policy, Juergen Moellemann, stressed the need for such reforms and referred to the changed financial and technological preconditions for defense planning. Initially the leadership and administrative structure of the Federal Army would have to be noticeably slimmed down.

This applies to the Defense Ministry itself, but also to offices and staffs. Thousands of posts have to be cut in the leadership and staff levels, and some of those posts are urgently needed for combat troops. A second step is the perfectly possible continuation of cadre formation (this involved retraining a unit's basic personnel and filling it with reservists only in emergencies) in army units, in the territorial defense and in the air force and the navy.

Moellemann said that in a relatively small country with excellent traffic connections and constantly improving early recognition and early warning systems, it is quite possible to quickly fill up smoothly functioning cadre units with well trained reservists, as, for example, the Israelis do.

The FDP politician demanded that this structural change go hand in hand with the introduction of a differentiated period of military service. A short basic service of about 9 to 12 months would be perfectly adequate in various units if it were to be followed by more frequent defense exercises in the cadre units. The third measure would have to be a rethinking of arming. In the future, highly complex, expensive large-scale weapons systems should be introduced in only a limited way. They are neither easy to pay for nor easy to keep operational by average soldiers in battle conditions. Furthermore, in a purely defensive army one should concentrate in any case on antitank and antiaircraft systems and on infantry components.

Moellemann said that the proportions are no longer correct in this area. He suggested that the cadre formation, the resultant reduction of the number of combat ready troops and the change in the arming strategy should be made a subject of a Western initiative in the Vienna troop reduction negotiations in which a reduction of troops and arms is to be achieved. Thus one would be following the suggestion of U.S. President Reagan's who proposed disarmament reductions not only in the nuclear sphere but also in the conventional sphere.

Moellemann said that changes such as those the FDP suggests for the Federal Army should then take place within the National People's Army of the GDR and in the Soviet armed forces in central Europe, in order to limit offensive capability on both sides and to lessen the existing mistrust about possible surprise attacks.

PAPER SEES NO TANGIBLE RESULTS OF BREZHNEV VISIT

[Claus Gennrich editorial: "The End of all Self-Delusions"]

[Text] The conjurations of success are dying away meekly after Brezhnev's working visit to Bonn. Like the falling autumn leaves, Brezhnev's comparison of the moods, the splendour and high-spirited ambitions of the two previous Bonn meetings in 1973 and 1978 have faded away with the illusions of detente. The toughness with which Brezhnev -- without personal attacks but in the style of a big power ruler -- explained in Bonn the Soviet starting position for the Geneva missile talks leaves no room for German self-delusions. The attempt to deceive his interlocutors by stating that Moscow has never violated the balance has had a sobering effect.

This was what Schmidt had wanted to tell his host. He said it repeatedly. The solemn pledge made in 1978 to be satisfied with an approximate balance in Europe has not been honored. Europe and the Federal Republic are threatened. In this way the federal chancellor indicated the West's preparedness for counterarmament. Brezhnev was prepared for this warning. True, NATO's dual decision has forced the Soviet Union to negotiate. That's why on Monday the Geneva talks will be beginning with Washington. But Brezhnev showed his intention to deny the reason for these negotiations, the violations of the balance, and to blame the other side.

Brezhnev said time and again and had his spokesman Zamyatin state with the arrogance of power that the West would destroy the balance if it implemented counterarmament. Whereas Schmidt considers the pressure of time of the West's deployment decision to be good because the 1983 deadline prevents the Soviets from dodging the negotiations. Moscow wants to stop the clock in order not to have to act according to it. If the West was really intent on implementing counterarmament, Brezhnev had his spokesman say, negotiations would not be very sensible.

Brezhnev appeared on the Bonn stage with the conviction of an innocently threatened man. He stated his desire for peace and let the others assure him that they believed him.

The remarks here and there by Schmidt and the two Union leaders that the acts and presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan threatened confidence in Moscow did not have any effect. That the use of force against Afghanistan was blamed on him only in the style of a set exercise is perhaps the biggest success of Brezhnev's visit fom the Soviet Union. The state and party chief can show his subjects in the worried Asian countries that the respect for his power seems to be unaffected in the West.

This is Soviet realpolitik. It includes threats under the festoons of love for peace. In the case of counterarmament Brezhnev announced serious countermeasures. His statements on the growing danger of war were supposed not only to mirror but to spread fear. His statement that up until now Moscow's missiles were targeted only on military objects and not on residential areas in the Federal Republic, but that following the deployment of new U.S. missiles the Germans would have to face a new situation, also sounded threatening.

But the meeting just must have a result. Like an interpreter Schmidt was trying to convince his host of Reagan's desire for negotiations, but without much success. Now Bonn is interpreting in the Western direction. The Federal Government will convey Brezhnev's question about what the West thinks about taking away all nuclear arms, including the British and French arms, trained on European targets. Brezhnev means by it also tactical "small" nuclear arms.

This shows the Soviet leadership's cleverness to propagate as a move for peace what in reality would entail for it the advantage of being increasingly capable of blackmail. The Soviet Union has in Europe a very large conventional superiority, above all in tanks and troops. To offset this the West needs to have theater nuclear weapons. The tempting proposal that the continent should be freed from all nuclear arms would bring Moscow's superiority even more to bear and would give the Soviet Union the leverage for threatening war with the aim of exerting political pressure.

Among the flowers in Brezhnev's bouquet for Bonn is the already withered blossom of the moratorium. If the West accepted it it would lose the pressure of time by which Moscow could be urged to accept negotiation results on missiles reductions: for the unforseeable duration of the talks there would be no counterarmament. The vague reference to the withdrawal of an undefined part of Soviet medium-range weapons behind the Urals where they would be equally dangerous would not eliminate Soviet superiority either.

The only though not tangible indication of some Soviet flexibility at the Geneva talks lies in Brezhnev's statement that in an arms reduction agreement Soviet missiles in Europe could be reduced by several hundred units. However, Moscow wants to make the respective conditions such as the inclusion of the U.S. forward-based systems a success for itself and it is unclear what arms Moscow would withdraw and what consequences in terms of a threat to other regions in the world this would have.

Now the interpreter is tempted to talk of successes. But these will be achieved in Geneva only if the West does not allow itself to be pushed out of its determination to implement counterarmament.

FRG-SOMALI INVESTMENT AGREEMENT -- Bonn, 27 Nov (DPA) -- The Federal Republic and Somalia have concluded an agreement for the promotion and joint protection of capital investments. The agreement was signed in Bonn on Friday by the Somali minister of planning, Ahmed Habib Ahmed, and State Secretary Lautenschlager of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. According to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs the agreement with Somalia guarantees, like other investment promotion agreements which the Federal Republic has concluded with over 50 countries, the free transfer of capital and earnings. It contains an arbitration clause in case of differences of views and provides for settlement in case of expropriations. [Text] [Hamburg DPA in German 1714 GMT 27 Nov 81 LD]

INTERNAL REFORMS TO BE INSTITUTED IN SDECE

[Jacques Isnard report: "New Reorganization by SDECE"]

[Text] A reorientation of its activities, and departures, or transfers, of intelligence officers have featured in the reorganization now in progress of the Foreign Intelligence and Counterespionage Service (SDECE) which has been decided on by its new director general, Mr Pierre Marion. This internal reform, which mainly concerns the management of the French secret services and the counterespionage branch is taking place at a time when accusations are being leveled in government circles against the behavior deemed undisciplined or even openly hostile on the part of some of the service's associates [collaborateurs] or informants [correspondants] in Africa. We are probably witnessing a reestablishment of control over an organization by its new supervisory authorities following a decade of leadership with undivided power which made it possible for fiefs and factions to spring up within the SDECE and which tolerated a number of serious "blunders" to which some established and senior agents have fallen victim.

The strengthening of the counterespionage branch, over which the Investigations Directorate exercises control, has been the most spectacular aspect of the SDECE's reoganization.

Traditionally, the operational directorate of a secret service -- the Investigations Directorate in the SDECE -- has been divided into an SR (intelligence service) branch and a CE (counterespionage) branch. The counterespionage branch has two tasks -- first, recruitment of agents in the other side's intelligence services in order to find out about the orientation and the motivation of these services' investigations, if need be, by instigating "defections," and, second, protection of either the SDECE intelligence service or of the sources of the Directorate of Territorial Surveillance [DST] which work abroad in order to more effectively check on the bona fides of their contacts and, consequently, in order to ensure the reliability of information received.

Redeployment

Mr Marion plans to redeploy abroad in the course of 1982 the CE's own stations and means, thus resuming a policy pursued by some of his predecessors at the SDECE.

For instance, during what came to be called "Cold War" between East and West, the SDECE had abroad both CE and SR stations which were relatively well developed and independent from one another. Gradually, after the war in Algeria, SDECE stations abroad have become mixed, heads of stations, who often came from the SR, exercising control over their CE counterparts.

Mr Alexandre de Marenches, who was appointed head of French secret services by Georges Pompidou in 1970, maintained this mixed system but also reestablished CE stations in some six "sensitive" countries, such as the Eastern bloc, for instance.

Following the dismissal late in 1976 of Colonel, later general, Yves Choppin de Janvry, the "boss" of the CE central office in Paris, CE stations abroad were again attached to the SR branch and have since ceased to engage in any really separate activities. This change has, at the same time, gone hand in hand with a gradual ascent of SR leaders and with an increase in their influence within the SDECE.

Under the leadership of Colonel, later general, Rene Grignola, the role of the SR increased between 1977 and 1981 without, however, leading to any parallel improvement in the quality of its product.

On the contrary, appraisals became more summary and more dogmatic.

If CE officers are to be believed, the disputed product of the SR's "Africa" section illustrates that unfortunate development, especially following the departure of its head, Col Maurice Robert, who became ambassador to Gabon after being employed for a short time by the local branch of ELF-ERAP [the gasoline and lubricants company of France-Petroleum Exploration and Activities Enterprises.

Machination

The CE's decline was also accompanied by a demand by the "Action" Service -- the SDECE's secular arm -- which was long run by Colonel, later general, Alain de Gaigneron de Marolles prior to his appointment as director of investigations, a post which he occupied less than 1 year.

In Africa, the "action" service has its own network of informants [informateurs], which the CE has sometimes been unable to identify, and it became -- and continues to be -- a stronghold of Col Georges Grillot. The Cercottes camp men, as they are called in connection with the name of their training center at Le Loiret, have engaged in many logistic operations in support of some African leaders without necessarily waiting for the go-ahead from their superiors. They have assisted in the creation of local counter-interference services whose activities have sometimes run counter to those of the French representative of the SDECE.

In fact, the recent events in Chad have caused French Government circles to call in question the behavior of some of SDECE associates [collaborateurs] in Africa connected with some intelligence networks which were established in the past and which still exist.

At the highest level of state authority, it was felt, especially during the night of 28-29 October, that a plot was hatched against these authorities with the aim of creating -- through the dissemination of false information on a hypothetical progress of a Libyan armored column toward Ndjamena -- a state of war between Paris and Tripoli in which Sudan and Egypt would be involved: on the one hand, the Libyans were warned that the entry of French troops into Chad was imminent and, on the other, France was informed of a similar attempt by Libya.

The president's office has since initiated the unraveling of the intricacies of the plot, showing no concern for the SDECE's costly activities in Africa.

It is believed in high places that deception on the part of some ineffectively controlled agents or informants [correspondents] in Africa was aimed at harming France's interests in that part of the world and it is more or less certain that, wittingly or unwittingly, the perpetrators of this "manipulation" have played into the hands of a foreign power by seeking, especially among the press, to cause rumours of a coup in Tripoli to be believed.

By restoring the CE's "offensive" in its prerogatives, missions and organization, Mr Marion is giving himself the means of controlling his SR's sources more effectively, possibly protecting it from itself.

Appraisals

But the SDECE's reorganization has another objective, with the formation of a "planning, forecasting and evaluation" cell which will have the task of making appraisals on the basis of intelligence supplied by the departments and drawing up, evaluating and guiding the intelligence plans.

This appraisal and long-term planning cell is to employ 45 civil servants recruited in 1982 and 1983. Officially it is portrayed as making it possible to present the government with political and economic appraisals which it can use directly.

Such a structure could serve a dual purpose with a series of existing instructions:

1 -- Within the SDECE itself, with R-3 Investigation Division, which draws up individual appraisals on the basis of information supplied by SR agents or on the basis of radio monitoring in cipher codes, deciphered by R-5 division of this same investigation department;

2 -- At interministerial level with the National Defense General Secretariat (SGDN) which, with its 750 civilian and military officials, has the job of drafting daily appraisals for the government.

The SDECE's R-3 "Exploitation" Division had lost its importance. Its intelligence bulletins, which the distribution conference has to divide among the various recipients each day, cannot hope to cover the whole range of current events, because of lack of means and competent staff to handle all kinds of information. They were limited to short reports on particular aspects, to avoid competing with the Quai d'Orsay's or armed forces general staff's own bodies.

Reduction

With the creation of Mr Marion's "planning, forecasting and evaluation" cell, new life will probably be breathed into these intelligence bulletins.

In addition to this initiative by the new SDECE director general there is, finally, an intention to reduce central administration (finances, staff, equipment, laboratories, schools, archives) by eliminating several intermediate levels which, in Mr De Marenches' day, had grown to such an extent that they formed a barrier between the general directorate and the operational departments.

Mr Marion has surrounded himself with several assistants in direct contact with the various departments, especially Gen Jacques Sylla Fouilland, director of investigations, and Col Jean-Albert Singland who in 1979-1980 supervised counterespionage -- before handing it over to Colonel Giraud -- and the Internal Security Department, which is attached to the General Directorate.

These arrangements are presented as a way of making savings in administrative posts, the better to intensify investigations and the exploitation of intelligence and to redeploy foreign stations as operational missions.

To attain this, the SDECE general directorate has, of course, made plans for hiring up to 45 people in 2 years but it has also made plans to transfer or give special leave to civil servants who would no longer have a place in the new administrative set-up. This prospect is starting to cause serious anxiety within an institution still suffering from shock after the "witch-hunt" of Mr de Marenches' day.

MARCHAIS COMMENTS ON RELATIONS WITH PS

[Unattributed report: "It Is Impossible To Prepare for Peace by the Arms Race," describing PCF Secretary General George Marchais' guest appearance on Monte Carlo radio's midday news program on 22 November and answers to unnamed journalists' questions]

[Excerpt] Questioned on some remarks by Jean Poperen on the "rampant polemics" which the PCF is allegedly waging against the PS, Georges Marchais countered by citing statements made at the Valence congress by the Socialist leaders. "They said: We will certainly not be yes-men for the government or the president; we intend to maintain our right to criticize and make proposals. I do not see how the PS could be granted that right and not the PCF...."

"The PCF," he added, "is observing government solidarity, and you probably noticed that the president and the premier have stressed that when talking about the Communist ministers.

However, at the level of our group, our elected representatives -- deputies and senators -- at the level of our party, at national and departmental level, in the regions and enterprises...the PCF maintains its right to make comments, to criticize and to put forward proposals to achieve progress.

"All this is being done with a clear outlook: the try must be attempted, as they say in rugby. The change must be seen in a tangible, real and far-reaching way. That is what we want and what we are orking for.

"Nonetheless, in the framework of our congress preparations, we are engaged in a great discussion to learn from the period through which we have just lived. We suffered a serious electoral setback and we must seek the causes and reasons for that. We are busy doing what no other party has ever done: We are questioning ourselves -- ourselves and not other people who had responsibilities at other times.... We are making a stringently critical examination, including the last 4 years, to pinpoint the fundamental causes, and those which may have had a lesser effect, which led to the electoral setback which we have just suffered. Of course that leads us to raise problems of unity and of our relations with the PS. But, as regards the present period, there can be no doubt in anybody's mind: We are in the government, our ministers are shouldering all the responsibilities and, believe me, we are in the government for a long period."

The last part of the program related to international questions. With regard to Middle East, Georges Marchais expressed the view that "The Fahd plan constitutes a good basis for solving the problems." He pointed out that the PLO has adopted a "more subtle attitude" than some people have claimed.

Turning to President Reagan's recent statements, Georges Marchais continued: "The proposal put forward by Reagan is not a serious proposal. Many responsible politicians throughout the world ultimately regard it as a propaganda statement. Moreover Reagan's real policy runs completely counter to this so-called zero option." Georges Marchais then gave many examples: the deployment of the new missiles in Europe, the decision to manufacture the neutron bomb, unconditional support for the El Salvador Government....

"But Reagan is faced with a considerable movement throughout the world for peace and disarmament." Recalling the struggle for peace in the fifties, Georges Marchais continued: "The present movement is completely different; it is much stronger and has a clear class content. All those who are demonstrating are saying: Enough of the arms race! It is impossible to prepare for peace by the arms race!

"The second aspect is that all the demonstrators link the arms race problem closely to the struggle for a new world order. In other words they want to end a situation in which hundreds and hundreds of millions of men, women and children throughout the world are experiencing hunger, illiteracy and underdevelopment...."

Georges Marchais mentioned a recent opinion poll carried out in different countries which confirms that "The majority of the French, German, British and Netherlanders give their full support to those fighting for peace and disarmament. It is on this that Reagan has stumbled; that is why he carried out a diversionary maneuver with his zero option, to try to turn this movement in his favor while, in practice, he is pursuing a policy contrary to the aspirations of those fighting for peace.

"I am in favor of the zero option," Georges Marchais stated. "What does the zero option mean to me? It is the disappearance of the military blocs. It is the objective which we set in our joint declaration with the PS. There must be negotiations to cut back Euro-missiles, but it must be done while ensuring the security of each state and each people."

IMPROVED ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH ALGERIA FORESEEN

[Daniel Junqua dispatch: "Mr Mitterrand's Visit Could Revive Economic Relations"]

[Excerpt] Algiers -- "I have not come here to sell trucks or sign any contract of the century," Pierre Dreyfus told us on Monday, 23 November, in the evening. The industry minister had just had three successive meetings with Algerian ministers Brahimi (planning), Liassine (heavy industry) and Ait-Messaqudene (light industry). He reviewed a number of operations in which French enterprises are interested and on which some contracts have already been signed but whose implementation has been delayed by the slow Algerian administrative procedures.

Mr Dreyfus did not discuss the gas price dispute which remains the preserve of Mr Jeanneney and Mr M'Hamed Yala, the two "wisemen" appointed by their respective governments. France is said to have put forward proposals on this subject to which the Algerians have not yet replied, but the problem is not now so acute, and its settlement does not seem to be a precondition for the success of Mr Mitterrand's visit. The two sides recognize the complexity of the issue and want time to study it calmly.

The French minister has, therefore, come to examine the possibilities of rapidly launching specific industrial operations should there be a deep and lasting revival of cooperation between the two countries. French enterprises are particularly interested in the exploitation of the Rhour-Nouss gas deposits, the construction of a new iron and steel complex at Djidjell (2 million tons), the construction of two cement works and, of course, the construction of a big automobile factory in Oran for which tenders have been initiated. Renault is following this plan very closely and even signed an initial contract a few years ago which was not followed up.

The Algerians also want to concentrate on the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, public or private, in order to create an industrial network throughout the country. This provides potential for involvement by French small and medium-sized enterprises which will be able to find suitable markets provided that they are supported and encouraged in their export efforts by the government. Prospects in this sphere are still vague in Algeria, but they will be clarified at the end of the year when the FLN Central Committee has made decisions on the place to be given to the private sector in the country's economy and on the sectors in which it can be involved.

A Reliable Partner

If it is a political success Mr Mitterrand's visit could, therefore, spark a revival of economic relations. This prospect is particularly likely to be envisaged by the Algerians, since the trade balance between the two countries is about to be balanced for the first time in many years. French exports to Algeria increased in the first 9 months of 1981 to Fr10 billion (up 20 percent) while Algeria's sales to France reached the record figure of Fr9 billion, up 72 percent from the same period of 1980. These sales are composed essentially of oil (4 million tons) and gas (4 billion cubic meters). The latter has now reached the price of $5.30 per million BTUs. If the new contract for the supply of 5 billion cubic meters is not frozen by the dispute over the price and is implemented in 1982, Paris will have a large trade deficit with Algeria.

Thus an increase in French sales by the signing of a few major equipment contracts would be no surprise. France is particularly anxious for this since Algeria is a reliable partner. The rigorous financial orthodoxy shown by Finance Minister M'Hamed Yala has borne fruit. There has been virtually no borrowing over the past 2 years, the overall balance of trade -- goods and services -- has been restored, and spending is strictly controlled. Reserves amount to 3 billion special drawing rights, [as published] which represents 4 months' worth of imports.

'NEW CHAPTER' SEEN STARTING IN TIES WITH ITALY

["J.N." report: "Mr Spadolini's Visit to Paris Should Encourage Better Balance in Europe"]

Italy's concern to close the "empty chair" period, in other words France's exclusion of Italy, now seems unnecessary. After the clear rapprochement between Rome and Paris in the past few months the Italian prime minister discovered that his French interlocutors which to abandon that attitude and show a "deep-rooted" spirit of cooperation in favor both of Europe's development and a Mediterranean policy.

The Elysee confirms that Mr Spadolini's visit should make it possible to establish a better balance with French-German and French-British relations. These new French-Italian ties will be further strengthened by the visits which President Pertini will make to Paris in April 1982 and Mr Mitterrand will make to Rome subsequently.

The French reaction to the German-Italian proposal to strengthen the EEC's political structures was also deemed "positive" by the Italian side, which stated that this document was "completely open" to any possibility of direct discussion.

As for preparations for the European Council meeting in London on 26 and 27 November, Italian Foreign Minister Colombo said that he believed that there was no point "over-dramatizing" its proceedings in advance and trying to predict its conclusions. He does not expect it to produce much more than the drafting of general directives for continuing the talks on the British financial contribution, the common agricultural policy and the French plan for the European social space.

Mr Spadolini's talks with Mr Mauroy related in particular to the fight against terrorism. The case of the Armenian militant arrested in Paris on Wednesday and suspected of taking part in an attack on a Turkish diplomat in Rome was discussed, but "only briefly," Mr Spadolini said.

FOUR ARMENIAN TERRORISTS ON HUNGER STRIKE

[Text] Paris, 27 Nov (AFP) -- Four members of an Armenian commando jailed after a September 24 attack on the Turkish Consulate here began a hunger strike today demanding political prisoner status, the Armenian Liberation Organization said in a statement. The four -- Vasken Siglian, Aram Basmadjian, Kevork Guzelian and Hagop Chulfayan -- are being held in a Paris area prison under conditions which "do not correspond to the special detention status accorded political prisoners," the statement said. A consulate guard was killed in the attack and five other persons were wounded. "The French Socialist authorities, knuckling under the Turkish fascist blackmail, have already abused our heros in first according them political asylum, then going back on their word," the statement said. The four are members of the "Secret Armenian Army for the Liberation of Armenia" [SAALA).

(In Beirut, a telephone call to AFP in the name of the SAALA said the four want to occupy the same cell, receive visitors freely, have access to television, radio and newspapers and halt police "extortion.")

LE MONDE ON BREZHNEV RESPONSE TO ZERO OPTION

[Editorial: "Improved Moratorium"]

[Text] Mr Brezhnev was clearly also anxious to make a gesture to European public opinion on the eve of the Soviet-American negotiations on Eurostrategic arms. The ball which Mr Reagan placed in his court with his 18 November speech on the "zero option" is being returned by the Soviet president to his partner-cum-adversary by offering a unilateral reduction in his armaments by way of a "goodwill gesture."

This is a clever and even attractive gesture considering that it is precisely unilateral measures which a broad section of the pacifist demonstrators from London to Bonn and including Amsterdam are demanding of their governments. However, this gesture needs to be analyzed more closely. A careful reading of Mr Brezhnev's proposals certainly does not make it possible to conclude, like a section of the press, that the Kremlin is prepared unilaterally to sacrifice its famous SS-20 missiles, and certainly not "hundreds" of them. Moreover, if that were the case we would be very close to the "zero option," since the Soviet arsenal contains 250 of these missiles.

What Mr Brezhnev is proposing is in fact an improved but conditional variation of the moratorium which he suggested at the CPSU congress last February. At that time the Soviet president was proposing to suspend for the duration of the negotiations all work on the medium-range missiles, including their modernization, which implied a freeze on the SS-20 missiles at their present level. Since the Western countries rejected that solution, which left intact a Soviet arsenal which is regarded as superior, Mr Brezhnev is returning to the fray by offering a reduction, still in the framework of the moratorium and linked to it.

This reduction will relate to "a certain section of our medium-range nuclear missiles deployed in the European part of the USSR." In other words it will not relate to the SS-20 missiles, which would remain frozen, but to the obselescent SS-4 and SS-5 missiles or even to aircraft. It will also be noted that the expression used does not rule out a withdrawal to the other side of the Urals, whereas the Western countries generally insist on "dismantling" because they deem that measure to be inadequate.

In any case this gesture confirms that the USSR, backed by its arms programs in the seventies, has provided itself with more room to maneuver on the eve of the negotiations. While the Western countries are placing their new and even future armaments on the negotiating table, the Soviets can play with their old weapons, bringing forward the scrapping of weapons which they would probably have carried out anyway. It should be said in passing that the fact that Mr Brezhnev is prepared to make such a "gesture" rather undermines his assertions that there is "approximate parity" in Europe in this sphere.

In any case note will be taken of Mr Brezhnev's avowed intention to make "radical reductions" in nuclear armaments in Europe at the end of these negotiations, including the tactical missiles which threaten the continent with the same destruction as the longer-range missiles. Indeed, this is the only way of strengthening security.

PAPER DEFENDS EUROPEAN-SOVIET GAS DEALS

[Editorial: "Gas Dependence"]

[Text] The signing by a West German firm of a major contract for the supply of Siberian gas will end a quarrel which has been going on between the Europeans and Americans for many months. There is now scarcely any doubt that France, Italy, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Belgium and Austria will follow Ruhrgas' example.

Europe's dependence on Soviet gas will thus increase, and at the end of the eighties the USSR will account for around 25 percent of its gas supplies or some 5 percent of its energy needs.

NATO, President Carter and more recently -- especially at the Ottawa summit -- President Reagan tried to oppose such an agreement, and some White House advisers had no hesitation in talking about the EEC's "Finlandization in the energy sphere." A last-ditch American attempt, in the form of a mission to Bonn and Paris by Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs Rashish, once again failed.

The Americans would have had more influence if the United States had adopted a more responsible attitude in the energy market, if it had developed ways of exporting its abundant coal reserves over the past few years and finally if Mr Reagan had not seriously jeopardized the financing of alternative energy sources on the threshold of profitability for the sake of the sacrosanct market laws.

Indeed, the European countries have no choice. Despite the North Sea they depend on foreign countries for 80 percent of their oil consumption and for almost 50 percent of their energy needs. Is it more reassuring to meet 28 percent of its domestic energy demand with oil imported from Saudi Arabia -- a country with archaic and hence threatened social structures — than 5 percent with Soviet gas?

Since 1976 natural gas production in Europe has been falling. With potential resources which represent 35 percent of the world reserves the USSR is, therefore, a natural supplier of this fuel for the European market. Helping it to exploit its Siberian resources certainly supplies it with currency, but it also increases the overall energy supply in the world and helps the industries of countries supplying pipes and pumping stations. The construction of two 5,500 km pipelines from the Urengoy deposits to the Austrian-Czechoslovak border will require no less than $10 billions' worth of equipment, which represents several tens of thousands of jobs in a Europe which has 9.5 million unemployed people.

Nonetheless, the fact that the USSR has constantly honored its commercial pledges in the past does not mean that the political and economic consequences of such a contract should be disregarded. The technical means of moderating the effects of a possible break in supplies on the European economies exist: the signing of contracts with industrialists which can be suspended, an increase in storage capacities, interconnection of networks and the maintenance, wherever possible, of a reserve production capacity.

It is better to turn to taking these measures than to bemoan this inevitable energy dependence.

CALVO-SOTELO CLAIMS PROGRAM AN ECONOMIC SUCCESS

PM271113 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 18 Nov 81 p 13

[Carlos Gomez report]

He also reiterated that the Value Added Tax will come into force 1 January 1984 and reaffirmed the government's plan to carry out a policy of industrial standardization and adjustment.

After stressing the importance of these budget debates, Calvo-Sotelo expressed his intention to take stock of the pledges undertaken before parliament on the day of his investiture. In the first place he emphasized the validity of the diagnosis of the Spanish economic crisis which he made at the time and, second, "the affirmative response which agents of the economic process and the political parties have given to my proposal to resolve the grave outstanding problems through dialogue, compromise and agreement." "I must say without false modesty that the government has conscientiously implemented the investiture program, which has been tackled in all and completed in many of its parts."

In his investiture speech, the prime minister recalled, six major issues were established: the energy problem; greater dynamism for investments to create jobs; a watch on inflation; the reorganization of industry; liberalization of the economy and greater effort to export; and supportive treatment for agriculture and fisheries.

As for the energy program, Calvo-Sotelo asserted, energy consumption per unit of production has fallen (by 2 percent in the first 6 months); use of coal instead of oil has been increased (while use of coal has increased by 16 percent, oil consumption has fallen by 5 percent); the nuclear option has been resolutely affirmed (this form of production increased by 80 percent during the first 6 months), and an attempt has been made to diversify energy sources, with a considerable shift toward nonpetroleum products; relations with the oil-producingcountries have been strengthened, and investments in prospecting for hydrocarbons abroad have been increased.

He also asserted that a realistic policy has been pursued on energy prices, recalled the setting up of the National Hydrocarbons Institute and announced that the government will submit the revision of the national energy plan to parliament before the end of the year.

It Is Necessary To Invest More

Next he referred to investments. Spanish society must be restored as a dynamic economy, he said, and to achieve this there must be higher investment, which will create output and income and provide stable and lasting jobs, thus rectifying the gravest and most expensive misfortune of the current crisis -- unemployment. "In order to achieve that aim, I stated in my investiture speech that it was necessary to reduce relative labor costs," Calvo-Sotelo added.

In order to reduce relative labor costs, he asserted, we must act on three different fronts: wage restraint, reduction of social welfare costs, and increased productivity. Making progress in these directions was only possible, he said, by means of a policy of consultation -- a policy culminating in the national agreement on employment, which comprises a set of decisions "whose implementation we must all encourage."

The national agreement on employment is "an asset which Spanish society has received with hope and satisfaction, and we must not disappoint society with doubts and hesitations in implementing what was agreed." The atmosphere of cost cutting and steady public investment has begun to produce favorable effects, Calvo-Sotelo said, on the inflation rate and on our economy's investment processes.

Inflation and Industrial Reorganization

Calvo-Sotelo asserted that, despite adverse developments such as the bad harvests and increased energy costs, the aim of slowing down price increases is being fulfilled. There has been a reduction from the 15.5 percent 1980 Consumer Price Index rise to 14.1 percent in September. The trend points toward a rate of 12 percent, the prime minister asserted.

In Calvo-Sotelo's opinion, investment processes are indicating behavior different from that which prevailed from the beginning of the economic crisis. The overall apparent level of investment increased by 3.7 percent in the first 7 months of 1981.

Available results for foreign trade, he added next, indicate satisfactory behavior at least in three aspects: the increase in exports, their geographical distribution, and the balance of trade. Nevertheless, he achowledged, the improved figures on cost and price inflation, investments and foreign trade have not yet produced the desired substantial change in the employment figures. There was a certain slowdown in the rate of job losses in the first 6 months, "But this slowdown is very brief, and we must wait for further information before assessing its significance."

The resistance shown by the unemployment figures should be combatted, according to Calvo-Sotelo, by restraint in the growth of real labor costs, flexibility in employment, adequate planning of public investments and the creation of an atmosphere favorable to private investment.

Next, the prime minister referred to the latest economic liberalization measures, the decree law on industrial reorganization and the various forms of assistance for agriculture and fisheries.

"What We Must Not Do"

After analyzing the international situation, Calvo-Sotelo summarized measures which should not be adopted. In the first place, he said, it is necessary to avoid "the temptation to forfeit solidarity in the attitudes and decisions of the various social groups." Policies to tackle the crisis must be based on a common sense of purpose disseminated among and accepted by the whole of society.

Second, he stated, "There is no possible solution in the adoption of protectionist measures." Adopting these "is tantamount to being unaware of the causes of the crisis and not knowing the expensive consequences of obstructing trade." Third, he added, "We must not give in to the daily pressure for increases in expenditure financed by lax and permissive monetary and budgetary policies. Those expansionary policies have always been futile and harmful for the countries which have embarked on them."

PRESS COMMENTS ON REAGAN'S ARMS PROPOSAL

Setting Record Straight

PM261301 Madrid ABC in Spanish 20 Nov 81 p 2

[Text] Reagan has indirectly made an accomplished, rational and moderate response to the wave of pacifism which is lapping the feet of Europe's perplexity. Directly, the U.S. President has returned crosscourt and to the baseline of the Soviet court the ball which Brezhnev had struck against the U.S. revamping of the entire policy of detente.

The graphic nature of the figures has enabled the man in the White House to quantify the real balance, the Soviet lead, of the diplomatic period of detente historically initiated with the Helsinki Final Act. Since that time -- the figures speak for themselves -- Europe's insecurity has increased quantitatively and qualitatively.

Does accepting as a starting point for a new round of negotiations between the United States and the USSR the situation of imbalance which has been reached on the old continent both in conventional weapons and in medium-range nuclear devices contribute to Europe's security and to the peace of the world in general? If Reagan had answered this question in the affirmative, he would have accepted Brezhnev's proposal outright, yielding game, set and match to the Soviet strategy of consolidating the imbalance which has been achieved, and the doves of pacifism would have returned to their nests.

This has not been the case. Reagan has quantified the real terms of the status quo. The Euromissiles represent a hypothesis of response, in the dialectics of deterrence, to the actions undertaken by the USSR during the time of a fallback in the U.S. medium-range missiles. The Russian warheads deployed in East Europe are targeted on the most important cities in West Europe, which would remain within their range even if their deployment were withdrawn back as far as the Urals. And there is no medium-range missile in West Europe at present which has a single Soviet city at the end of its potential and apocalyptic parabola. The Soviet SS-20s -- which the Euromissiles, the cruise missiles, are supposed to balance in deterrence -- have been deployed at the rate of 1 per week until they total 750 nuclear warheads with which Moscow is aiming at free Europe's principal cities.

The four points of Reagan's offer (mutual reduction of conventional forces, of medium-range nuclear forces and of strategic forces, and progress to achieve an agreement which will make it possible to avert the danger of a surprise attack, very clearly delimit the real and certain terms of the disarmament problem. And even if they do not, foreseeably, prove acceptable to the Soviets, they should at least serve to clarify the confusion created by the wave of pacifism. The USSR and not the United States is leading the arms race. And to no small extent, the country which holds the lead in that race is also heading the other divisions of the current pacifism.

[Editorial: "The War of Disarmament"]

[Text] During the first 10 months of his presidency, Ronald Reagan has conducted a spectacular policy of rearmament: in the 11th month he proposes to us a no less spectacular program of disarmament. Reagan's rearmament -- increased pressure for the deployment of missiles on European territory, manufacture of the neutron bomb and a gigantic defense budget -- has always been based on the USSR's considerable superiority in arms. The London Institute of Strategic Studies, NATO and kindred news media insistently agree with this thesis. Reagan's pressure concerning rearmament has been explained as the need to balance at least this Soviet superiority.

The disarmament proposal is based strictly on the same idea: The United States would abandon its effort provided that the Soviet Union withdrew its current arsenals and halted the deployment of its weapons.

The Soviet viewpoint, expressed not only in Moscow's first semiofficial comments on Reagan's speech but also in its reiterated stances, is that no such superiority in arms exists and that its latest moves constituted an effort to balance the offensive capability of the United States and NATO; that is, that the imbalance began to occur with the issue of the Euromissiles -- which is prior to Reagan -- and to be intensified with the new weapons and the enlargement of NATO. Moscow therefore views Reagan's proposals as a simple demand that the USSR make unilateral disarmament moves while NATO maintains its weaponry at the current level.

Thus the longstanding differences still persist. Reagan has not essentially changed his viewpoints, nor has the USSR. This war of disarmament has been occurring for a long time, has blocked the Madrid conference and will probably continue to take place as the Geneva talks which are due to begin 30 November and to which Reagan's speech is a prelude.

The "war of disarmament" also arises on the battlefront of European public opinion. It is a matter of countering the large pacifist demonstrations and the electoral pressures to the same end. It must be believed optimistically that this cry from the people has penetrated so far as to force statements in favor of peace and disarmament. What is of interest essentially to Europe -- and not only Atlantic Europe but also, and perhaps even more, to East Europe, the Europe of the Warsaw Pact -- is to avert a certain possibility of agreement between the big powers which would succeed in leaving the continent as a limited battlefield, as what is termed "the European strategic theater," and it is of interest to it not only from the military viewpoint but also from the political viewpoint. European pacifism has never believed that the price of peace should be an agreement between two empires and the subjection of the other countries to each of them.

Within this overall situation, the coming Brezhnev-Schmidt meeting in Bonn is of prime importance. Relations between the FRG and the USSR since the end of World War II have been decisive. The FRG has never ceased to be aligned to the United States, but has gradually built its national policy and its genuine economy. Starting from the time when it was occupied; the German people's will and determination have not ceased to be present throughout the historical process, and from that will emerged the social democracy which rules today and the will to remain within the system of values which the West represents today. Its interdependence with the United States has not stifled a national and European will. In the talks between Brezhnev and Schmidt, Reagan's proposals -- concerning which Schmidt has made very favorable statements -- will be very present, but without abandoning European interests. European security issues will be discussed; not only the missiles on both sides but probably also the enlargement of NATO with the inclusion of Spain. There is a possibility of this enlargement being one of the bargaining counters for the stability of Europe and the world and for a very awkward situation for the Calvo-Sotelo government arising in this field. But it is to be assumed that the latter will have received sufficient guarantees from the United States that it will support its effort until final entry into the Atlantic alliance.

Zero Option Challenges USSR

[Editorial: "The Reagan Proposal"]

[Text] Like it or not, the pacifist movements which have been unleashed on Europe and mainly directed against Americans and Atlanticists will have to change camps. As long as Brezhnev does not respond in positive terms to Reagan's proposals, any action against the deployment of nuclear missiles on our continent should be directed against the Soviet Union, which is the power which is maintaining a medium-range system aimed at the principal Western capitals, while the U.S. plan for NATO upgrading envisaged for 1983, has been suspended. Now everything awaits the possible discussion of the U.S. President's offer.

According to the letter sent to his Soviet counterpart the "zero option," which is how the White House proposals have been termed, is known to contain three points:

1 -- Suspension of the plan for Pershing medium-range missiles in Europe and simultaneously, the withdrawal of the Soviet SS-20s, SS-4s and SS-5s; 2 -- the opening of negotiations for the reduction and possible elimination of U.S. and Soviet conventional forces in Europe; and 3 -- the formulation of a joint system to reduce the dangers of a surprise nuclear attack, caused by possible mistakes.

Each of these options can be discussed independently. The last of them would be raised at the working table of the CSCE conference, still meeting in Madrid. The first three proposals would be discussed between the two superpowers immediately at the meeting scheduled for Geneva at the end of this month, at the planned Haig-Gromyko meeting in January and, finally, at the summit which the two heads of state could arrange.

Brezhnev will find it difficult to leave unanswered or reject Washington's offer outright, much less to evade the issue in the imminent dialogue in Bonn with Chancellor Schmidt, at whose request the important document, which the White House does not hesitate to describe as historic, was hastily drafted. As Reagan explained at the Washington Press Club, the United States is prepared to commit itself to a gradual process of disarmament, provided that this is not unilateral. Success in this operation -- the President warned -- can only be achieved as a result of mutual commitment on both sides.

The first semiofficial reactions from the East bloc, which are of a negative nature, were foreseeable. The arguments describing the proposal as a propaganda operation cannot be taken into account except as a protective smokescreen behind which Brezhnev and the FRG chancellor, set up as a Western spokesman, can discuss the issues seriously.

From a psychological viewpoint, the moment was well chosen. It comes during a stage of maximum tension, following months during which a series of U.S. rearmament measures were adopted which leave no room for doubt about the Washington leaders' determination to face up to the Soviet challenge in all fields, balancing defensive and offensive forces. The Russians, who are generally well-informed about the real power of the United States -- to whose granary they continue to resort in order to avert hunger in their own territory -- know that the men in the Pentagon do not speak lightly. It is therefore to be supposed that Gromyko will consider that the time has come to sit down at the negotiating table.

For the veteran Soviet foreign minister this is not an unprecedented situation. It has its origins in the Kennan doctrine which, at the beginning of the postwar period, established the principle of balancing Soviet strength in any part of the Free World which found itself threatened, confronting it firmly and thus leading the Kremlin to a point at which it had to engage in sensible dialogue.

That this tactic was right is confirmed by the reactions from personalities of various kinds, such as the Netherlander Luns -- the inflexible NATO secretary general -- and Venezuelan President Herrera Campins and the French Socialist Cheysson who, incidentally, warns that our guard should not be lowered until the USSR shows real signs of reversing its tremendous arms race. As the French foreign minister points out, the 55,000 Soviet tanks, apart from the nuclear missiles, necessitate an urgent balancing of forces on the continent. It is the accumulation of Russian forces -- which as Reagan pointed out, have a greater number of divisions on German soil than all those which took part in the Normandy landings -- that has brought us to the current situation of extreme danger in Europe, with the clear intention of neutralizing the countries which are still free by finally using the weapon of fear alone.

The comrades of Felipe Gonzalez and the angelic Mr Ruiz-Gimenez, who were crying out "for peace, disarmament and freedom" with so much enthusiasm last Sunday, now have a new and magnificent opportunity. They lack no up to the minute agruments to pressure their pro-Soviet friends in favor of a positive response to this Reagan plan for detente which, despite being named the "zero option" plan, is not a bad beginning for defending peace and freedom; a freedom, above all, which the West still enjoys and which most of the Third World countries and, of course, all the peoples subjected by force to Soviet totalitarianism do not know.

RADIATION BUILDUP OBSERVED IN ARCTIC NEAR USSR

[Text] Lund, Sweden, 27 Nov (AFP) -- Swedish researchers have found an abnormal buildup of radioactive material in the Arctic Ocean near Spitzbergen, University of Lund scientist Elis Holm reported here today. Mr Holm said that three or four times the normal levels of plutonium, caesium, cobalt and americium had also been found east of Spitzbergen near Soviet waters.

He told the Swedish news agency TT that the buildup could consist of nuclear waste or could have resulted from a nuclear blast. He would not exclude the possibility of an accident to a nuclear-propelled submarine. Mr Holm said the levels, which were similar to those at sea off the nuclear waste treatment plants at The Hague, were not dangerous.

OLOF PALME VIEWS PEACE MOVEMENT, SECURITY ISSUES

[Sven Svensson interview with Social Democratic leader Olof Palme]

[Excerpts] A continuation of the arms race would lead inexorably to a major war, which would mean the destruction of mankind. This is why the peace movement represents reason and the arms-racers unreason.

This was stated by Social Democratic Party leader Olof Palme in a DAGENS NYHETER interview on the security situation after the discovery of the nuclear-armed Russian submarine.

The submarine has meant three things. "First it has given rise to extremely serious criticism of the Soviet Union, even though we know violations of Swedish territory have been going on for 20 years," Palme said. "The most recent violation was not one of the greatest days for the Soviet navy. We protested in the only way we could." "Second," Palme went on, "the submarine gave us an opportunity to indicate the meaning of Sweden's policy of neutrality. It obligates us to protect our territory. On the other hand, our neutrality also commits us to being firm and consistent. We must create neither expectations nor fears of deviations from the line. I think we have succeeded in this. We have been able to blow away the unfortunate statements made earlier by Weinberger and Gustafsson.

"The third question is what I would call the icy wind which blew over the country when it was discovered that the submarine had nuclear weapons on board. The submarine demonstrated both lack of respect and carelessness in dealing with nuclear arms. Having nuclear arms on board cannot have been part of the submarine's mission. They simply did not remove the nuclear arms. This is also made clear by the Russians' own statements.

"The discovery makes it probable that there are quite a few nuclear-armed ships in the Baltic," Palme summed up. To this must be added statements by U.S. Secretary of State Haig about warning detonations of nuclear arms, including in the Baltic. This has been a bit lost in all the criticism of Russia. This is quite a fantastic statement, in Palme's view.

[Question] What role does the peace movement play?

[Answer] The interesting thing about the peace movement in Europe at the moment is that it has such a wide embrace. It includes church groups, environmentalist groups and cross sections of various political parties. The communists' problem is that they are pretending to be the precursors of the peace movement. Another fact is that the peace movement, compared with the fifties, is more outspoken in its statements. [answer ends]

The peace movement levels demands at the Soviet Union even though it cannot be active there; on the subject of Afghanistan, for example. "In general it would be a mistake to make use of the old traditional tactic of dismissing the peace movement as communist fellow travellers. There are communists in the peace movement, but then they will have to be exposed," Palme said.

"I am also critical of many of the peace movement's slogans and demands, but the only reasonable point of departure is to respect these people's honest intentions and their honest concern over the situation in the world. It is my view that the peace movement represents reason, namely the insight that the arms race leads inexorably to major war, which would mean the annihilation of mankind. I am completely convinced of this," Palme added. "Those who whip up the arms race represent emotionalism and unreason. Those involved in the arms race live on aggression and threats," he said.

PAPAIOANNOU SALUTES 'ARAFAT ON PALESTINE DAY

NC290908 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 29 Nov 81 p 1

Dear Comrade 'Arafat: On the occasion of 29 November, established by the United Nations as a world day of solidarity with the Palestinian people, the AKEL Central Committee and I personally send you, the PLO and the entire heroic Palestinian people, whom it fully represents, heartfelt greetings and the best wishes.

The people of Cyprus, with AKEL at their head, are waging the same hard struggle for liberty and justice -- like you are doing -- against the same enemy: imperialism and its agents in the area, the Israeli Zionists, the Turkish expansionists and the local reactionary forces. Our two peoples not only have a common tragic and heroic history, common noble ideals and common enemies, but they also have mutual friends. These are the peoples throughout the world who live liberty, peace and justice and, most of all, the great Soviet people and the strong Soviet state.

We take this opportunity to reassert brotherly and wholehearted support and solidarity with the Palestinian people and the PLO -- their sole representative in their just struggle which will, in any eventuality, triumph.

Long live the friendship between the Cypriot and Palestinian peoples.

Long live friendship and cooperation between AKEL and the PLO.

Long live the Palestinian revolution.

With militant greetings, E. Papaioannou.

EDEK REAFFIRMS REJECTION OF WALDHEIM EVALUATION

NC281956 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 28 Nov 81

[Text] In a resolution on the latest developments in the Cyprus issue, the political bureau of the socialist EDEK party reiterates the party's opposition to the way in which the government has handled the question of the Waldheim evaluation. The resolution calls on the government to state that it considers the Waldheim document as a mere evaluation -- which is inaccurate and clashes with the spirit of the UN resolutions -- and, after the government analyzes the document, to say that it is not considered a document for discussion, as it should not be considered as such by the sponsor.

The statement says further: Discussion of the document at the negotiating table changes its character and leads to a diversion of the Cyprus issue.

O KIRIKAS on Document

Our side, the source added, attributes special significance to the provisions of the Makarios-Denktas agreement which provides clearly that the constitutional settlement must "guarantee the unity of the state" and that the territorial aspect, among other things, must be based upon "land ownership" between the two communities. (It is known that Turkish Cypriot ownership does not go over 13 percent of the total land of the Republic of Cyprus.) These two points, like certain others, are provocatively avoided or neutralized in the Waldheim proposals.

The same authoritative source available to O KIRIKAS also stated yesterday that the "reservations" of the Greek Cypriot side also protests the abondonment of the "priority" on the Famagusta issue. In its observations, it also underscores the negative elements in the Walheim proposals and predicts that these negative elements "cannot contribute toward the establishment of a 'viable and federal' state." The document particularly highlights the dangers that will arise for the dissolution of the state, given the fact that the Waldheim proposals create "two separate and independent economies."

-- Authoritative observers told O KIRIKAS yesterday that the government now also notes that these provisions and all the "negative elements" of the Waldheim proposals stressed in the "reservations" document are incompatible with the philosophy of a "federal state" or a viable federation.

According to our authoritative source, the Greek Cypriot side's document also expresses concern because the Waldheim proposals leave many gaps and many critical points without explanation in such a way that a proper evaluation of the proposals is nearly impossible. Specifically, the Greek Cypriot side emphasizes that:

-- Although the Waldheim proposals state that the republic will have an "international personality," they do not explain how this will be implemented. Neither is it explained whether the Turkish Cypriot area will have a separate right to make international agreements, for example with Turkey.

-- The Waldheim proposals do not explain on what criteria citizenship will be granted and what will happen to the thousands of Turkish colonists imported into Cyprus and whether the Turkish side will have the right to give them all Cyprus citizenship.

-- The Waldheim proposals do not explain who will appoint, who will supervise and who will fire "federal public servants," since the Waldheim proposals do not provide such an authority for the central government, which thus will control these officials.

-- The Waldheim proposals also furnish no explanations about the question of "compensation" for the displaced persons who will not be returning to their homes. How many will there be? Under what criteria will compensation be paid? Who will pay this compensation?

-- The Greek Cypriot side questions and disagrees with Waldheim's view that "a concord of views has been achieved" on many of the points which Waldheim presents inaccurately as alleged points of agreement between the two sides.

-- The Greek Cypriot side also disagrees strongly with the Waldheim proposals which are presented as alleged "middle of the road solutions" and is equidistant between the positions of the two sides.

— In its conclusion, the Greek Cypriot side's document recommends that a "comparative study" of the views of both sides and those of Waldheim should now start on a "point by point" basis.

Authoritative circles observe that this proposal is a serious error in essence and tactics, because, a) in this manner the Waldheim proposals become a "basis for dialogue, a thing President Kiprianou repeatedly said it is not; and b) dialogue will be perpetuated for months in "comparative study" of proposals, which ought to have been rejected as unacceptable right from the start.

More points of the "reservations document" referring to the territorial aspect and the question of refugees will be reported on Tuesday.

NICOSIA TO RAISE MISSING PERSONS ISSUE AT UN

NC271809 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 27 Nov 81

[Text] A conference last night on the question of the missing persons discussed developments in the light of yesterday's meeting of the investigation committee. The conference established that there had not been any change in the Turkish stand nor are there any indications of such a change. Consequently, it was decided to promote the discussion of the issue at the UN Third Political Committee unless progress has been made by the time the debate has been suspended.

Denktas on Issue

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the Greek Cypriots are continuing to exploit the issue of missing persons as a tool of political expediency, as if they were the only ones that suffered from the Cyprus conflict, which they created with their armed attacks.

Denktas made this statement after he received Dr Latife Birgen, who departed for New York to participate in the meetings of the UN Third Committee on the subject of missing persons. Denktas added that the Greek Cypriots, who had avoided discussing the issue at the negotiating table, had referred it to the United Nations in a bid to continue to use this humanitarian subject as a political propaganda matter.

Denktas said such a stand contradicts agreements between us. This unpleasant stand and tactic by the Greek Cypriot side has also been witnessed by the UN representative at the missing persons committee. Denktas expressed hope that the UN Third Committee would not be deceived by Greek Cypriot efforts to use the missing persons issue for their own political expediency as if they were the only sufferers.

Pointing out that the Turkish Cypriot representative at the UN Third Committee would foil, based on documents, all false Greek Cypriot allegations, Denktas said: We shall await the results with interest.

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Papandreou returned today from London, where he participated in the summit conference of the 10 EEC countries. At Hellinikon Airport, Papandreou was welcomed by the president of the Chamber of Deputies, Alevras, members of the Council of Ministers, leaders of the armed forces and security corps, French Ambassador Rebeyrol, British Ambassador Sutherland and other officials. Dhimitris Varoutsis reports from the airport:

[Begin recording] The Olympic plane has landed with the prime minister on board as well as two ministers accompanying him -- Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos and Deputy Coordination Minister for EEC Affairs Varfis. Speaking about the work of the 10 European states, Mr Papandreou said:

[Papandreou] I belive we should divide the issue into two separate chapters. The first one concerns the Common Market as a whole: the problems which have been raised for the first time -- problems which cover almost all regulations on the functioning of the Common Market. However, let's take the second chapter -- Greece. In what concerns Greece, I have made it absolutely clear to my counterparts -- prime ministers of Europe, of the community -- that the rules of the Rome Agreement are rules which probably can be effective, although this even seems to be disputable today, for the industrially developed and matured capitalist countries of northern Europe; that these rules really prevent the self-existent development of a regional, Mediterranean country.

I also forecast that the problems faced by Greece within the community will be similar to those that will be faced by Portugal and Spain if and when they join the community. I am glad that in this presentation of views we had the open, strong support of France -- of President Mitterrand -- as well as, I would say in general, of Ireland and of Denmark on certain points, as well as of Italy at any rate. In other words, a framework was formulated -- a framework of discussion -- of the north-south type with the south, including probably Ireland -- which is strange, because geographically Ireland is anything but south.

I belive I spoke with absolute sincerity concerning our own position. It is impossible for Greece to remain within the framework of the present status, because it will sacrifice, even kill, crucial national economic interests. I expressed the hope that it will become possible to formulate a special status; and this as a separate course -- even parallel, if you like -- from the other course, which will be to set the problem to the Greek people within the framework of a referendum -- whether they desire full integration or (?special) relations. As I have stressed, this is not a prerogative of the government. It is the prerogative of the president.

I also should say that I have not yet set the problem to the president. I will judge when it is the appropriate time to raise this problem. In the meantime, however, the Greek problem has been raised. It is already recorded in the minutes as well as in the preface that Greece has made a new presentation of views, the new Greek Government has made a new presentation of views, and has warned -- would you like to say friendly? It has given a friendly warning that the present status is unbearable -- it is a status within which the Greek economy cannot develop.

Since I have seen warm support from France -- partial support, as I have said, from Italy and other countries -- and because no objection has been raised, at least for the time being -- an objection was raised by the Belgian prime minister before the opening of the conference, not after the conference -- I belive that, as far as we are concerned, the course allows some optimism.

But of course the main question is what will happen with the Common Market, what will happen with the community. I belive the most critical meeting for the future of the Common Market will again be the summit -- which will be held in Brussels in March so I foresee that next spring both the question of the Common Market prospect and Greece's role and conditions under which it will cooperate with the Common Market will be clarified completely.

I can say I am returning with a feeling of satisfaction that the Greek positions have been presented most clearly, sincerely and proudly, I would add, and that these positions, without being aggressive or insulting, have had some effect in the circle of prime ministers. So with this message, I leave you this evening. [end recording]

KKE CONDEMNS U.S. REACTION TO POLICY STATEMENT

[Excerpts] The blackmail recently manifested by the U.S. leadership against the Greek Government's policy statement has caused indignation among the Greek public. At the same time, this indignation stresses the need for Greece to rid itself of the American-NATO chains. In connection with the provocative statements by U.S. circles, the KKE Central Committee yesterday released the following statement:

"The statements by the U.S. secretary of state, U.S. secretary of defense and other U.S. official circles constitute new, harsh interference in Greece's internal affairs. This interference confirms our country's deep dependency on imperialism and how little the Americans actually take our country's right to chart its own course into consideration. Moreover, this interference shows how essential it is for Greece to rid itself of the American-NATO chains and follow a new, national proud and independent course.

"The government must make it clear that such statements are unacceptable and that only the sovereign Greek people and their government are competent to determine the course of our country."

So far there has been no comment from the official Greek side. In any event, it appears that the government will clarify its intentions at the next NATO summit in Brussels.

REGULATIONS ISSUED ON LIQUIDATING PARTY ASSETS

[Text] Regulations concerning the liquidation of political party assets that have been confiscated by the Finance Ministry's Treasury Department in accordance with a National Security Council decision were published in today's official gazette and have gone into effect.

The regulations stipulate the formation of a seven-man central liquidation committee formed by representatives of the Finance and Interior ministries to conduct the operation. The regulations also envisage the formation of committees to establish and register all liabilities and assets of the political parties and their affiliated organs that have already been dissolved. These committees will be set up in all provinces and districts. All (?official) and private institutions and banks will be required to present all information and documents requested by these committees within stipulated time limits.

The regulations also invite private persons of firms with claims against the political parties and organizations to apply to the highest local authority with documents proving their claims within 1 year. All money owed to the parties will be immediately collected by the appropriate national authority to be deposited in a temporary bank account to be opened in the name of the political party concerned.

ANKARA DOUBLING ECONOMIC AID TO TURKISH CYPRIOTS

[Text] Ankara -- Talks between Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu and the TFSC delegation led by Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay over the past 3 days have ended. It has been decided that Turkish economic aid to the TFSC is to be doubled, raising it to 6 billion Turkish liras.

At a press conference in Ankara yesterday, TFSC Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay provided information regarding the economic and political situation in Cyprus, adding: "The Cyprus issue cannot be solved through U.S. pressure or through the crusade mentality of Papandreou."

Responding to a question, Cagatay said he did "not think Papandreou and Kiprianou will provoke a war in Cyprus," and added: "This would be sheer folly; but if they resort to such a crazy act, they will get the necessary reply."

ULUSU QUESTIONED ON GREECE, ECONOMY, ENERGY

[Text] Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu has said efforts are being made to solve differences between Turkey and Greece through peaceful means and within the framework of justice and equality. Ulusu was replying to questions by an ANKA correspondent.

He added that international law states that if such conflicts exist between two neighboring countries, these issues should be solved through bilateral discussions. Ulusu continued: We have not yet received any sign from our neighbor that proves that this is in fact the way they favor for the solution of the problems. However, we are continuing our efforts within this framework. In the event the Greeks express their desire to solve the problems through bilateral negotiations, our views are already prepared. Some groundwork has already been done at lower levels and negotiations could be based on that.

In reply to a question on the economic situation, Ulusu said preparations were underway to create a center within the office of the prime minister to control and centralize all economic activities. He added that this center would be equipped with computers and would help the prime minister in coordinating economic activities among all institutions and authorities.

On the energy problem, Ulusu said all activities connected with nuclear technology would be used to produce energy and not to manufacture weapons. Ulusu added that talks were underway with several countries concerning constructing nuclear power stations in Turkey.

GENERAL EVREN RETURNS FROM PAKISTAN VISIT

[Statement by head of state Gen Kenan Evren at Esenboga Airport 27 November on arrival from Pakistan visit — recorded]

[Excerpt] During my visit to Pakistan I had the opportunity to exchange views with Mr Ziaul Haq on world issues in general and on issues concerning our regions in particular. The following aspect emerged during these talks: There is a great similarity between Turkey's views and the views of the Pakistani president and his associates. Our assessments are identical on almost all subjects, and this pleased me very much.

Furthermore, I expressed to the Pakistani president my gratitude for enabling me to see the Afghani refugees and to talk to them. I would like to express my gratitude again for this.

STRENGTHENING RELATIONS WITH GREECE DIFFICULT

NC281140 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 24 Nov 81 p 15

[Text] Ankara -- The program of the socialist Greek Government formed under Papandreou's leadership is being examined in Ankara. The authorities, who expressed their views after their initial examination of the program, said: "The program is very rigid. It is too stern to be compatible with neighborliness." Foreign Ministry officials have refrained from commenting officially on the program.

The authorities have also said that they regarded as strange the clear and unequivocal statement in the Greek Government program that Greece would not abandon its argument that control of Aegean airspace belongs to Greece and that the Aegean islands have continental shelves.

Meanwhile, an authoritative official has said Turkey would never abandon its views on Aegean Sea and airspace control, the continental shelf nor the demilitarization of the Aegean islands. The official added: "As two countries in the same alliance, we were expecting the Greek Government to extend a true olive branch; whereas the olive branch extended to Turkey by the head of the Greek Government is not a real one but an artificial one. It will be extremely difficult to strengthen friendship between the two countries with such behavior and attitudes."

VOTCP WARNS U.S. FORCES INCREASING IN COUNTRY

TA281016 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 28 Nov 81

[Commentary: "Will a Rapid Deployment Force Be Placed in Turkey?"]

[Text] Lately there have been many articles in the Turkish press on Reagan's Turkish policy. In MILLIYET, Mehmet Ali Birand published a series of articles on the issue and, later Yalcin Dogan did the same in CUMHURIYET. These articles are interesting in that they reveal the Washington administration's increasing pressures and demands on Turkey as well as its plans to draw our country into dangerous adventures. For example, Mehmet Ali Birand wrote that so far there has been no decision to place a rapid deployment force in Turkey but that Washington can knock on Ankara's door any time and try to impose such a force.

A series of articles on the issue is now being published in MILLIYET by Sami Kohen. In short the articles say the Reagan administration attaches great importance to Turkey in its Middle East policy and that it wants to use Ankara more extensively.

What is Reagan's Middle East policy and what does he want from Turkey? The Reagan administration wants to settle itself not only politically but militarily and to strengthen its positions in the Middle East, which it has declared an area of national interest. For that purpose it is trying to create new military blocs involving such countries as Egypt, Israel and Sudan. Meanwhile it is expanding its network of bases in the region and is trying to implement its plans to transfer to this region the Rapid Deployment Force, which will carry out military attacks against the Middle East and the Persian Gulf. It has allocated a large portion of these plans to Turkey. It is increasing its pressure and demands on Turkey, utilizing the fact that our country is a NATO member. The goal of turning Turkey into an aggressive tool against the Arab Islamic peoples in the Middle East lies at the bottom of these pressures and demands. These [words indistinct] take their source from strategic aims such as placing the Rapid Deployment Force in Turkey and removing Turkish-Soviet relations from within the framework of good neighborliness and mutual benefit. These (?plans) are never off the agenda of the Pentagon.

The magazine ARMED FORCES, which is published in Washington and which reflects the views of the Pentagon, recently confirmed Reagan's plans for Turkey. Writing that the Rapid Deployment Force would be placed in Turkey, it noted that in this respect Reagan views Turkey as a most important country.

U.S. war minister Weinberger's forthcoming visit to Ankara, scheduled for 3-5 December, is related to imposing these plans on the junta. In imposing these plans, the Washington administration is using economic and military aid as tools.

The so-called aid, which the reactionary press has been making a lot of noise about, saying the United States has raised the amount of aid to Turkey to $750 million, exists only in name. That is because the Reagan administration sets political conditions for everything. It says: First you open your land to the Rapid Deployment Force, and then you get the money!

In a speech last April, Haig said: The United States must use its military aid mechanism efficiently. Thus, he stated openly that the U.S. Government would extend every dollar of aid to foreign countries in return for political conditions. The U.S. politicians do not hide the fact that this policy is being implemented against Turkey.

In his articles in MILLIYET, Kohen quotes a U.S. diplomat as saying that if Turkey wants more aid from the United States it must allow the military force on its land and support the Pentagon's Middle East policy in a trustworthy manner. Weinberger's forthcoming visit to Ankara will involve new bargaining on these issues, as Washington now wants results from its pressures and demands. Our national interests are once again the subject of bargaining. Will the junta open up our land to the Rapid Deployment Force? Will it succumb to the plans to turn our country into an aggressive tool against the Arab Islamic countries for Washington's interests? The developments will show that. However, it is a fact that it is essential to make a final choice between our country's peaceful future and the Reagan administration's demands.

KREISKY PLEASED AT REAGAN LETTER, BREZHNEV SPEECH

[Text] I believe that since Reagan's letter and Brezhnev's speech at the FRG chancellor's dinner, the world political situation at any rate looks a trifle more friendly as compared with the atmosphere of impending disaster that existed only a few months ago. I myself have always expressed the opinion that negotiations between the superpowers are necessary, and although I am not of the opinion that this negative policy of outbidding which is tending toward the zero option is very realistic, I nevertheless believe that it might constitute quite a good, shall we say, working hypothesis.

At any rate the two leaders of the superpowers have expressed their readiness to speak and negotiate about what indeed deeply moves people, and that is why the whole thing is good. And it has shown that, however skeptical one may be toward the diplomacy of visits, although it may not bring any tangible results, it brings at least, or provokes at least, the taking of positions from which one subsequently finds it much more difficult to depart.

USSR SHIPS TO WATCH TANKERS IN S. ATLANTIC

[Excerpts] Russia is setting up a new fleet in the South Atlantic to watch the movements of tankers, particularly those bound for West European and North American ports from the Persian Gulf. The move is most serious for the West because the Western navies have no forces in the area and no bases from which warships could operate apart from Gibraltar.

The new Russian fleet will be based in Luanda, Angola. The creation of the fleet has been confirmed by the Royal Navy's fleet headquarters at Northwood. In the past few weeks, several very senior Russian naval officers have been flying into Luanda and there has been a considerable increase in radio traffic between Moscow and Angola.

A modern Krivak-class missile frigate has been lying for a long time at Luanda, possibly to provide both a headquarters and secure communications centre for visiting senior officers. Earlier this year the Russian naval presence in west Africa waters had dropped to one minesweeper and two auxiliaries. Now the total is four or five warships and a similar number of auxiliaries.

The South Atlantic lies outside NATO's geographical area, which ends at the Tropic of Cancer. The only regular Western naval presence today is the Royal Navy's ice-patrol ship Endurance, 3,500 tons, which spends six months each year around the Falklands and Antarctica but which is to be withdrawn without replacement next spring as an economy measure.

DE CLERQ UNABLE TO FORM GOVERNMENT; STEPS DOWN

LD301850 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 30 Nov 81

CHIEF OF STAFF PROPOSES REFORMS IN ARMED FORCES

It is being asserted that this letter, which also reached the Defense Office by roundabout means, surprised and embarrassed Frank Swaelen, who is still minister despite current events. The approach was made over the head of this prominent Christian People's Party member. In addition, in the present crisis situation, it implies at least some political options on the part of the author. These options are already annoying the Socialist Party [PS] and Belgian Socialist Party [SP] which have also been duly alerted....

In General Gontier's view, "it is clear that the only possible solution is to reduce the professional element in our forces and increase the length of military service." There are two options: either 25,450 volunteers are kept and military service increased to 12 months in Germany and 14 months in Belgium, and the savings "limited" to 1.1 billion; or only 21,000 volunteers are kept, also with militry service of 12 months in Germany and 14 months in Belgium, giving a saving of 2.6 billion. But "this proposal is based on the hypothesis that a contingent of 33,000 militia would constantly be available, which involved altering the laws on the militia as early as 1985."

Moreover, "since there is an urgent need to return to the officering of combat units," General Gontier thinks that "it is necessary to end the ridiculous system of paying overtime, which produces absences by career staff, which sometimes amount to 60 days per year excluding annual leave."

The chief of the General Staff adds, however, that it would be necessary to normalize allowances, envisage a reasonable increase in pay for the militia and return to the social programming which has been marking time for 3 years.

Finally General Gontier writes to the king: "The principles I am upholding should serve as a basis for the next government agreement."

SCHMIDT INTERVIEW ON GENEVA, HONECKER MEETING

DW301623 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1005 GMT 29 Nov 81

[Text] [Question] In the negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on the Eurostrategic weapons scheduled to open in Geneva tomorrow the intention is a solution in stages of the problem of the medium-range missiles. This, Mr Chancellor, probably is one of the interesting prospects which was termed the result, or one of the results, of your talks with the Soviet general secretary. Could you somewhat expound on what is meant by a stage-wise or phase-wise solution?

[Answer] You mentioned a stage-wise solution of the missile problem. It is a problem of the medium-range weapons at large, Mr Woerdehoff. The ground-launched U.S. cruise missiles, for instance, are not missiles, yet they are medium-range weapons. Likewise the Soviets have medium-range weapons which are not missiles, and both sides have airplanes which are medium-range weapons but not medium-range missiles. After my talks with Messrs Brezhnev and Gromyko I can very well imagine that one will solve the missile problem harmoniously in an initial phase if one simultaneously makes the fundamental agreements for the subsequent phase in which the remainder of the medium-range weapons will be balanced as well. You are aware that as far as the missiles are concerned we strongly advocate a zero solution, meaning the total renunciation in East and West alike.

Let me use this question to add a word about the overall results of the Soviet visit to Bonn: It was a very good, collegial climate; people must not overlook the fact, however, that this involved a dialogue between a nuclear world power and a non-nuclear medium power which, however, by its geographical location -- and we are living in the center of Europe, after all -- is bound to be interested in a reasonable solution of this problem for the sake of its existence. We Germans are not only threatened by the Soviet medium-range weapons so far in existence, and in particular by the numerically increasing SS-20 missiles; we are also not at all eager to see Western medium-range weapons deployed on our territory.

Yet, we told the Soviet leadership in no uncertain terms that we will do that, that we will allow the Americans to start deploying U.S. medium-range weapons in late 1983, 24 months from now, unless the problem has been solved in Geneva by then through negotiations. The Russians clearly understood this, and there is not the least doubt in my mind about the readiness of the Soviet Union to negotiate seriously on its part. There were some doubts on their part whether the will for negotiations on the American side should be taken as seriously as ours. We spent a great deal of time on making the intentions of the U.S. leadership plausible to the Soviet leadership, on explaining them, and also on making it clear how we Germans exerted influence on the U.S. position as represented by the great speech which President Reagan gave 2 weeks ago.

The zero solution had not been a U.S. proposal in the first place. It was a German proposal. True, we will not negotiate ourselves, yet we will stay in contact about these issues throughout the negotiations not only with the United States and our Western allies but also with the Soviet Union. I think the Soviets left Bonn with a feeling of satisfaction. They obtained clarity, and I believe that this clarity was desirable also in our interest. Compromise can be built only on clear positions. Anyone going to the negotiating table with an unclear position cannot expect any compromise to be made while there is a lack of clarity about him. Clear starting positions are necessary to achieve usable compromises.

[Question] Apropos these clear starting positions, Mr Chancellor: Presumably in Geneva the very data on the Eurostrategic power ratio will be on the table which General Secretary Brezhnev conveyed to you in Bonn.

Have you developed any understanding for the Soviet mode of computation, and do you see any option for a compromise between Moscow's viewpoint and Washington's different view such as becomes obvious, for example, by the American mode of computation which includes the counting of all Soviet SS-20 missiles and not just those deployed in the European part of the Soviet Union, and the demand of their inclusion in the talks?

[Answer] I as the chancellor, Mr Woerdehoff, do not wish to enter into a profound discussion of modes of computation — even if, God knows, this involves much more terrible things than the counting of the proverbial fly legs for which statisticians are said to have a gusto. This is much more important than any civilian statistics. On principle I understand the Soviet position. I am bound to do so. Anybody wanting to negotiate or being urgently interested in the result of negotiations without being able to put himself in the position of the other side, cannot attain any negotiation result. The Soviet Union must be able to put itself in the American shoes and also in our German position, and by the same token the West must be capable and willing to put itself in the Soviet Union's position.

What concerns the Soviets most at the moment is the definite prospect of having to reckon with Western missile deployments and cruise missile sitings 2 years from now. The figures on the existing missiles are on the table; they cannot be seriously contested. There is no use for the two world powers to have their press spokesmen make anything foggy about them, or do so in great speeches or interviews. In reality there cannot be any difference of opinion there. What might become important is the quarrel over the range of individual weapons. If, for instance, there are more than 250 SS-20 missiles with each having three MIRVs, and part of them were relocated from the European part of Russia to the territory beyond the Urals, then the point that matters would be how far beyond the Urals. Directly behind the Urals the same missiles could hit Cologne or Hamburg without any trouble, as before. If they were deployed far behind the Urals they could no longer reach us. So this is the point where the actual problems begin. The figures by themselves should not be artificially turned into a problem.

[Question] As regards the range problem, which is of extreme importance among all other military-technical details, there existed the consideration of Western experts to curtail the range of the Pershing II missiles. Do you see a possibility, for example, to limit the SS-20 range, and was that a subject of your negotiations with Mr Brezhnev?

[Answer] Mr Woerdehoff, the range played a role but it was not discussed in detail. And I do not want to deepen it in a public discussion. That would not be proper. I must say it again: We are not negotiation partners, the Russians and the Americans are.

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, you did not use the term pressure for time, but you talked of the Soviet Union's pressure for time regarding the Geneva negotiations. In other words: If no acceptable interim result is achieved in 2 years, American cruise and Pershing II missiles will be deployed in West Europe. I am asking now whether the pressure for time, which could be good for the cause, does not create the expectation on the part of the Soviet leadership that counterarmament cannot be implemented against the peace movement in which some high-ranking fellow party members of yours participate?

[Answer] I believe that this is a grave error. It is not being cultivated only by the Soviets themselves in their propaganda; that has not come up for a second in the talk with the Federal Government.

[Question] So there is a clear differentiation between policy and propaganda?

[Answer] Yes, and the West Europe and West German side make similar operations. I have taken the edge out of it all by pointing out rather early in our talks that every Federal Government will act -- because it must -- as Mr Genscher and I have stated from the very beginning. Deployment will begin in late 1983. There will be no other Federal Government, by the way. The pressure for time, as you call it, is a pressure for both. It does not press only the Soviet side, it presses the American side as well.

We have pointed out very clearly to the American side also that less than 2 whole years are left for the negotiations in order to achieve a result. I want to say it clearly: The Federal Government and I personally have linked our political fate with the so-called dual decision. That means also with the negotiation part of it. And if no serious negotiations would take place by one side or the other, much would be at stake also for us. We will, therefore, emphasize it very much that serious negotiations should take place.

The Soviets see with concern that deployment could take place. I could not take this concern from them and I did not want to. I said that this is the same concern we experience today because you deploy a new SS-20 missile every week. The concern exists on both sides and it would be the best if the concern were eliminated by a bilateral zero solution.

[Question] As regards our own worries here in this country, there was no need for you to act as an interpreter, Mr Federal Chancellor. You did not consider it your task to act as an agent or go-between, as has been said occasionally, but to act as an interpreter. Was your interpretation understood in all points?

[Answer] I said already that the atmosphere was very good, very frank and very honest. The Soviet general secretary said to both delegations that I have never deceived him. Whether it has hit the mark, as one says among journalists, can be assessed only after some time. Now the Soviet experts in Moscow will analyze the protocols of the Bonn talks. They take the protocols along and they will evaluate them. I very much believe that our statements regarding the seriousness of the Western will to negotiate have had an effect. The Soviet negotiation leaders in Geneva will feel it in a few days. Negotiations will open on Monday.

[Question] A short remark in between: At the encounter between Mr Zamyatin and Government Spokesman Becker one did not have the impression that everything has hit the mark regarding the Soviet side. Or was that something like propaganda?

[Answer] I would rather think so.

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, you referred repeatedly to the Soviet Union as our security partner, thus introducing a new term in the political vocabulary, if I understand it correctly. In order to avoid misinterpretations, would you explain this term?

[Answer] There is a difference between a business partner, an alliance partner, a marriage partner and what I mean by saying security partner. I used the word not for the first time these days. What I mean is that in the current world, security cannot be achieved for an individual nation or an individual state if the other states do not take part in a partnership-like way in the stabilization of peace. Both sides must contribute their share to the fact that both sides can live in peace and security. That is what I mean. By the way, General Secretary Brezhnev had used the term partner for us in the course of the talk. I considered it rather remarkable and I believe that it has come from an honest inner feeling on the Soviet side.

[Question] A question with a view to tomorrow's Geneva negotiations: The Federal Republic does not participate, as you have said, but it is very much concerned also with regard to the formulation of the principles for the negotiating by the Americans. Is the concept really perfect? One is under the impression after the impressive speech of the American President that some question marks must still remain.

[Answer] The television speech of President Reagan, as you call it, was the explanation for the public of the world of a negotiation concept which is in fact even more complicated, a concept we have most carefully assisted in working on up to the last sentence. We will also in future cooperate in making common decisions of the North Atlantic alliance if positions must be changed in the course of negotiations. Naturally positions must be changed. If both world powers wanted to stick with their starting positions, no compromise could be achieved. That is similar to wage negotiations between trade unions and management.

[Question] Let us revert to the starting position once more: The November 1981 talks with this outstanding focal point of the medium-range weapons problem hardly would have been possible if both sides had understood the same things by the words of the joint statement in May 1978. Let me recall that at the time the Soviet general secretary and you were agreed that -- as it was put -- nobody should aspire to military superiority and that approximate equality and parity are sufficient for guaranteeing defense. My question, Mr Chancellor, is this: Were the talks last week suited to let you know where in this consensus of words 3 1/2 years ago the dissension in their interpretation was to be found? Is it perhaps attributable in the different mode of counting, or how would you explain it?

[Answer] I believe that just like myself, the Soviet leadership would underwrite with a clear conscience today the passage of the approximate balance, of the approximate parity. Only, the Soviet side feels that the approximate balance has actually been established now while I feel that it had been seriously impaired already in 1978; in the meantime it has changed even more to the advantage of the Soviet armament. Since then many Soviet nuclear weapons, several hundred Soviet nuclear warheads on medium-range weapons have been added. The Soviet side will not deny this, but it will say that taken together, the explosive force of the warheads today is smaller than it was at the time. I cannot deny this. But since the warheads are trained on various targets at the same time the threat nowadays in my view is essentially more serious than it appeared to be 3 years ago.

[Question] After a long absence the representatives of the two world powers will sit down at a table for negotiations again in Geneva tomorrow. Will this and your talks with the Soviet general secretary, Mr Chancellor, have any positive effects on the meeting between the German chancellor and the German General Secretary and State Council Chairman, Erich Honecker, envisaged for the near future?

[Answer] I think this can be answered in the affirmative. I believe that our meeting on the whole has positive effects on East-West relations in Europe. Because apart from the missile issue we discussed many other fields of cooperation between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Soviet Union and other partners in East Europe, especially in the economic field. There cannot be any doubt at all about the serious will of the Soviet leadership, just as there cannot be any doubt about ours, to essentially expand this bilateral cooperation in the future. It was 3 years ago that we concluded an economic framework agreement devised for a period of 25 years, and we are vigorously imbuing it with content on both sides. The pipeline agreement is but one example of many; most other examples are on a smaller scale.

[Question] Would it be conveivable, Mr Chancellor -- now that you give me the cue -- to conclude a long-term agreement, not necessarily for a period of 25 years, also with the GDR? There was some pondering done about it some time ago.

[Answer] I would not rule this out. But I would prefer to discuss such questions later, after the meeting between Mr Honecker any myself which has now been planned.

[Question] How does the Soviet general secretary view the contacts between the two German states and their leading men, anyway? Do you have the impression that there is a little bit of uneasiness? After all, what this involves is special relations, even if people in the GDR don't like to hear of them.

[Answer] I do not have the impression that there is any uneasiness. On the contrary. It is my very definite impression that the Soviet leadership at large, and Mr Brezhnev in particular, would welcome such a meeting.

[Question] One last question concerning the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The followup conference is laboriously dragging along in Madrid. Something has been said about it in the joint communique on the talks between yourself and Mr. Brezhnev. What particularly interested me was that a rather old proposal came up again in the talks, namely, holding an energy conference within the framework of the CSCE.

As far as I know this was discussed as early as 6 years ago. Two questions: Why is it that this has not been started to date since East and West Europe are equally confronted by this problem; and do you think that new impetus might emanate from this meeting for convening such a specialized conference?

[Answer] Both problems have not been solved because in this case as well, the Soviet Union and the Federal Republic of Germany are not the only parties involved. The energy conference would be a European energy conference, and so far not all European partners are convinced that it would be useful. I consider it a useful idea. In any event, I am all for it, and I also advocated this view vis-a-vis the Soviet leadership. It is similar, but in reality nevertheless different, with the Madrid conference which is charged with mapping out an instruction or, as diplomats would say, a mandate for a European disarmament conference and for confidence building measures in all of Europe. The Soviet Union today is prepared in Madrid to extend the confidence building measures not only to a strip of 250 km width across the Western Soviet Union but even to the whole of European Russia up to the Ural Mountains...

[Answer] Yes, I am getting to this point. But they demand in return that parts of the Atlantic be included as well. This, I feel, means stretching it a bit, because to this day we have not been considering the Atlantic a European inland sea. One might say this for the Baltic Sea; one can also say this for the North Sea even if the North Sea is an open sea. This is under discussion. I deem options of agreement conceivable. I don't think that ultimately the mandate to the European disarmament conference will fail by that. It is my impression that 2/3 of the people in Madrid are agreed, with 1/3 still lacking. What is important is that nobody has thrown in the towel and given up. Tenacious efforts will lead to compromise.

[Question] Thank you, Mr Chancellor.

GENSCHER DISCUSSES BREZHNEV VISIT, ARMS TALKS

DW301357 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 30 Nov 81 pp 22-25

[Excerpt] SPIEGEL: Mr Foreign Minister, the communique on Brezhnev's visit indicates considerable differences of opinion between Moscow and Bonn on crucial questions. Just the same, the Federal Government speaks of success. How is this?

Genscher: Nobody could expect the Soviet side or the German side -- and thus the Western side -- to modify their positions on the decisive questions which concern us especially just before the opening of negotiations on medium-range missiles; after all, the negotiations open on Monday. But I believe that this visit contributed essentially to understanding each other's position and also to recognizing the intentions to be pursued during the negotiations.

SPIEGEL: Thus nothing has changed?

Genscher: What mattered to us was to convince the Soviet side that we support both parts of the dual decision and that it is necessary to conduct serious negotiations and to achieve concrete results if any influence is to be exerted on the deployment planned for the end of 1983.

Yet, the talks in Bonn gave rise to encouragement. Both sides at the Geneva negotiating table will negotiate with the responsibility for security, with the capability of each other's recognizing security interests and with a readiness for understanding.

SPIEGEL: But as far as the subject matter is concerned, even after the Brezhnev visit you cannot see any readiness on the part of the Soviet side to make concessions?

Genscher: As yet I cannot see any such readiness for concessions regarding the substance of the negotiations. But that wasn't expected.

SPIEGEL: Do you mean to say that as far as you are concerned, the extended moratorium proposed by Moscow is irrelevant? After all, the Russians not only want to suspend the further deployment of new missiles while the negotiations are in progress, but are also offering to unilaterally withdraw a certain number of their weapons in Europe.

Genscher: The proposals on a moratorium constitute a combination of earlier suggestions for moratoriums -- for instance, the proposals of October 1979 and February 1981. It will be necessary to clarify at the negotiating table what they are prepared to withdraw during the negotiations. This might represent a positive beginning, and I hope very much that this is so.

SPIEGEL: Didn't you ask Brezhnev about this?

Genscher: The negotiating will be done in Geneva.

SPIEGEL: But why are you so reserved toward this modified moratorium proposal by the Soviets?

Genscher: The real significance of the Soviet statements is not inherent in the moratorium proposal. What could be significant is whether, irrespective of a moratorium, the Soviet Union is really prepared to reduce its potential during the negotiations. It is, after all, aware that in any event the Western side will not deploy any missiles before the end of 1983. There is a de facto moratorium on the Western side until the end of 1983, if you wish to put it that way.

SPIEGEL: What argument is there against prolonging this de facto moratorium for 2 to 3 years so as to continue negotiating?

Genscher: I believe that the time remaining is sufficient for the matter that needs to be dealt with. Besides, it is my conviction that the very fact that the West is determined to go through with the deployment at the end of 1983 unless the negotiations have achieved concrete results by then will contribute to ensuring serious conduct at the negotiations by the Eastern side as well.

SPIEGEL: You seriously believe that if disarmament does not work, domestic policy will allow the deployment of new U.S. missiles a year before the Bundestag elections?

Genscher: What will be decisive in this respect is whether the people become convinced over the next 2 years that the West is making every attempt to achieve results at the negotiations that will be satisfactory to us. I must tell you quite frankly that I do not want to join the ranks of those who are already predicting negative results just prior to the opening of negotiations. I rather think that it is our task to do everything to accomplish positive results at the negotiations. In that respect I am not so pessimistic.

SPIEGEL: All experiences with arms control show that such talks are extremely difficult. The SALT II negotiations lasted 7 years, and the abortive discussions on MBFR have been going on for 8 years now. Now, suddenly, everything is supposed to be different?

Genscher: It has never before been possible to define the subject of negotiations as precisely as has been done now.

SPIEGEL: The Soviet side sees things differently. Moscow insists that the talks not be confined just to medium-range weapons. The Soviets also feel threatened by the forward based systems [FBS], meaning the airplanes and ships carrying nuclear weapons.

Genscher: I'll tell you what will happen: If it becomes possible to achieve a renunciation of medium-range missiles on both sides, this will have an effect of even more comprehensive disarmament agreements. Why shouldn't the negotiations be conducted in stages?

SPIEGEL: You mean the zero solution?

Genscher: Yes, the zero solution, meaning the mutual renunciation of medium-range missiles, will have an impact on moves toward disarmament in other fields and we can't foresee the extent of this at this time.

SPIEGEL: Why should the Soviets surrender their pawn of superiority in medium-range weaponry in return for no more than just the vague hope that the West would yield in other fields -- such as the FBS?

Genscher: Eastern superiority also exists in the field of those aircraft which form part of the FBS. What also exists, as long as you are talking about pawns, is the Soviet superiority in the conventional field. But I don't believe that we do Soviet interests justice if we think only in terms of a pawn philosophy. The Soviet Union, too, must actually be interested in seeing a realistic disarmament step taken for the first time. In truth SALT II does not represent such a step because it is more limitation than disarmament. If we succeed in attaining the goal of the negotiations we desire in the field of land-based medium-range missiles, I would really consider this to be a turnaround: the arms spiral for the first time turning downward instead of upward. I ask you not to underrate the psychological effect of such a turnaround.

SPIEGEL: Did Brezhnev at least clearly indicate that it is possible to negotiate in stages, that is on medium-range missiles first, and then on forward based systems?

Genscher: He did hint at the possibility of moving in stages, I think this is highly significant.

SPIEGEL: You said earlier that if the forward based systems were included, everything would become highly complicated.

Genscher: Right. Perhaps I am a person once bitten and thus twice shy as a result of the slow moving MBFR troop reduction negotiations in Vienna. What is important is for us to learn the lessons from the MBFR where the negotiations in fact have ended up in a rather technocratic phase even though the discussions on data really are more than a mere technical problem.

SPIEGEL: Suppose the negotiations do not proceed satisfactorily and new missiles are to be deployed. Are you really prepared to extend active political assistance to the peace movement which would grow even stronger if the Americans show up here with these new missiles?

Genscher: Viewing things from today's perspective, I would indeed agree with you with regard to the prospects you mentioned. I say on purpose: viewing things from today's perspective. It is obvious, after all, that an intensive and rational discussion will really begin only with the opening of the disarmament talks. I am quite serious when I say that it will be the task of this government to ensure that these negotiations stay the number one item on the list of international issues.

SPIEGEL: What you primarily mean is that this must be point number one for Washington?

Genscher: Yes, the negotiations must not be pushed out of sight by other problems. To the degree we are contributing to the further development of the Western negotiating position, we will also continue contributing to achieving the results we desire in an exchange of opinions with the Soviet Union on the basis of the Western position.

SPIEGEL: There is no denying the existence of widespread distrust, also among the people of the Federal Republic, that the Americans merely intend to use the negotiations to bridge the time gap until 1983 so as to be able to start deploying their weapons then.

Genscher: The chancellor and I would not have assured the Soviet leaders that we are convinced of the receptiveness to negotiations by the Americans if we did not believe this to be true. What the chancellor told Brezhnev was this: You do not always approve of what we say, but you know that we have never deceived you. Thus we also have a personal reputation to lose: We have pledged ourselves to this.

SPIEGEL: Your only problem is that you have so far failed to convince the doubters. Proof needs yet to be produced to show that the Federal Government in general and the foreign minister in particular actually want more than just to deploy missiles. To many people the reasons advanced so far to justify the rejection of the moratorium are not very plausible.

Genscher: We want to concentrate our energies on creating credibility during the negotiations for even broader circles than has been done to date.

SPIEGEL: Forgive us, Mr Genscher, for digging a bit deeper. Together with the chancellor you elucidated the zero solution to the Soviet general secretary the other day. We remember that some time ago you considered this solution to be utopian.

Genscher: Not I.

SPIEGEL: As late as December 1980, you spoke only of the need to strive for as low a level as possible in the field of medium-range missiles.

Genscher: Not at all. The demand for the zero solution on both sides was contained in the 1980 FDP election program. The zero solution, by the way, is the lowest level.

SPIEGEL: This does not change the fact that you preferred a different way of phrasing things. How do you interpret zero solution anyway?

Genscher: It is the renunciation of land-based medium-range missiles on both sides.

SPIEGEL: Why renunciation of all Soviet missiles? In 1978 Schmidt and Brezhnev spoke of an approximate balance which was to be preserved. At that time the Soviet Union had deployed about 50 SS-20 missiles. It is unrealistic to count on zero now.

Genscher: In 1978 a principle was established. Otherwise the May 1978 statement could be held against both sides.

I must repeat, and I ask you not to underrate the political and psychological significance of this, that we really want to make a new beginning in a significant sphere. What can be said against both sides renouncing medium-range missiles? What can be really said against this?

SPIEGEL: The security interests of a power, which considers itself surrounded by only potential adversaries, could speak against this.

Genscher: In saying this, you have touched on a decisive point. Whenever security is involved, you must always try to put yourself in the position of the other. Even if we believe that the Soviet need for security is exaggerated, we Germans must not forget that we greatly contributed to the Soviets' historical experience in World War II and that led to a strong security need. It will therefore be important to consider negotiations on medium-range weapons not as an isolated matter. It must become clear that something is supposed to begin for us at the negotiations which will go much further.

SPIEGEL: But you insist on the total renunciation of medium-range missiles?

Genscher: The Western side proceeds from a global aspect. It must do it in view of the range. As regards the SS-20, the same launching device can simultaneously threaten West Europe, North Africa, the Middle East, China and Japan. You cannot say that it is aimed at just a certain target. I think it was a mistake for a Soviet medium-range weapon with such a range to be selected without any need.

The intended effect on West Europe could have been achieved with a smaller range. But I do not rule out that during the negotiations the Soviet Union might make offers regarding a shorter range because this would indicate why or against what an SS-20 missile has been deployed in a certain area. Missiles with a shorter range must also eventually be included in the disarmament talks.

Genscher: I believe that we could have made more headway in many disarmament fields if the Soviet Union had shown more preparedness regarding verification. Visibility and verification will be the great issues of future disarmament discussions and negotiations.

SPIEGEL: In other words if the Soviet Union reduced the range of its SS-20 missiles, it could very w ll deploy the SS-20 missiles in the Eastern part of its territory if they no longer threatened Europe.

Genscher: I do not want to speculate any further. The negotiations will take place in Geneva. The highest goal remains total renunciation of land-based medium-range missiles on both sides. For the West this means renunciation of the deployment of such American arms, regardless of where this may be -- in America or elsewhere, not only in West Europe.

SPIEGEL: Brezhnev made his own zero solution proposal here in Bonn. Not only are medium-range missiles supposed to disappear, he wants to also eliminate short-range missiles throughout all of Europe and he speaks of a Europe free of nuclear weapons. This concept plays a great role in the peace movement, although it has not been really accepted by the government.

Genscher: You can't say that. We have repeatedly commented on the problem of a zone free of nuclear weapons. I believe that an area can only be considered nuclear free if there are no nuclear weapons there and if no one can shoot any in.

SPIEGEL: That makes the idea utopian for you right from the start?

Genscher: No. We mean it most seriously when we support renunciation of medium-range missiles on both sides as the initial starting point for more comprehensive steps. Nuclear weapons as a whole are part of the comprehensive security policy structure between the West and the East which is also affected by the conventional superiority of the Soviet Union. I repeat, by the way, that an area will not be free of nuclear weapons if there are none deployed there as long as this area can be threatened by nuclear weapons.

SPIEGEL: The Soviets have said something on this subject: We will not use missiles to threaten those countries which do not have nuclear weapons. Isn't this enough for you?

Genscher: No, because we have not yet deployed any medium-range missiles, yet the Soviet Union has produced medium-range missiles which certainly threaten countries that do not have medium-range missiles.

The federal chancellor and I believe that a zero solution means renunciation on both sides.

SPIEGEL: We were under the impression recently that you and the chancellor actually did not want to use the term detente policy any more or at least only the expression "realistic detente policy," as if the detente policy of the past years was illusory. In the meantime, however, we hear different sounds from both of you again. The communique on Brezhnev's visit contains the prohibited term detente policy. How did this change come about?

Genscher: There would be a change only if your implication were correct.

SPIEGEL: We could prove to you that you have not used that term for some time.

Genscher: I was probably dealing with domestic political issues.

SPIEGEL: Does the social-liberal coalition want to again write detente policy on its banners?

Genscher: It cannot do it again because it is already there, there is no need to draw it up again because it is firmly there. But we must do more to turn detente policy into a comprehensive peace policy. Detente means reduction of tensions. We must not underrate the fact that with the help of the North Atlantic defense alliance we have succeeded in sparing Europe of military conflicts for three and a half decades now. Yet the people of Europe, particularly the younger generation, can rightly expect that a policy of actively safeguarding peace should aim for more in the long run than just a nonwar situation through deterrence -- namely for peace through mutual confidence.

The starting point of the word detente was the necessity to reduce the Cold War. Detente may never be the final aim because more is involved. For Europe it means creating a peace order going beyond the blocs -- an order containing political, economic and security policy elements. The security partnership between the East and the West as demanded by the federal chancellor is a phase on the way to this. Therefore, I believe that the significance of the European disarmament conference with confidence building measures is still underrated by our public.

SPIEGEL: Because nobody has a precise idea of what it could be.

Genscher: I am afraid that you are right. If we bring the conference about, it will lead to a fundamental change of approach in Europe and become the starting point of the building of confidence beyond concrete steps, permitting steps to be made for disarmament and cooperation which seem utopian for all of us today.

SPIEGEL: Doubts have arisen lately in the West regarding the role played by the Germans in the alliance, particularly regarding relations with the Soviet Union. Are you worried by that?

Genscher: No. There certainly are voices expressing such doubts. In our country there are also voices critical of American policy. But we have developed positions in the alliance for example, the dual decision with its negotiation offer. We have never changed our conviction that negotiations must begin immediately. But the Soviet Union first objected for half a year to starting talks. This attitude changed only after the federal chancellor and I were in Moscow in the summer of 1980. After the U.S. elections, we urged the new U.S. administration to initiate negotiations quickly with consideration of our German wishes regarding the content.

SPIEGEL: Are you worried by the new German patriotism? Does it handicap foreign policy?

Genscher: You can speak of German, or better, of European peace patriotism which can be quite helpful with some of its demands -- not all of them -- such as with regard to representing the position of the Federal Government. With this European peace patriotism something is taking place that goes far beyond the Federal Republic and far beyond West Europe.

I believe that a new European identity is developing and being articulated in many European areas with a very strong will to safeguard peace. The fact that it expresses itself with different volume in the West than in the East has something to do with the social systems, not with the intensity of existing feelings and aims.

SPIEGEL: Mr Genscher, the opposition applauded the chancellor's toast at the dinner for Brezhnev. For some Social Democrats it may have been strikingly strong. Would you still say that your kind of detente and peace policies can be achieved only in alliance with the Social Democrats?

Genscher: It always depends on how it is being carried out.

SPIEGEL: What does that mean?

Genscher: Applause for a speech and implementation of a policy are two things. The CSU chairman, for example, has made most skeptical statements regarding the zero solution.

SPIEGEL: So you consider the disarmament policy a new justification for the existence of the SPD/FDP alliance?

Genscher: Clearly yes.

BRANDT: QUICK RESULT NEEDED IN ARMS TALKS

LD301324 Hamburg DPA in Cerman 1126 GMT 30 Nov 81

[Text] Bonn, 30 Nov (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt thinks that the American-Soviet negotiations on nuclear disarmament in Europe which began today have a "favorable starting position." He noted that both the United States and the Soviet Union are seeking a form of zero solution for medium-range weapons, but it would still take a great deal of effort to reduce the very different definitions of the concept of a zero solution to a common denominator, Brandt wrote in a pre-released article in the SOZIALDEMOKRAT magazine, an SPD publication.

Brandt said that in this situation it could be helpful to proceed by stages rather than to negotiate on all weapons systems at the same time. Here Brandt was alluding to the ideas of Washington and the Federal Republic to initially limit negotiations to the land-based medium-range missiles in the interests of speed. Brandt said that the Soviet party and state head, Leonid Brezhnev, had also shown a willingness to proceed by stages, and he [Brandt] warned that not much time was available for the negotiations. A result, or at least a substantial interim result, had to be achieved by the autumn of 1983 -- the date for the commencement of deployment of American nuclear missiles in West Europe if the results of the negotiations are unsatisfactory.

Brandt said that Brezhnev's visit to Bonn had helped matters along. Following President Reagan's statement that the United States wanted to talk with the Soviet Union about all important security questions, the Soviet side let it be known that they are also interested in serious negotiations and "will introduce something substantial to this end."

BAHR CALLS FOR COMPREHENSIVE ARMS TALKS

The British bombers and the French missiles must also be taken into account. Bahr said: "The result will be either the zero solution, in that one says that there will be zero on both sides with regard to missiles and balance with regard to aircraft on both sides — that is to say with regard to East and West and not just with regard to two nations -- or there will be no agreement." Bahr considers the time available — to 1983 — to be quite realistic.

In Bonn the parliamentary manager of the CDU/CSU, Philipp Jenninger, described the counterarming portion of the NATO dual decision as the "sole lever" with which the Soviet Union can be moved to concessions at the negotiating table."

SCHMIDT, HONECKER TALKS 'PROBABLY' 14, 15 DEC

[Text] East Berlin, 30 Nov (DPA) -- It was learned from usually reliably informed circles in East Berlin today that the probable date for the meeting between Schmidt and Honecker has been named as 14 and 15 December. These unofficial circles also expected the chancellor to go to Lake Werbellin in the Schorfheide region, where the Hubertusstock hunting castle was already prepared last year as a residence for the chancellor.

CARSTENS MEETS, HOLDS TALKS WITH SEKOU TOURE

[Summary] Bonn, 30 Nov (DPA) -- Federal President Karl Carstens had his initial talk today with the president of Guinea, Sekou Toure, who has arrived in the Federal Republic on a 5-day visit. Prior to this, he and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher had welcomed the African guest and his party with full military honors at the Villa Hammerschmidt. Sekou Toure's delegation includes 5 ministers. During his visit, Sekou Toure will meet Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Foreign Minister Genscher and Development Aid Minister Rainer Offergeld, as well as German industrialists.

Political Prisoners Discussed

[Text] Bonn, 30 Nov (DPA) — In his first talk with Guinea President Sekou Toure, Federal President Karl Carstens raised the problem of political prisoners in Guinea. A spokesman of the president's office said today that Carstens expressed the wish that Guinea's foreign minister, Abdoulaye Toure, make himself available for talks on this matter.

The spokesman said that in the 45-minute talk the federal president also referred to the "temporary strain" on relations between the Federal Republic and Guinea, that is, the breaking of relations between 1971 and 1976 on Sekou Toure's initiative. He also expressed regret that the president's program does not include a visit to Berlin. According to the spokesman, in the talk Sekou Toure spoke in favor of overcoming the division of Germany and stressed that he supports this wish for reasons of principle.

Cooperation Agreements Signed

[Text] 30 Nov, (DPA) — The Foreign Ministry reports that Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has signed three agreements on financial and technological cooperation with his Guinean opposite number, Abdoulaye Toure. According to the Foreign Ministry report, it has been agreed to provide DM16.1 million for the development of Conakry port and DM3.4 million for the fund for students and experts.

The two ministers earlier held a 1-hour talk on bilateral relations and international issues. It was announced that Genscher had stressed, in this respect, the importance which the Federal Government attributed to true nonalignment.

SEYCHELLES REQUESTS DEVELOPMENT AID FROM BONN

[Summary] Bonn, 30 Nov (DPA) -- Seychelles Minister for Planning and Development Dr Maxime Ferrari has asked Bonn for aid for his country. Ferrari said that President Albert Rene's government still feels threatened. It is particularly alarmed at unidentified aircraft circling over the main island of Mahe. The minister said that following the failed coup, Tanzania, France and India have already offered aid. He rejected rumors of planned cooperation between the Seychelles and the Soviet Union.

NO PRESSURE TO SET NEW ARMS EXPORTS GUIDELINES

Becker confirmed that a report in DER SPIEGEL was broadly correct in stating that Saudi Arabia has once again inquired about supply conditions in a roundabout fashion via the Munich manufacturing firm of Krauss-Maffei. Krauss-Maffei then sent a letter to Bonn, asking when it would be advisable to make an application for export permission. The extent of the supplies was given in this letter as being 72 antiaircraft tanks and 151 battle tanks of the Leopard II type.

Saudi Arabia has repeatedly expressed its interests in such German arms products when the two sides have met, Becker said. But the representatives of the Arab kingdom have nevertheless expressed understanding "for the specific position" of the Federal Government which has not yet been able to decide on permitting exports. The new guidlines, which the federal cabinet has been discussing for months, have, contrary to earlier suppositions, not yet been adopted. It seems that further delays are to be expected since Becker expressly stressed that there is no pressure of time.

Export Data Released

Altogether, export permits for the quoted 6 years were made up by half for arms deliveries to NATO countries and countries in an "equal position" (such as Switzerland or Australia), and the other half for "other countries" (above all Third World states). According to current government guidelines in force since 1971, exports to NATO and other Western oriented countries receive permission by Bonn as a matter of course. Arms exports to "other countries" are only permitted on the basis of special permission.

The size of arms exports to "other countries" has risen steadily in the last years, however. In 1980, 70 percent of export permits were for orders from the Third World (NATO countries and similar: 30 percent). The largest part of this is made up of ships.

Arms exports account for 2.6 percent of total exports, and were slightly higher in 1980 than the average for the last 6 years.

Internationally, the FRG takes fifth or sixth place in arms deliveries to the Third World, behind the United States, the USSR, France, Great Britain and Italy. The framework for German arms exports is currently being examined in Bonn.

ISRAELI ENVOY SEES IMPROVED RELATIONS WITH FRG

[Text] Kiel, 28 Nov (DPA) -- In the opinion of Yitzhaq Ben-Ari, the Israeli ambassador to Bonn, relations between Israel and the Federal Republic have recently "improved in every respect." The ambassador said in a DPA interview in Kiel today that it is true "that early in the year relations between the two countries were at a low ebb, but today we have made some progress."

Yitzhaq Ben-Ari, who was in the capital of Schleswig-Holstein at the invitation of the Kiel Press Club, made particular reference to the long years "of good relations and the mutual understanding between the younger generations" so that a battered relationship between two personalities does not impair the spirit and diversity of these relations."

Here the ambassador left no doubt concerning the fact that he was referring to the public differences of opinion between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin. He said: "Since the spring there has been an exchange of telegrams between the two men." They also "met and greeted" each other in Cairo at As-Sadat's funeral. In addition there has meanwhile also been a series of meetings, such as the visit by Annemarie Renger to Israel, which are proof "that we should look to the future," Ben-Ari said.

CHEYSSON, ROMANIA'S ANDREI COMPLETE TALKS

[Text] Romanian Foreign Minister Stefan Andrei completes his talks with Mr Cheysson, his French counterpart, this Wednesday, 25 November. The Romanian minister, who arrived in Paris Monday, had talks with Mr Mitterrand Tuesday. Before returning to Bucharest he has had or will have meetings with three ministers of state, Mr Jobert (foreign trade), Mr Rocard (planning) and Mr Defferre (interior) and with National Assembly Chairman Mermaz and PS First Secretary Jospin.

On Tuesday Mr Andrei and Mr Cheysson discussed major international problems (Madrid conference, disarmament, Near East, Poland, North-South Afghanistan) and French-Romanian economic relations -- a subject previously discussed with Mr Jobert.

Mr Cheysson said that France wants to see major current projects completed before starting new ambitious operations, but in his toast at the lunch at the Quai D'Orsay the French minister stressed that Romania's current financial difficulties should not "lead to a stagnation or even a regression in trade between the two countries."

The Romanian debt in convertible currencies amounts to $11 billion (or 20 percent of its GNP), of which $2 billion are short-term debts, and interest charges account for 30 percent of Romanian exports to the West.

The two delegations welcomed the quality of French-Romanian political relations and expressed the wish that visits be stepped up. In the cultural sphere, in which relations are also good, there are plans to hold a French-Romanian colloquium in 1982 on a subjects to be decided later.

Humanitarian cases -- mixed marriages, reuniting families -- were raised by the French delegation, which stressed the very great importance which France attaches to the settlement of the many outstanding cases.

Reports To Cabinet

[Text] Romanian Foreign Minister Stefan Andrei left Paris this Thrusday, 26 November, after breakfasting with Mr Gaston Defferre. After being received during his 2-day official visit by Mr Mitterrand, Mr Jospin and National Assembly Chairman Mr Mermaz, Mr Andrei had two meetings with Mr Cheysson Wednesday.

At the cabinet meeting at the Elysee Wednesday Mr Cheysson indicated, with regard to economic relations, that the "financial difficulties" encountered by Romania had been the subject of "detailed discussions, France being anxious to find ways of supporting the Romanian recovery effort." Romanian head of state Ceausescu referred to those difficulties Wednesday at his party's Central Committee meeting, stating, in particular, that 80 percent of the oil imported by Romania comes from countries which are not members of the socialist community and that the leaders of that community had refused to hold a CEMA economic summit last year, as Bucharest was proposing.

With regard to the international situation, Mr Cheysson told the cabinet that Romania, France and Yugoslavia -- which the external relations minister has just visited -- "have very similar analyses and approaches on some of the major current problems such as relations with the southern countries, the Near East, Afghanistan, and the search for a balance of forces at the lowest possible level."

During Mr Andrei's visit the International Human Rights Federation and the League for the Defense of Human Rights, in Romania, sent a telegram to the Romanian minister calling for the release of Orthodox priest Dumitreasa, who has been in prison in Romania for several years, and for an end to "proceedings against the striking miners of the Motru Valley or against those asking for their rights to be respected."

MARCHAIS RALLY ADDRESS CRITICAL OF GOVERNMENT

PM301315 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 23 Nov 81 pp 4,5

["Full Text" of speech by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais at LE MARSEILLAISE festival in Marseilles on 22 November: "It Is for the Workers To Seize Every New Opportunity To Remove the Obstacles to Change"]

It is with great pleasure that I meet you once again on the occasion of this fine festival of the newspaper LE MARSEILLAISE.

Many things have changed since I last came to your city. By their votes last spring the French people ended 23 years of rightwing power. And today, for the first time in 23 years, Communist ministers are participating in France's government. Thus there are now many possibilities for satisfying your demands, your aspirations and your needs and for answering the major questions facing our people and our country. In this new situation -- which, it must be said, is unprecedented in our country -- how can we ensure that every opportunity is grasped, that together we secure all we can in all spheres, in short that we progress as far, as fast and as surely as we can: That is the question. It is this question which I am suggesting we consider here together.

A Constructive Spirit

Of course 6 months is too short to be able to pass a final judgment on the government's action. There is already no doubt that measures have been taken which go in the right direction. This is the case with the increase in the minimum wage and in various social benefits, the creation of public jobs and the freezing of some prices. This is the case with the nationalizations and the budget, which devotes considerable funds to job creation and economic recovery while moving toward greater justice. This is the case with the definition of new rights for the workers in the enterprises and of decentralization. Other measures favorable to the world of labor and the nation are going to be introduced.

It is true that all the measures do not go as far as the solutions which we put forward during the presidential election campaign. But we knew that from the start. The voters made their choice: We respect it; and we are making the best contribution we can, within the framework which they defined, to implementing all the changes which they chose.

We are particularly determined to act in this way because we are aware of having really added our blocks to the edifice now being constructed. First, of course, because we played our full part in the 10 May victory. But, on a deeper level, because the struggles we waged over recent years and the ideas which we sowed had an effect. In the action of the government and the majority we recognize demands and proposals which we helped to draw up, expound and have approved.

Today the Communist ministers are taking action which has already proved useful in important spheres for the workers and the country. Our deputies and senators are contributing to the new majority's action. Our members and elected representatives throughout the country are playing an energetic part in success. Thus we have every reason to continue our efforts on all planes and at all levels to attain all the objectives for which the majority and the government were formed. This constructive spirit guides all our action.

Of course not all the problems have certainly yet been solved. The major questions -- unemployment, price increases, difficult living and working conditions -- remain. The crisis, which is hitting the workers and their families hard, is still raging. There is therefore still a great deal to be done.

We are fully aware of this too. Some 23 years of rule by the right, 7 years of Giscardian government -- this past is a heavy burden. Its consequences cannot be removed in a day. The serious nature of these consequences shows what changes are necessary.

This is the precise reason why we regret the fact that several constructive proposals put forward by the Communists have not been accepted. For instance the proposal for a bigger increase in the minimum wage. Or the proposal for extending the sphere of application of the wealth tax. Or the proposal for taxing the profits of the big foreign oil companies and thus preventing the gasoline price from increasing too much. Or the proposal for solving the social security problems without conceding to the employers the 1 percent increase in wage earners' contributions.

It is not only in the economic and social sphere, in domestic policy, that a vast new sphere of action is being opened up to us. This is also true of international policy, of the major questions of our time such as peace, independence, security justice and fraternity in the world.

I will cite just one example to illustrate this: disarmament and the elimination of the great scourges which are ravaging the Third World. As you know it is impossible to spend money twice: once for bombs and once for men; once for death and once for life. Now, we have reached the point of madness. On the one hand 800 million human beings are hungry or undernourished. Some 18 million children under 5 years of age die each year. Some 70 percent of children in underdeveloped countries suffer from infectious or parasitic diseases. Three out of every 10 adults cannot read or write. On the other hand the money spent to construct a single intercontinental missile would be enough to serve 50 million meals or construct 34,000 schools. This is the relentless course against which we are fighting by trying to unite the most diverse people in this battle. That is why we took part in the rally which the peace movement staged in Paris. Echoing the demand for peace which is growing throughout Europe, more than 100,000 people, of all opinions and beliefs, stated loud and clear at that meeting their rejection of the deployment of new missiles in Europe; their desire to see the start and successful conclusion of negotiations to reduce all medium-range nuclear arms, primarily American and Soviet; their demand for a universal ban on the neutron bomb. I call on you in your millions to endorse the Paris appeal adopted at that meeting.

This action for peace has scored initial points: it has forced the American administration to accept the start of negotiations in Geneva on 30 November. It must therefore be continued and extended to ensure that the negotiations produce positive results, despite the great obstacles which remain. Our country can now play a new role in this vital struggle. Yes, ours is the country of Victor Hugo who dreamed that "the vast wings of peace might open, motionless, in the sky" over nations. Yes, ours is the party of Paul Eluard, who wrote during the days of the Cold War and colonial wars: "The man who is possessed by peace is crowned with hope."

A Vast and Profound Democratic Debate

Dear friends and comrades, all these are questions which the Communists are discussing passionately at the present time in preparation for their next congress which will be held in February. Appearing each day in L'HUMANITE is an open forum in which they express their viewpoints on the past and the future, and on what should be done today. At the same time in all the cells hundreds of thousands of Communists are examining the draft resolution on which they must take a sovereign decision. This is a vast and profound democratic debate which has no parallel in France.

This debate combines thought and action. Like all our activity it is directed toward the exclusive service of the workers and the country.

You can count on the Communists. I have demonstrated that we are acting and intend to act increasingly effectively as a party of struggle and government. If we are to do this with increasing efficiency we need you. I invite you to join our party. The present struggle against the forces of the past which are hanging onto their privileges is a hard one. But I am convinced that together we are going to continue the work we have started. We are going to progress on the path of the changes which you want, of socialism. Have confidence!

LE MONDE VIEWS OUTCOME OF EUROPEAN SUMMIT

[Editorial: "Europe Adjourned"]

[Text] Virtually nothing was resolved by the European Council meeting in London but, as regards the interests of both France and the community, no serious damage was done.

A first, very modest step was taken toward boosting community activity in that the Ten pledged themselves to adopt a program accompanied by a timetable before 31 March 1982. However, the real object of the meeting was to try to smooth out the disputes over the agricultural policy and the budget which have been poisoning the climate in Europe for years. Mr Mitterrand has stuck to the strategy adopted in this matter by the government several months ago: "I am all for agreeing to a supplementary financial effort in favor of Britain," he explained, "but on the condition that the common agricultural policy ceases to be constantly called into question and that, furthermore, ample consideration is given to suggestions made by the French as regards reforms to that policy."

The European Council, which is not used to this type of exercise, therefore witnessed, with a certain amount of astonishment, a strong and argued defence of the small milk producers who are unjustly ill-treated, while it is the industrial farmers who are primarily responsible for the surpluses.

The knowledge that we could count on the understanding, the approval even, of Chancellor Schmidt, made it all the easier for the president to adhere to this line. Their meeting on Friday was fruitful.

On the eve of the European Council meeting, it seemed that the traditional hostility of the German spokesmen had been rekindled or, even worse, that they were renouncing the French-German "pact" which was hitherto the locomotive of all European progress. The French could well have feared that the Germans would form a coalition with the British. Thanks to Mr Schmidt, these fears proved groundless. Mr Mitterrand himself also made a considerable effort to try to understand Bonn's worries, and their meeting gave them an opportunity to compare opinions.

As regards the new financial compensation that Mrs Thatcher is demanding, France and Germany find themselves on the same wavelength, that of prudence. The British prime minister scored few points during the London session. She is almost sure that her country will get a "raise" but she knows that her partners mean to reduce their contributions. Will she resign herself to this? Certainly not, for the moment. During the coming weeks, British diplomacy will again try to wean the FRG away from France and to win it round to its own views. The result of this triangular encounter will be decisive.

If Mrs Thatcher fails, she can resort to using her ultimate weapon, namely the veto, when agricultural prices are fixed in the spring of 1982.

Everyone hopes, without counting on this too much, that the foreign ministers, to whom the heads of state and government have passed on this problem, will find the magic formula in time for Christmas -- a formula that will spare the community further trials.

PAPER COMMENTS ON FES SUMMIT IMPLICATIONS

[Editorial: "The Failure of the Arab Summit"]

This has, therefore, destroyed the Moroccan king's dream of seeing a repetition in his country of an Arab diplomatic event as important as the Rabat summit's resolution in October 1974 unanimously recognizing "the PLO as the Palestinian people's sole and legitimate representative over the whole liberated territory." Riyadh's burning desire to have its primacy among the Arab capitals finally accepted by offering them an alternative solution to the hated Camp David accords has not been fulfilled.

The Arab camp's "hardliners" -- Syria, Iraq, Libya and Algeria -- which, moreover were not represented by their heads of state in Fes, had been unable to decide to ratify point VII of the Fahd plan which recognizes "the right of all states in the region to live in peace." Israel's existence, even by implication, is still rejected by the "hardliner" front.

Before having one of his main aides describe the Saudi plan as "inopportune, unacceptable and dangerous," Mr 'Arafat had praised its merits, going so far as to regard it as "a very good and very important platform with a view to establishing a lasting and comprehensive peace in the Near East." This is not the first time that the PLO chairman has been forced to back down after showing moderation. Some Palestinians, who are in a minority in the organization, still think that the rejection of the Fahd plan by the Arabs is primarily "a victory for Israel."

Indeed Mr Begin who asserted once again on French television on Wednesday evening that he would "in no circumstances" negotiate with "the so-called PLO which wants Israel's destruction," has reason to be pleased. He will be able to calmly continue to fob off Egypt -- and the Palestinian people -- by referring to the barren "Palestinian annex" of the Washington treaty which emerged from the Camp David agreements.

Moreover there is reason to wonder whether some of those responsible for the Fes failure -- and for the Israeli prime minister's jubilation -- are to be found in the American capital. While Moscow was observing cautious silence on a plan which might bring the Soviets back into the Near East game but which came from the pro-Western camp, and while Paris was approving it with some reservations, Washington considered that Amir Fahd's proposals were, all in all, just a "reaffirmation of the Saudi positions.

The snub which has been inflicted on Riyadh -- America's ally in the Arab world -- is bound to worry all the pro-Western regimes and especially Egypt which has just held highly symbolic joint military maneuvers with Washington.

By clearly demonstrating its inability to agree on a text, even an amended one, the Arab world may be paving the way for new upheavals in Lebanon on which, paradoxically, it reached agreement in Fes.

SPADOLINI SEES SUCCESS FOR GENEVA ARMS TALKS

[Text] Rome, 30 Nov (ANSA) -- Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini augured a successful conclusion to United States-Soviet Union talks on the reduction of medium-range nuclear-tipped missiles in Europe (which got underway today in Geneva) underlining Europe's contribution to furthering arms limitation in declarations made here this afternoon to the press.

"It is with the utmost satisfaction that Italy hails the formal initiation of the opening of negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union of the reduction and the control of nuclear theater forces," Spadolini announced.

"The realization of this first step towards re-establishing a climate of improved confidence in international relations," Spadolini added, "has been contributed to by Europe with initiatives and ideas which cannot be either undervalued or ignored."

"In this context, it is significant that the recent European Council meeting in London found itself united in favorable reception of the results of the meeting in Bonn between (West German Chancellor Helmut) Schmidt and (Soviet Union President Leonid) Brezhnev, and in no less a manner than it received the announcement of American President Ronald Reagan relative to the zero option.

"In both cases," Spadolini continued, "the willingness to dialogue and negotiation was confirmed, and this (willingness) remains for us the foundation of international relations, and something we have long been fighting for."

Expounding on the "zero option" idea, the prime minister said that "I remember my meetings in Rome in September with the West German chancellor during which we defined the concept of the zero option (the concept) on which today the hopes for peace among the European peoples are based.

"During those same meetings," Spadolini concluded, "Chancellor Schmidt and myself underlined the role of Europe as a political subject active in the context of global negotiations between the East and West."

Next year's trade will exceed this year's by 20 percent. The structure of Finnish exports is traditional and it is not necessary essentially to reduce the export volume of any Finnish productive sector.

Finnish metal industry exports to the Soviet Union next year will reach the record figure of 6.5 billion markkaa. The share of the forest industry is traditionally about 25 percent, and the value of its exports will be 3.4 billion markkaa. It is estimated that the value of consumer goods exports will be more than 1.3 billion markkaa. The structure of imports will also continue to be traditional. Crude oil imports will amount to 7-7.5 million tons. The volume of natural gas and solid fuel imports will remain the same.

NORWAY

WILLOCH WELCOMES 'COMPREHENSIVE' U.S. ARMS OFFER

PM301453 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 23 Nov 81 p 15

[Text] Tromso -- "Norway welcomes the U.S. disarmament initiative," Prime Minister Kaare Willoch said in a speech here Sunday evening. Willoch referred to President Reagan's 18 November speech in which he put forward the idea of removing nuclear-armed medium-range missiles from Europe, as well as reciprocal reductions in conventional forces and in intercontinental nuclear missile arsenals. Willoch described Reagan's speech as a comprehensive offer to the Soviet Union and an important move in the West's work to achieve real disarmament both in East and West.

The prime minister expressed disappointment at the negative Soviet reaction to Reagan's demarche, but stressed that too much importance should not be attached to this initial reaction.

DEFENSE MINISTRY WANTS HAWK SYSTEM FOR AIRBASES

[Excerpts] The Defense Ministry will back Norway's purchasing the "improved Hawk" missile system for the defense of airbases instead of the Roland II, as was previously proposed. According to information received by AFTENPOSTEN, the high command is now working on final plans for such a purchase. In the first instance it has been proposed that six missile batteries be bought and existing antiaircraft installations be modernized. Together these two courses of action will be much cheaper than the Roland II. The ministry's political leaders want a swift decision on the matter.

The ministry wants a swift decision on this issue because of the need for adequate defenses for our airbases. In addition both the U.S. armed forces and Denmark are interested in rapid deliveries of improved Hawk systems. For this reason it is important for Norway to make up its mind soon if the delivery of the missile systems from the United States is not to take too long.

DAILY TELEGRAPH NOTES 'CLEARING OF THE AIR'

[Text] Some clearing of the air on the nuclear weapons front has taken place during the past few days -- in Bonn, in Washington and also in our own crucially strategic island home. Any hopes that Mr Brezhnev, shaken by the mounting food and economic crisis in his far-flung communist paradise, would respond encouragingly to President Reagan's "zero option" missile-scrapping proposal were quickly dashed. On the other hand, Chancellor Schmidt has vigorously dispelled fears that, under pressure from the neutralist left wing of his Social Democrat Party and the "peace" demos, he would succumb to Mr Brezhnev's threats and blandishments. Mr Brezhnev's old offer to "withdraw" some missiles if NATO would indefinitely postpone its cruise-Pershing deployment was rejected. So America can meet Russia for the European missile negotiations in Geneva next Monday with her powder dry and her NATO allies in reasonably good order -- although at a sad disadvantage so far as actually deployed weapons are concerned.

A modicum of consolation may be found by the Russians, looking hopefully ahead, in the appointment of Mr John Silkin, who might best be described as a ego-unilateralist, as Labour's spokesman for defence in the shadow cabinet. His protestations of staunch loyalty to NATO will not lessen the favour with which the Kremlin's overseas department will look on his appointment. He appears quite happy to be protected by American nuclear weapons after not only scrapping Britian's but also closing down American nuclear bases here. The question arises as to whether America, so rebuffed by such a Britain, would be prepared to accept the enormously, probably prohibitively, increased risks of continuing to protect it.

As for the British people, it now appears that they have, after all, a refreshingly robust and patriotic attitude to nuclear defence, although in some respects a rather muddled one, according to the poll conducted for the BBC by MORI in conjunction with Prof Martin's Reith lectures. The unilateralist bogy is cut down to size. Less than a quarter say they support it and less than a third even of the young. Yet, incongruously, while there is a majority for Britain retaining her own nuclear weapons, there is also a majority for removing American nuclear bases from Britain. Overwhelming support for continued membership of NATO is accompanied by a majority of preference for a European nuclear defence independent of America. There is much mistrust of America, but very much more of Russia. Do they realise the problems of creating a nuclear Europe, including Germany? Our comment must be: "Many good ideas, but more homework and clearer thinking needed." Over to you, Prof Martin.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES ZHIVKOV SUPPORT FOR KIPRIANOU

Denktas added: The Cyprus problem cannot be discussed in any venue without the consent of the Turkish Cypriot community. Resolutions reached at meetings in which the Turkish Cypriot community has no voice cannot be binding on the Turkish side.

COSAR BRIEFS JOURNALISTS ON ANKARA MISSION

[Text] Economy and Finance Minister Salih Cosar has said that the budget for fiscal 1982 would be approximately 12 billion Turkish lira. The minister made this statement at a news conference today where he briefed correspondents on his recent visit to Ankara. Noting that, as usual, the Turkish Cypriot delegation was received with enthusiasm in Turkey and that great importance was attached to issues concerning the fate of the TFSC and the Turkish Cypriot community, Cosar added that talks were not limited to budgetary subjects but included rational and radical measures that will revive the Turkish Cypriot economy.

Cosar said the draft budget for fiscal 1982 envisaged current expenditures of TL8 billion, defense spending of TL750 million and investments of TL3.2 billion. Cosar said this represented an increase of 40 percent in current and defense spending and an increase of 160 percent in investments compared to the budget for fiscal 1981.

President Kiprianou expressed the desire for further strengthening the friendly relations and cooperation between the PLO and Cyprus to the mutual benefit of the two peoples and in the interest of peace and security in the area.

PAPANDREOU STATEMENT 'SHUTS DOOR TO DIALOGUE'

NC301153 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 26 Nov 81 pp 2, 14

[Sami Kohen article: "We Have Waited and ... Seen"]

Both the government program and Papandreou's response to criticism were practically a true copy of his utterances during his election campaign. Certain gestures by Papandreou during the days when Ankara had chosen to "wait and see" had created certain hopes. This meant that as a politician Papandreou could push aside what he had said for home consumption and adopt a more realistic and pragmatic attitude as prime minister. But unfortunately it was not necessary to "wait" for long to "see" his true intentions. The new Greek leader clearly proved his tough and intransigent attitude in the document he submitted and in his speech. Thus he has shaken all the hopes nourished for the future.

The following is the gist of what Papandreou said: "The Greeks want friendship with Turkey, but they cannot under any circumstances abandon their rights in the Aegean and their views on the Cyprus dispute. The land, the airspace and the territorial waters of Greece in the Aegean cannot be discussed by any means. Conducting intercommunal negotiations in Cyprus while the Turkish troops are on the island is futile. No friendship is feasible before this matter is resolved." As a matter of fact, Papandreou believes that sitting at the negotiating table with Turkey under the current conditions would be tantamount to admitting some kind of "weakness."

This means in fact that what the new Greek prime minister wants is for Turkey to accept in advance all the views of Greece concerning the Aegan and Cyprus. If this happened, he would graciously decide in favor of continuation of the dialogue.

Finally, as far as the Cyprus issue is concerned, he suggests that any negotiations, if conducted at all, should be conducted between the Greek Cypriot administration and Ankara.

By saying "these are important issues; they are linked with Greece's vital interests and cannot be discussed," and "as for discussing third category issues, there is no need to waste time," the Greek prime minister has shut the door to the Turkish-Greek dialogue just when the two countries had begun to create an air of rapprochement and a better understanding in recent months. We were just about to leave the atmosphere of tension and even the distrust of the seventies.

What Papandreou fails to understand is that matters concerning the continental shelf, the airspace and the sea as well as the Cyprus dispute, cannot be resolved overnight. If reconciliation is preferred to conflict, then the dialogue will have to be continued patiently. Neighbors have to get used to "coexisting with their problems."

We were expecting the new Greek Government to choose this path, which was also chosen by the previous ones. But we are seeing clearly now that Papandreou is getting farther and farther away from this path.

VOTCP RAPS FORTHCOMING WEINBERGER VISIT TO ANKARA

TA010818 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 1 Dec 81

[Text] Dear listeners, U.S. war minister Weinberger will arrive in Ankara on 3 December. In a statement to the daily TERCUMAN, Weinberger said: The situation in the Middle East and on NATO's southeastern flank is deteriorating rapidly. Recent statements by Papandreou have rendered the situation more critical. This situation troubles Washington. This statement reveals the purpose of his visit; Weinberger is coming to apply pressure on Turkey and to threaten Greece. According to a U.S. armed forces magazine which reflects the views of the Pentagon, pressure will be applied on Turkey on two issues: one is stationing rapid deployment forces in Turkey and the other is a more extensive use of Turkey in its Middle East policy. The Reagan administration is planning to use the Rapid Deployment Force as a tool of aggression against peace-loving and progressive forces in the region. It is attempting to transform Turkey into the watchman of U.S. imperialist interests in the region, thus using our country against peace and security in the region. The United States is taking advantage of Turkey's economic situation in imposing its policy.

As Sami Kohen pointed out in an article in MILLIYET, the Washington administrators are using the economic and military aid mechanism as a tool to impose their political demands on Turkey, which they believe has economic difficulties. TERCUMAN journalists are exerting efforts to create a psychological atmosphere for these pressures, which are a blatant interference in our domestic affairs.

According to this daily, which is the mouthpiece of the most reactionary forces and the monopolies, Weinberger's Ankara visit will constitute a new development in healing the wounds caused by the embargo. This is tantamount to further arming the Turkish armed forces within NATO in a bid to serve the interests of U.S. imperialism. It is a fact that this intense armament within the framework of the plans aimed at strengthening NATO's southeastern flank is driving the Trukish economy to the brink of destruction. On the other hand, it is a well-known fact that arms sold to Turkey are outdated. This fact was once more confirmed in the two recent plane crashes in Thrace.

Why should Turkey spend billions of liras to arm itself? Our country is not threatened. The Soviet policy is clear. Brezhnev's concrete proposals stated at the 26th CPSU Congress are a realistic path leading to the solution of regional problems. The policy of our neighbor Bulgaria is also clear. This country, which has proposed purging the Balkans of nuclear arms, is pursuing a policy aimed at reducing tension in the region.

Now let's talk about Greece. Pro-Americans have been defeated in this NATO country. The Papandreou government, which recently received a vote of confidence, announced that the country's membership in NATO will be reviewed. Talks concerning U.S. bases on Greek soil will start at the beginning of 1982. This frightens Washington. Reagan has already threatened to cut all aid in the event Greece withdraws from NATO's military wing. Furthermore, the future of nuclear arms in Greece concerns the Reagan administration. There are rumors that if Greece removes nuclear arms from its territory they will be deployed in NATO and U.S. bases in Turkey.

One should not be surprised. The Pentagon had even prepared plans for a military overthrow to prevent Papandreou's election. This plan, which was later rejected, stipulated the use of Turkey as well. This plan was not applied; however, it has not been renounced for good. This plan once more confirms that NATO and U.S. imperialism are provoking enmity between two neighboring countries. These two countries can solve their differences without the interference of imperialism and NATO. The progressive and peace-loving forces of the two countries are struggling for just such a solution of the problems between Turkey and Greece. (?In short), Weinberger's visit to Ankara will neither contribute to our national interests nor to strengthening stability in the region. Therefore, our people protest these visits, which are contrary to our national interests.

SOURCES DENY NATO OFFER SCHEDULED FOR 10 DEC

LD011328 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1230 GMT 1 Dec 81

FRENCH COMMISSIONER DISCUSSES EEC PROBLEMS

[Excerpt] LE MATIN: In what state of mind did you return here [to the EEC] after 20 years' absence?

Pisani: With the feeling that the task is immense. When I compare the institutions as they were 20 years ago with what they have now become I am very dejected. At that time we discussed only politics. I mean the essential choices. Now we tend to be grocers. In other words sectoral, individual, miniscule conflicts inevitably seem to reach the commission and the council of ministers. And they become lost there.

LE MATIN: Has the commission lost its authority?

Pisani: The two phenomena are parallel. The commission has lost its authority becuase of the reemergence of nationalism. As soon as people are no longer in Brussels to build Europe but to defend national or sectoral interests within Europe, the council of ministers becomes different from what it was originally. Europe is no longer being built, but is involved in dealings. As the discussions become more detailed and more mercenary, the commission follows the same trend. It no longer embodies the European spirit.

LE MATIN: Things seem to be decided less and less in the council of ministers and the commission and more and more at "summits...."

Pisani: Yes and no. Ultimately the most striking phenomenon is the importance assumed by the committee of permanent representatives -- the ministers' delegates. It comprises top ambassadors who make deals in pigs, grain, textiles and subsidies. Moreover it is at this level of expert committees that things are planned and even decided in advance. At the same time it has been decided to go beyond ministerial level and reach head of state or of government level in the hope that the latter would at least not enter into technical debates or dealings. That was true, is still sometimes true but is no longer true all the time.

LE MATIN: Does the London summit have any chance of steering Europe out of this situation?

Pisani: It is at the London summit that the states and governments must react to the proposals the commission has made in the framework of the mandate it received 18 months ago to solve everything at the same time: the budgetary problem, the agricultural policy problem and the question of the other policies. If the problem is posed in these terms, London is decisive. But in fact so many problems will not be solved in one meeting. And if London is so important and if the chances of success are slim, it would have been better to postpone London rather than have a meeting of heads of state which would end in failure. When 10 heads of state and government meet it is a serious business. If they are not satisfied with the document we have submitted, they should send it back for further work. But they must send it back with a clear mandate. The commission has suffered from the fact that the mandate to which it responded was a circumstantial mandate, without clarity, vision or objective. Rather than start discussions at a technical level, the heads of state meeting in London must tell us -- it is their responsibility and not ours -- what Europe is and what place is has in the world. It will be up to us to say how this result can be attained.

LE MATIN: Will green Europe be called into question in London?

Pisani: In fact this is the only common policy. The logic in which it has become locked is not good. On the basis of a budgetary crisis, a request was made for a new agricultural policy to be drawn up and, in addition, for policies to be drawn up which hitherto have not existed as European policies. In other words a budgetary constraint was taken as a basis for solving two problems which are not related to it. The first is to give a new style to the agricultural policy; the second to dream up other policies. In my view it would have been infinitely more satisfying to start by demanding that Europe be endowed with a new agricultural policy after which, once the budgetary margins were known, the funds which could have been devoted to new policies would have been decided.

The principles of the common agricultural policy are good. A different policy could not have been adopted 20 years ago. But it is unnatural for it to have remained the same for 20 years. Everywhere else -- in Australia, the United States and Canada -- there has been a change of agricultural policy. Why has Europe not changed its agriculture policy when its agriculture has changed more than U.S. agriculture? Hence restoring a more stringent policy means eliminating a number of practices which no longer have any raison d'etre and which have even become perverse. I would like to give two examples: Feeding calves on reconstituted milk is terribly costly in both energy and money. Now this practice is not the result of technological or nutritional developments; it is merely the result of a differential price. The European pricing system has produced a way of raising calves and of doing so in the most costly way! It is outrageous!

Let's take a second example: At present wine is sweetened with beet sugar. In other words with a sugar which is not the same as the one present in the grape. Why not deliberately and obstinately encourage the use of grape sugar to sweeten wine? That would enable us to absorb a very large part of our poor-quality wine surplus and to have vintages which would probably be better.

LE MATIN: Europe's balance is going to be shifted to the south with the entry of Spain and Portugal. Is there not a risk of the EEC being diluted into a mere free trade area?

Pisani: Technically speaking, the expansion is a daunting operation. It is necessary politically. Europe did not accept Spain, Portugal and Greece a few years ago for reasons which were not related to geography or history but to those countries' undemocratic systems. Those three countries have passed miraculously from dictatorship to democracy, and they immediately knocked at our door, saying, "Take care, freedom is a fragile possession; we know that more than anybody. Our freedom would be better protected if we were in the community."

This presents us with a fundamental problem to which, as democrats and socialists, we reply yes. But the expansion, in other words the accession of Spain and Portugal, poses a number of problems we must have the courage to approach in turn, to answer them as clearly as possible. First there is an institutional problem. Unless the community tightens things up and adopts better working methods than it now has, it is clear that things will be much more complicated with 12 members than with 10. Spain's entry raises the question of the way the institutions function.

The second problem posed by the EEC's expansion is that of adjusting the balance between north and south. Indeed after being balanced around the French model, half northern plains and half Mediterranean, with the expansion to 10 members Europe's balance was upset to the north's advantage and the Mediterranean's disadvantage. Spain's and Portugal's entry into the EEC, after Greece, restores Europe's real balance between the Mediterranean and the northern plains.

I know the entry of Spain and Portugal will aggravate an existing crisis: the crisis of the vine-growing south. But the conflict between France and Italy over wine problems preceded Spain's entry into the EEC. It exists. Now I observe that the community is not capable of solving it in the absence of expansion. Doesn't the entry of Spain and Portugal into the community give us an opportunity to draw up a policy for our Mediterranean regions which at the same time takes account of the existing crisis?

The problem doesn't end there: The EEC is involved in preferential relations with a number of Mediterranean countries. What would the significance be of mediocre agreements which would lead us to break off any positive relationship with the African and Middle Eastern countries? What positive aspects would there be in a policy of insularity which would completely destroy the markets for Tunisia's or Israel's fruit and vegetables, wine and olive oil?

It so happens that by dint of moving toward specialized crops, by dint, possibly of neglecting the research it should have carried out into ensuring its subsistence, the Mediterranean has become something of a back garden for a north European economy from which the latter obtains its desserts and luxuries. Surely there is a real problem -- that of redisigning a Mediterranean agriculture in which basic products would again have a place. Do we think we can enclose ourselves inside a wall which would cut across the middle of the Mediterranean and protect our southern economy at the expense of the African and Middle Eastern economy?

LE MATIN: You are proposing a different Europe with this strengthening of Mediterranean Europe....

Pisani: The matter is quite clear: Aren't the obligation to review our policy on southern France and Italy, the obligation to solve the problem of Spain and Portugal, for political reasons, and the obligation to take account of our pledges to the rest of the Mediterranean clear invitations to tackle the problem of the Mediterranean as one of the major aspects of our future? My answer is yes. And behind this consolidated economic Europe, a Europe aware of its geopolitical responsibilities must take shape. In 100 years will historians not be surprised that this sea, which is surrounded by peaceful countries, linked to each other by preferential agreements, should be occupied by the fleets of two powers, neither of which are Mediterranean powers?

SCHMIDT ASSESSES SIGNIFICANCE OF BREZHNEV VISIT

DW011003 Cologne ARD Television Network in German 1915 GMT 26 Nov 81

[Excerpts] [Muehlfenzl] The Soviet party and government chief left Bonn 24 hours ago. This is reason enough for us to discuss the subject in a television discussion. We welcome the federal chancellor, who will go to London for the EC summit immediately after this program. Thank you very much for having come.

Mr Federal Chancellor, naturally the question suggests itself about concrete results although we should not forget the unquestionable change and perhaps improvement of the climate. If I remember it correctly, Minister-President Rau brought the impression with him from Moscow that Brezhnev had a surprise for his visit. What surprise is it?

[Schmidt] I believe you underrate the long-term steadiness of Soviet policy and the long-term steadiness of the persons at the top. Brezhnev has been at the top for 18 years, Gromyko has been the Soviet foreign minister for a quarter of a century. You underrate the steadiness of the actors and of Soviet policy if you think that the Soviet leadership during a visit to Bonn could substantially change its positions off the cuff, as it were. That's not in its line at all.

The opposite is rather correct. They tend to adhere to the lines they embarked upon once and it is not, lastly, for this reason that they are so taken aback by America because of the rapid change of actors there and also the relatively rapid change -- judged by Soviet standards -- of political views and strategies there bewilders them.

You have to imagine that Brezhnev perhaps was a very conscious witness of the Kennedy era. At any rate, Johnson was his antagonist over many years, then Nixon, then Ford, then Carter and now Reagan. On the Soviet side it is still Brezhnev. I cannot even list the number of secretaries of state of these 25 years in which Gromyko has been foreign minister. On the other side it is still Gromyko, these are not people who move quickly. They move tentatively. They wanted to find out a number of things during their visit. I think they have found out quite a lot.

[Kremp] Mr Federal Chancellor, as far as we can trust the news we get as journalists, the general secretary announced measures in the case that U.S. weapons are deployed on FRG territory countering his medium-range systems. Were you under the impression that your clear argumentation has convinced your guest that no one can scare us?

[Schmidt] This is one of the points where our Soviet guests have found out something. It means this point surprised them least of all. Perhaps they admitted a 5 percent probability that we would blink our eyes. But they knew 95 percent that we would not do that and Mr Gromyko was 100 percent sure that we would not do it. But it certainly was good for the broad Soviet leadership -- the Politburo has more members than our cabinet and the Central Committee is a very large body and many other persons are important in Moscow and Warsaw and East Berlin and in Prague and Budapest and Bucharest and Sofia -- perhaps it was good that this impression about the firmness of the German position was reaffirmed publicly, as it were. They found us very honest. If we had made half or vague indications, something we did not intend to do, by God, then the Russians would have been bewildered. Then they wouldn't know what to make of us.

They had the feeling that their questions were answered very honestly, frankly and truthfully.

You saw how cordially Mr Brezhnev said goodbye to me with this very long handshake. This expressed the feeling that honest men talked with each other, but not the feeling that these honest men agreed. There was another thing they have perhaps found out -- I must correct myself -- another thing they understand much better today. Whether they understand it fully, I don't know. It is the American negotiation position, the American desire for negotiations.

We had said earlier that we would consider ourselves as interpreter of the West's positions. Indeed, we largely acted as interpreters. We were able to answer many questions we were asked personally and also privately. What is meant by this? Does President Reagan really want to negotiate seriously? Does he really want to have a result?

[Kremp] The negotiations were held among the state officials from both countries. But I was under the impression that Brezhnev came to the FRG because possibly he overrated the so-called peace movement here. Some passages of his dinner speech also made me think of an address to this peace movement. How is this factor to be assessed?

[Schmidt] The peace movement as it is called here which in part must be taken seriously morally and which in its entirety must be taken seriously politically -- as heterogeneous and different as its elements are -- didn't play a role in our talks with our Soviet guests. Our Soviet guests didn't ask questions about it. At one time I had a similar feeling as you just now that our Soviet guests have an idea in the back of the mind and therefore I said in one of our talks that I saw some of the newspapers speculating about the possibility that the Federal German Government would be superseded or overthrown by a new one. I said I wanted to make two things clear to destroy all illusions:

First, every conceivable Federal German Government will represent the same line as I in the dual decision. Second, don't cherish any hopes; this Federal Government will stay in office.

But this was the only time that the subject was broached indirectly.

[Schmidt] The Soviet guests and we talked quite frankly about the whole world being in an economic crisis. And the Soviet side said that we have our great economic difficulties, and consequently it would be absolutely nonsensical -- said Leonid Brezhnev -- for us to feel any glee because the West is facing economic difficulties; he said, after all, we also have great economic difficulties, and to the extent that this is possible we must help each other. I fully endorsed that. I have always been aware that the world economic crisis has long had its impact not only on Poland but also on Romania, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union and the GDR. I also agree with respect to the mutual aid. The gas pipeline deal is an example of where one really helps each other. I don't believe that the figure of 25 percent of the gross national product or of the industry for armament is correct; in my view it is a highly exaggerated figure. But it is correct that the Soviet Union sets aside for defense purposes a much too great percentage of its gross national product.

[Schmidt] Yes, for military purposes on the whole; it is all right with me if you want to put it that way.

I also believe that they are aware that they would like to make some reductions in that respect, if it were possible, but they have a security complex. Under Hitler's leadership the Germans had advanced up to the portals of Moscow. They will not forget that either in this century or in the next, just as I heard and learned in school about Napoleon's crusade across the Beresina River to Moscow far more than 100 years ago. The West Europeans did not forget all this, either. The Russians won't forget it, they have a security complex which I understand. And if I visualize in my mind this man Brezhnev whom I saw for the sixth or seventh time, then I find that this is a man who, exactly like 60 million Germans -- and I don't know how many million Russians and Ukrainians and other peoples of the Soviet Union as well -- is afraid of war and would like to avoid it. This surely is true, and this is why they wish to achieve results in Geneva as well -- and thereby I am getting back to your question. I am convinced that both the Russians and the Americans wish to attain results in the medium-range negotiations in Geneva. This is not yet any guarantee that a result will be attained since each of them has [word indistinct] his own [word indistinct] in less than 2 years.

[Wild] As regards intense negotiations and the involvement of certain matters, there seems to be a certain inclination on the American side to link the armament problem with Russian conduct in other parts of the world such as Ethiopia and Angola, states you have named before, Mr Federal Chancellor. How does one as the German Government chief interpret to the Soviet party chief that the American side might possibly see such a linkage between both problems?

[Schmidt] I think you are somewhat lagging behind the times. If you take a look at Reagan's speech -- given 10 days ago -- this linkage between other world political problems and our world political -- medium-range missile -- problems actually cannot be inferred. We have very much objected to it and we will insist on our standpoint. But I do not think we must be very insistent because it cannot be seen any more. It is understandable, however, that a world power such as the United States must see the whole world and not just a section of it, the Soviet Union does the same.

[Lueg] The assessments made at this table and the visit itself cannot be separated from domestic political reflections since we are here in Bonn. It was certainly not per chance that you went to see your faction on Tuesday, the final day of the Brezhnev visit, using a term there which startled me somewhat, namely phases, with the help of which this visit was to be promoted and thus also the arrangement in disarmament matters. Was this visit not also an important phase for Deputy SPD Chairman Helmut Schmidt, some sort of a relief as regards the discussion, the controversial discussion in his own party?

[Schmidt] As an overall result the visit will certainly serve to once more clearly outline the credibility and probable success of the policy we support with regard to the Soviet Union. But the visit and the invitation of Mr Brezhnev have not taken place for domestic political reasons, for God's sake.

[Schmidt] I will get to that immediately, I just want to say something about the word phases. I used the word phases in another sense, in the sense of negotiation phases. I said to my faction that I consider it possible that in a first phase in Geneva the missile problem will be solved, and that in a second phase which must be outlined and aimed for in the first phase, other medium-range arms, such as planes or guided missiles, for example, will be handled.

Well, a faux pas can always happen in politics, not only in the Social Democratic Party. If you were hinting at Munich, as you have, I must say that this is a capital where all kinds of faux pas happen regularly. Well, that happens always. I consider the matter with massive nuclear retaliation a faux pas, a wrong conclusion. As early as in the late fifties I wrote a book, trying to prove that this is nonsense, that one cannot defend oneself against minor violations or attacks here or there with a holocaust.

Adenauer had objected to it in the fifties when the so-called Redford plan was debated in America when the Americans suudenly had the idea to withdraw all troops from Europe because it was considered sufficient to have the atomic bomb. That is nonsense. A faux pas happens now and then. Otherwise some other things of Mr Gaus' speech may have been worth pondering, if I understood it correctly. Let us not take the faux pas too seriously.

Answering the core of your question, I have no doubt at all that the whole social-liberal coalition, the whole SPD and FDP approve and deem correct what Mr Genscher and I have done in the past days, months and years with regard to the Soviet Union. You may have seen how close the link was between the foreign minister and the chancellor on the occasion of the Soviet visit because we stood on the same positions which had been outlined again on that occasion.

[Lueg] I don't know whether it is correct that economic problems have been handled at the periphery of this visit, aside from the enormous natural gas deal which has been signed before the visit. Have you made concrete and direct new agreements with the general secretary with regard to cooperation, economic cooperation? Have new credit requests of the Soviets been put on the table here in Bonn, because the misery of the Soviet domestic situation is obvious? Have credit requests and economic cooperation problems been discussed?

First, it is to the economic advantage of both sides. Second, it is being extended through political contacts, through mutual dependence. Both want to continue the policy of detente. This is the most significant result, although not clearly visible, of Mr Brezhnev's Bonn visit, namely that one says: We are of different opinions with regard to the missile problem. We say: We are afraid of your missiles, there are more and more of them. And they say: We will be afraid when you will deploy some in the West in 2 years. Well, we are of a different opinion. But we want to continue the policies of detente, understanding and cooperation. That was most honestly said by their side as well as by our side.

[Muehlfenzl] Will you say what you just have said also to your European Community partners in London?

[Schmidt] Yes, naturally. Tonight there will be a talk among the 10 European government chiefs. The NATO council has been informed today. The U.S. Government will be informed by State Secretary Von Staden. The European government chiefs will certainly deal with this issue tonight with great interest.

[Muehlfenzl] Do you think a summit meeting between Reagan and Brezhnev will take place in the foreseeable future?

[Schmidt] First, I consider it urgently desirable and, second, I consider it possible and likely to take place in late 1982. Both of them must feel and realize that the other is not a warmonger either.

CHANCELLOR OPPOSES PROPOSED DEFENSE CUTS

[Text] Bonn, 1 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has called for prudence in considering cuts in the 1982 defense budget. He told the SPD Bundestag group today -- according to group spokesman Knut Terjung -- that the "defense budget is not a financial surplus to be shed at will." Both Washington and Moscow must remain convinced that the Federal Republic will make its defense contribution.

The Bundestag Budget Committee had cut almost DM400 million from the original defense estimate for 1982 of DM43.83 billion. The executive of the SPD Bundestag group has called for a sensible compromise between the necessary tasks of the Bundeswehr and the need to save money.

Schmidt opposed the cut, proposed by elements in the SPD, of DM15 million earmarked for groundwork in connection with the siting of NATO medium-range weapons outside [as received] the Federal Republic within the NATO infrastructure program. No doubt should arise, he said, that the Federal Republic is sticking to the agreed NATO line.

SCHMIDT: HONECKER MEETING IMPORTANT FOR PEACE

[Text] Bonn, 1 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt sounded a warning against exaggerated expectations in connection with his proposed meeting with SED General Secretary Erich Honecker. He told the SPD Bundestag group in Bonn today -- according to group spokesman Knut Terjung -- that he regards his meeting with Honecker, just like Leonid Brezhnev's visit to Bonn, as a "matter of importance to the cause peace."

Schmidt did not give a date for his visit to the GDR. If an agreed date was made public, he said, the Federal Government would be swamped with expectations by the CDU/CSU opposition. The unconfirmed dates of 14 and 15 December were mentioned in Bonn yesterday for the Schmidt-Honecker meeting.

Peter Lorenz, the CDU/CSU group spokesman on German affairs, said today that his party had no objection to the meeting. But it expects thorough preparations and tangible results for the people directly affected by the division of Germany.

To Meet 11-13 Dec

[Text] Bonn, 2 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is to go to the GDR for his long-planned meeting with GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker from 11 to 13 December. This was announced today by the Bonn Government Spokesman Kurt Becker. The meeting is to take place at Lake Werbellin, north of Berlin. This was to have been the venue of the planned August 1980 visit between the chancellor and the SED leader which was cancelled due to developments in Poland.

The chancellor, who has been invited by Honecker, will be accompanied by Egon Franke, federal minister for inner-German relations, Otto Lambsdorff, federal economics minister, and Guenter Huonker, minister of state in the federal chancellor's office responsible Germany policy according to Becker. As in the case of the GDR visit planned for August 1980, the chancellor's program will include a visit to the Mecklenburg town of Guestrow. In 1980 the chancellor had also planned a trip to Rostock.

FDP OFFICIAL FAVORS SCHMIDT-HONECKER MEETING

[Excerpt] Osnabrueck, 1 Dec (DPA) -- Uwe Ronneburger (FDP), the chairman of the Bundestag Intra-German Affairs Committee, favors a summit meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SED leader Erich Honecker this year. In an interview for NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG (Wednesday edition) he said that some signs indicated that the GDR was ready to talk. This readiness should be used. He thought that President and party chief Leonid Brezhenv's express approval of the meeting meant that the GDR had a certain scope for decisions.

Ronneburger said that measures to ease the lot of people, broader contacts between the citizens of both states and closer economic cooperation possibly could be important results of the meeting.

The SPD group has welcomed the chancellor's trip to the GDR but warned against burdening it by setting preconditions or by a public debate on differences and demands. Hans Buechler, the spokesman on policy on Germany, said on Wednesday that the value of the meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SED chief Erich Honecker should not be assessed a priori by individual results but on the basis of whether it would be possible to raise the quality of relations between the two German states. He added in this context that securing peace, lessening tension and contributing to a discussion on disarmamert could become a great and firm binding force between the two German states. There was an existing identity of interests in this respect.

Mischnick Comments

[Summary] Bonn, 2 Dec (DPA) -- Wolfgang Mischnick, chairman of the FDP Bundestag group, said on Wednesday that he welcomed the Helmut Schmidt-Erich Honecker meeting without reservations and was glad that it would still take place this year. The time was more than ripe for taking stock. According to Mischnick it would be wrong to place too many expectations in the talks. The talks could not center on accords or settlements but they should serve to clarify fundamental issues and prospects. The summit would be all the more useful the less it is seen as an exceptional event. It should be the prelude to a regular exercise.

SCHMIDT, GENSCHER HOLD TALKS WITH SEKOU TOURE

[Excerpt] Bonn, 1 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today received President Sekou Toure of the west African People's Revolutionary Republic of Guinea. Sekou Toure, who has been staying in Bonn since Monday on a state visit accompanied by five ministers, had a talk with FDP Chairman and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher this morning over breakfast in the guest residence Gymnich Castle. According to the Foreign Ministry in Bonn, the two sides discussed developments in Africa, German-Guinean cooperation and the significance of the nonaligned movement.

Sekou Toure also received CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl and foreign affairs spokesman of the union parliamentary group Alois Mertes, for an exchange of ideas. Mertes said after the meeting that Kohl had said, in view of the stronger cooperation between Bonn and Conakry which the union supports, the realization of human rights in Guinea is an important element in future relations between the two countries. He had urged Sekou Toure to allow the German section of Amnesty International to have unhindered talks with the inhabitants and political prisoners in Guinea. Sekou Toure agreed to permit Amnesty representatives to enter the country and to gather information on a broad basis, including in the camps.

Invites Schmidt to Guinea

Schmidt told his guest that in the meeting with Soviet head of state and party Leonid Brezhnev he had said "very clearly" that in Afghanistan the right to self-determination and to true nonaligned status is being violated. He welcomed the fact that Guinea, like the FRG, supports the United Nations General Assembly resolution which demands the immediate withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

Sekou Toure and Minister Offergeld expressed in their talk their satisfaction with cooperation in the development policy of both countries. It has been resumed, after an interval of 8 years when Guinea broke off diplomatic relations, in 1979. Since then the FRG has promised Guinea, which is among the 31 poorest countries of the world, aid worth DM86 million.

GDR CITIZEN ARRESTED FOR ESPIONAGE ACTIVITIES

[Text] Berlin, 2 Dec (DPA) -- A 41-year old GDR citizen was detained by police yesterday near Berlin's Grunewald railway station on suspicion of intelligence activity. A police spokesman said today the man is to appear before an investigating magistrate today. The spokesman declined to comment on a newspaper report that five Soviet citizens were also involved in the incident and said this is a matter for which the allies are responsible. The U.S. Military Mission announced it would make a statement on the incident.

Soviet Officials Detained

[Summary] Berlin, 2 Dec (DPA) -- According to the U.S. Military Mission in Berlin, four Soviet officials, one Soviet diplomat, three allied military persons and one 41-year old GDR citizen were detained yesterday on suspicion of intelligence activities. The nationality of the three allied citizens has not been disclosed. A U.S. spokesman said today that in accordance with the special status of the four powers in Berlin, the four Russians have been handed over to the Soviet representative from East Berlin. The spokesman disclosed no information about the location or identity of the diplomat. It was further announced that a U.S. official has protested this behavior of the Soviets.

PAPER VIEWS OUTCOME OF LONDON EC MEETING

[Erich Hauser dispatch: "The Failure Was a Partial Success"]

[Text] Brussels -- Disappointment prevails in the West European public. The London summit meeting of the EC heads of government appears to be a failure. The crucial problems of the community -- the reform of agricultural policy and a more just distribution of the financial burdens -- were not solved. Consequently nothing can happen for the time being with respect to combatting unemployment and strongly promoting the poorest regions of West Europe on which one was actually agreed. Even the accounting unit ECU cannot be spent twice. As long as the better part of the EC funds is dropped into the bottomless pit of agricultural policy it is impossible to pay from the EC budget for catching up technologically with Japan and the United States.

Yet only those deeming miracles possible in politics can be really disappointed by the London summit. It is amazing progress indeed that people like Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, President Francois Mitterrand, and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher by necessity went into the details of the income improvements.

Social Democrat Schmidt and Conservative Thatcher probably learned in this process how even a Socialist president in France must satisfy the constituency of backward wine growers and farmers. Conversely, Mitterrand and other heads of government probably realized that they will have to choose between industrial progress and agricultural-political inventory preservation by the next EC summit, at least as far as the EC funds are concerned.

For, the 10 foreign ministers will hardly be capable of framing the comprehensive compromise for the European Community "of the second generation" not attained in London -- a term coined by EC Commission President Gaston Thorn -- before Christmas or in January. Consequently decisions probably will not be made before the next EC summit in the spring. The heads of government were bound to be aware that owing to the mechanics of agricultural policy the next agricultural price hikes will have been decided before that and that thus a year will be lost for the reform of agricultural policy. Thorn had expressly drawn attention to that particular point. He and his commission by their partially concrete and partially rather vague proposals at least provided the basic direction for the preparation of the London summit by the committee of the EC ambassadors and the Council of Foreign Ministers. Besides, to this day no summit meeting had been more thoroughly prepared for than that of London.

If the meeting nevertheless did not turn out to be a success the question arises: What good are the three summit meetings each year of the EC heads of government supposed to do which had been decided in 1974? The senior head of government, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, feels that the regular exchange of opinions thrice a year alone is of inestimable value. The public really should kick the habit of expecting great decisions from such meetings. But on the other hand it was the Federal Government which, by the so-called Genscher initiative for headway in direction of a union of the EC states, proposed that the "European Council" of the 10 heads of government ought to be the "political decision-making center" of the community.

Ever since we have had three summit meetings a year the EC Councils of Ministers of all sectors have developed the habit of passing the fundamental bones of contention on to the "European Council". The council of the heads of government then turns them right back to the Councils of Ministers as an instruction -- just as it was done in London again. If the chiefs really are to become the fire department for fundamental decisions in the future, EC summit meetings such as that of London would have to be scheduled for 4 instead of 2 days. But this would tend to even enhance the public horizon of expectation, and lack of agreement would entail all the greater psychological consequences.

The London meeting was not really a failure if the 10 chiefs now enforce their political will to compromise for the future conferences on ministerial level. It is a basic rule for the growth of the European Community that "all must be equally dissatisfied" with any progress made, but nobody must be the loser. This is why German-British dreams of an agricultural policy nearly devoid of any costs -- which, by the way, does not exist in any modern industrial state -- are just as unrealistic as are the hopes of other partners that they might soon live better as a result of German payments into the EC coffers. Nowhere does the proverb of politics being the drilling through of thick boards prove as true as it does in the efforts for West Europe's union. Let us be patient.

PRESS COMMENTS ON GENEVA DISARMAMENT TALKS

Support Soviet Moratorium

DW011503 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 1 Dec 81 p 3

[Text] Negotiations have begun now between the two world powers on medium-range arms in Europe. The negotiators have about 2 years time. It is up to the United States and the Soviet Union to achieve an agreement because their arms are being negotiated; but the Europeans also have a word to say. Already geographically this is a most European affair.

It would therefore serve particularly European inteests if the Western side once again gave some more thorough thought than before to the Soviet offer of a missile moratorium, as suggested by Brezhnev in Bonn. The Soviet hitch to it -- validity for the length of negotiations -- could be possibly removed.

Both parties realize in the meantime that the fall of 1983 is the magic date. A decision will be made by then, this way or that way. A temporary limitation of the moratorium up to the fall of 1983 cannot be a risk. On the contrary, it would tie down the Soviet Union. In the other case the West would be probably facing not only 250 SS-20 missiles in 2 years but 100 more.

Brandt Undermines Strategy

[Herbert Kremp commentary: "Full Speed Astern"]

In Schmidt's stated opinion, the Soviets must be credibly convinced that a countdown is running in Geneva toward the inevitable deployment in 1983 of American counterblancing weapons if no result has been achieved in the negotiations by then. No sooner had this decision been announced everywhere, Brandt -- and surprisingly also Wehner -- said that this must be taken too seriously. If no agreement were reached in Geneva, NATO could renounce the deployment of modern weapons systems in Europe in contrast to what the dual decision states.

This cannot be stated more clearly to the perceptive Soviet side. This comment suggests to the Eastern world power that it should delay negotiations. Pressure on Moscow is decreased because the position of the American and German delegations is considered to be relative. Behind this stands dissension in the largest government party which cannot be eliminated any more; behind this stands discontent with a chancellor who opts for the West. Behind it is a different concept. This is also expressed by the new defense budget cuts for the coming years which are being pushed by the budget committee. This weakens the German position. The chancellor does not want to yield to these tactics, and will have to say so publicly now.

'Two Hurdles'

[Editorial by Washington correspondent Klaus Arnsperger: "The Disarmament Attempt"]

[Text] It was not easy for the American Government to decide to sit down with the Russians at one table in Geneva. President Reagan had to make considerable cuts with regard to his original claim to reestablish the military superiority of the United States by hook or by crook. Negotiations on the nuclear arsenals of both sides have not been envisaged in such a comparatively short time, just 9 months after Reagan's moving into the White House. It had cost the NATO allies great efforts in October to make the so-called zero solution, the renunciation of both sides with regard to nuclear arms in Europe, acceptable to the Americans. Political rather than military reasons have brought the Reagan administration eventually to the negotiation table. The realization has prevailed more and more in Washington in past weeks that the future cohesion of NATO is at stake.

The American delegation goes to the negotiations with the firm conviction that one can wrestle military concessions from the Russians only if the publics of other NATO countries will not call the political sincerity of the Washington government into question.

So the United States must take two hurdles at once in Geneva: To achieve a considerable reduction of the nuclear potentials of both sides on European territory, and to blame the other side in case of a possible failure of negotiations as convincingly as possible. America will be able to take the second hurdle only if it will seriously debate in Geneva the zero solution so urgently demanded by its European friends. If the Americans failed to demonstrate their determination in these negotiations, political backing of nuclear counterarmament in late 1983 would be seriously jeopardized.

Nobody fosters the illusion in Washington that it would be possible to implement the zero solution in the form demanded by Reagan. It is a starting position for the negotiations and nothing more. But the suggestion stands in full harmony with the basic attitude always represented by Reagan with regard to the disarmament problem: The current Washington government wants to achieve considerable reductions of the nuclear arsenal on both sides, which can be clearly examined, and not mere limitations. The dilemma of the Americans in Geneva consists in the fact that they can negotiate only on medium-range missiles which exist just on paper, while the Soviet Union has about 600 halfway comparable deployed missiles. On the other hand, however, agreement does not even exist on the term "medium-range missile," and the Russians demand the inclusion of all American nuclear arms existing in the European area on ships or planes.

In view of this basic position in Geneva, long negotiations must be expected on what should be negotiated at all. The Americans, however, want to achieve tangible results as quickly as possible, although they do not completely reject negotiations on their forward based system to take place at a later level. This should curtail the opportunity of the Russians to strengthen with the help of long procedure debates, the pressure exerted by European public opinion on NATO's nuclear counterarmament. The Americans also believe that the envisaged 108 new Pershing II missiles with their high accuracy and strongly reduced warning time really worry the Moscow government, and that therefore there is a chance that negotiations will produce concrete results. The welcome echo Reagan's disarmament speech has found as well as the weakening congressional support for the military budget make the Americans hurry.

For the first time since 1977 the Russians and the Americans will make an attempt with the Geneva negotiations to contain armament. The significance of these negotiations goes far beyond the purely military sphere. Reagan's government considers them an opportunity to test Russian preparedness to negotiate also on other fields of East-West relations. The fact that the earlier shrill tones have died down and that moderate language is being used again with regard to Moscow, is an indication in this respect. If one succeeded in preserving the new climate in Geneva and achieving some modest progress, encouraging prerequisites would have been created for the talks between Secretary of State Haig and Foreign Minister Gromyko on the limitation of nuclear intercontinental arms slated for January. There is talk about a meeting between Brezhnev and Reagan to take place next year. Maybe the Geneva negotiations will mark the beginning of new relations between Russia and America.

CHEYSSON DEFENDS FOREIGN POLICY BEFORE ASSEMBLY

Mr Cheysson said that he found it "difficult" to answer the opposition which, he thought, seemed to be saying both "you have changed nothing" and "how dangerous your innovations are!" However he gave an energetic reply to the attacks made by those --in particular Mr Francois Leotard [UDF, AR] -- who criticized him for his policy's "ambiguities" and "lack of firmness." Mr Cheysson took this opportunity to recall, with regard to the policy followed in the previous 7-year term, "the silence which France maintained too long on the Euromissiles question," on the North-South conference -- "a fine idea which was given no substance" -- and relations "with Israel, which were virtually suspended for 7 years."

The external relations minister mentioned several other subjects:

China: "Our relations remain cordial" despite the incident which took place during Michel Jobert's recent visit; Southeast Asia: In October 1,496 refugees were accepted by France, whereas the rate of entry had fallen to 500 per month by the time the left came to power. "The rate of 1,500 per month will be maintained." Lebanon: "A large section of the international community is behaving as if Lebanon were no more than an object. That will never be France's position."

During the debate which preceded these statements, the moderation of the statements made by former cooperation minister Robert Galley (RPR, Aube), on the funds alloted to his succesor Jean-Pierre Cot was noted in particular. For his part Bernard Stasi (UDF, Marne) assured the government of support, without ulterior motives, for its Third World policy and its firm attitude to the "neutralist wave."

CHEYSSON DISCUSSES NONALIGNED MOVEMENT

AU300830 Belgrade POLITIKA in Serbo-Croatian 20 Nov 81 pp 1-2

[Excerpts] [Question] What significance and content is attached by the new government to the nonaligned policy and the nonaligned movement?

[Answer] Nonalignment is one of the strongest and most original ideas appearing in the world in the course of recent decades. Nonalignment confirms the aspirations and wishes of dozens of countries devoted to it to live in freedom and independence, to reject subjection and foreign pressure and not to be dragged into contests between the blocs.

France, and especially the government of the left which assumed power after 10 May, considers and respects these aspirations and encourages them as much as it can. It considers and respects them because it understands them and frequently identifies with them. It has shown proof of this and will do so again. France encourages these aspirations and strivings by increasing its contacts with nonaligned countries and following with interest the efforts which the movement makes to retain its internal unity without losing its identity and its proper "soul" and inspiration.

[Answer] Traditionally, with that country France maintains cooperation developed in many fields, which rests, as the president recently pointed out, on an "old and strong friendship."

However, the present deterioration of the international climate, in which the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan in our opinion played a decisive role, has harmed our political relations with the USSR. France wishes its relations with the USSR to again find their true dimensions and expresses the wish to develop and advance an active dialogue with the USSR.

[Answer] The 200th anniversary of the famous battle of Yorktown, which was decisive for U.S. independence, illustrated once again in a brilliant way the depth of friendship which links the French and American peoples and their adherence to the ideas of freedom. Nevertheless, nuances and even serious differences exist between us. We do not view the problems of the developing countries in the same way; in France's eyes, they are very essential. We believe it is most often dangerous and does not meet real needs to drag the East-West conflicts into spheres where the existing problems chiefly arise from internal socio-economic injustice. Some traits of the U.S. economic and monetary policy disturb us, and they may be detrimental to our desire for a quicker and more comprehensive development. This is certain. However, all this is permeated with our deep agreement on the significance and the proportion of our belonging to the framework of NATO and with our desire to avoid, through negotiations, the disequilibrium between the military forces of the United States and the Soviet Union, and especially between their nuclear forces.

[Question] Mr Minister, do you believe that the tripartite Camp David agreement (of Egypt, Israel and the United States), should now be replaced by other initiatives which offer much wider political frameworks? Don't you think that Saudi Prince Fahd's initiative is of that kind?

[Answer] Since 1967, France has always declared itself in favor of an overall solution of the Middle East conflict, which is political in nature and therefore demands a political solution. In this respect the proposals put forward by Prince Fahd last August are of exceptional importance, which is indicated by the generally positive reactions it received. We believe that these proposals constitute a good foundation for future talks and we are waiting to see how they will be received by the Arab countries during their forthcoming summit in Fes (Morocco). In the meantime we do not wish to make any more explicit statements, but we reserve the right to do so at a suitable time.

[Question] The French Government, we may say, Mr Minister, pays special attention to its traditionally friendly relations with Poland. You were in Warsaw recently. What is the state of relations between France and Poland at the moment?

[Answer] Of course it is not up to me to take a position on how to solve the Polish crisis. We believe that this is the exclusive affair of the Polish people. What I can say is that the French public follows the Polish efforts at stabilization with special sympathies, as befits the old friendship that links us with a patriotic and brave people. I wish to express my confidence in the success of these efforts. The French Government makes its contribution to such a success by offering financial and economic aid, which is among the most significant. The French Government will continue these efforts. I assured the Poles about this during my recent visit to Warsaw.

MINISTER REVIEWS FRENCH-SOVIET RELATIONS

[Text] Paris, 1 Dec (AFP) -- France wants "the closest and warmest" relations with the Soviet Union, but these are affected by the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson said in an interview in today's LE MONDE.

"Our political relations," he told the newspaper, "are not as intimate and regular as in normal circumstances, because French public opinion is deeply concerned by the Soviet presence in Afghanistan." Yet the two countries, he said, are about to sign their biggest-ever contract, involving 8,000 million cubic metres of Soviet gas and high-quality French machinery. In his view, and he had told this to Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko, the reaction of the French over Afghanistan stems from their own memories of occupation. "As long as this situation continues," Mr Cheysson added, "we cannot have regular cycles of meetings with the Soviet leaders."

France's biggest disagreement with the Soviet Union, however, concerned Soviet "over-armament" in Europe, he said. Mr Cheysson continued: "I am not talking only of Euro-missiles. For about 10 years the Soviet Union has been making a colossal arms effort, devoting to it an estimated 15 percent of its gross national product, whereas the NATO countries have fixed 3 percent as their objective.

"A considerable part of this (Soviet) armament threatens only Europe. That is what singularly aggravates the danger: the separation, in people's minds, of the defence of Europe from that of the Atlantic totality.

"This 'uncoupling' can create psychological demobilisation on the other side of the Atlantic. The risk was particularly grave when, some 18 months ago, the White House gave the impression of lack of firmness. Where would we be if, as some wrongly believed after Mr (Ronald)Reagan's most recent declaration, a limited nuclear war in Europe were conceivable? Let us be frank: We would be in a position of typical weakness. It is clear that the number one objective of Soviet strategists for the past 10 years has been the separation of the defence of Europe from that of the Atlantic totality."

At the same time, Mr Cheysson said, "a complementary movement is taking shape: the psychological rejection of nuclearism."

"The greatest danger for us," he added, "would result from the combination of this 'uncoupling' and this rejection, which would leave Europe vis-a-vis the Soviet Union in the rough proportion of one to five in classic forces. That is something that deserves more thorough talks between allies and much more frequent contacts with the Russians."

JOSPIN TRIES TO CLEAR UP MISUNDERSTANDINGS

[Text] Bonn -- PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin went to the West German capital Monday 23 November for talks with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt and various other Social Democratic leaders, including Hans-Jurgen Wischnewski and Egon Bahr.

This "friendly and informal" meeting, As Mr Jospin described it, was, in any case, to be greatly overshadowed by the visit which [Soviet president] Leonid Brezhnev is now making to Bonn. It nonetheless provided an opportunity for a useful exchange of information and impressions. Although Paris appreciates FRG Chancellor Schmidt's firm line in face of pressures which are hostile to the Atlantic alliance, it does not always understand why and how these pressures can come from the ranks of his own party. The French Socialists recall that their own country, endowed with its own nuclear weapons "which ensure its security," as Mr Jospin stated, is not directly involved in the Euromissiles debate: but they think that the American proposals contain "many positive aspects" for speeding up preliminary negotiations. Although, to cite a fine example of understatement by the PS first secretary, "The Soviet Government has a sense of slowness," it is nonetheless "at a not too distant date" that the French Socialists would like to start their own debate with the CPSU, as Mr Jospin also stated to his West German hosts.

The latter did not conceal from their visitor that France's new domestic policy was not always very clearly understood on this side of the Rhine. The French Socialist government is often criticizes here, particularly in the media, for sacrificing to the "system of spoils" [systeme des depouilles] -- a practice which is certainly not an innovation made by [premier] Mauroy's government but which reflects a state of mind particularly foreign to the FRG. Similarly the nationalizations are clearly not understood by the West Germans. Moreover the presence of Communist ministers is embarrassing many Social Democrats when pressed to comment on the new course of French policy and is sparking passionate diatribes from the Christian Democratic opposition.

Mr Jospin seems determined to try to end these misunderstandings. He left Bonn with at least one certainty: He will shortly have to meet the West German press, particularly its Paris correspondents.

MARCHAIS INTERVIEWED ON FAHD MIDEAST PLAN

NC011110 Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 23-29 Nov 81 pp 32-36

[Interview by Claude Khoury with PCF leader Georges Marchais; conducted in French with replies to questions given in writing -- date and place not given]

[Text] The leader of the French Communist Party, Georges Marchais, last week announced his support of Saudi Crown Prince Fahd's eight-point peace plan and called on the French Government to "put it to work" by seeking a Security Council resolution incorporating its main points. "I would say that this plan constitutes a good basis for negotiation," Marchais stated in a private interview with MONDAY MORNING. "We think the French Government can play a positive role in putting it to work. A first stage could be the adoption of a resolution at the Security Council, on the initiative of France, which would incorporate the broad lines of the plan."

The French Communist Party supported the Fahd plan, he said, because it endorsed all the principles the party believed in -- total Israeli withdrawal from Arab territories occupied in 1967, the establishment of a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital, and the right of all Mideastern states to live in peace -- and because Saudi Arabia, in subsequent statements, declared that no peace settlement could be achieved without the participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Soviet Union.

Marchais added that the French Communist Party was announcing its support of the Saudi peace proposals after noting "the appreciation of these proposals by my friend (PLO chairman) Yasir 'Arafat and their total rejection by the Israeli leadership." He warned, however, that "certain forces" were already trying to "disorient" the Saudi proposals in an attempt to establish a "new separate peace" and called on "the progressive forces" to fight such attempts. The French Communist leader said that his party's invitation to 'Arafat to visit Paris, extended last year, was "permanent" and had recently been confirmed to representatives of the PLO.

Addressing himself to the French Government, in which the French Communist Party is represented, Marchais said: "We request the official recognition of the PLO and the upgrading of its representation in Paris. All the parties to the conflict would thus enjoy in France a status corresponding to the acknowledged reality of their respective rights. This can only serve the credibility of an initiative by our country and the efficacy of its action."

Reiterating the French Communist Party's commitment to "the idea of a free, united and independent Lebanese state on the basis of the converging national reconciliation programs of the head of state and the national movement," Marchais renewed his call to the French Government to "play a more active role toward such an objective and an independent Palestinian state."

France, he said, could contribute to "genuine national entente" in Lebanon, although its contribution could not go beyond the wishes of Lebanon itself, and it "should play a more active role at the United Nations for the full implementation of resolution 425, which calls for the total evacuation of Lebanese territory still under Israeli control and the deployment of UN forces all along the borders."

Marchais answered MONDAY MORNING's questions in writing. The following is a translation of the full interview, which was conducted in French:

[Question] How do you assess the situation in the Middle East three years after the Camp David agreements?

[Answer] The situation in the region, as everybody can tell, is still extremely dangerous. The risks of explosion are being multiplied; we could gauge them during the Israeli-Palestinian war of last July. This situation is mainly the outcome of the aggressive policy of American imperialism. In the wake of the Iranian revolution, the United States undertook a military redeployment in the regions of the Mediterranean, the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. They are installing military bases in several countries and are in the process of setting up a rapid deployment force. They are encouraging Israeli extremists who are multiplying their murderous raids against Palestinians and Lebanon and their provocations against Syria. They have recently concluded a strategic alliance with Israel which increases the risks of conflict even further.

We have witnessed lately the formidable American military deployment in the course of the Bright Star maneuvers, the renewed Israeli threats against south Lebanon and the aerial provocations against Saudi Arabia.

In this context, it is urgent that all the forces of peace be mobilized in favor of an overall settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. This, to my mind, would be a great contribution to the struggle for international detente and against the dangers of war.

The principles liable to secure peace in this region of the world have been repeatedly spelled out by the United Nations. They are the ones which the French Communist Party has been developing and defending for several years. I will state them briefly: The evacuation by Israel of all the Arab territories occupied since 1967, including the Arab sector of Jerusalem; the recognition of the inalienable national rights of the Palestinian people, including the right to set up their own independent state; and the right of all states, including Israel and the projected Palestinian state, to live in peace and security. Obviously, any negotiation process should include the Palestine Liberation Organization, which is the sole authentic representative of the Palestinian people.

[Answer] The plan cannot be taken out of the regional context that I have just outlined or viewed independently of the fact that the Camp David accords have not yielded the beginning of a solution to the Palestinian problem. The plan features the broad lines of the UN resolutions on peace in the Middle East and the Palestinian question. It provides for the evacuation by Israel of all the territories occupied since 1967 and the establishment of a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital. It provides for an overall settlement and confirms the right of all states in the region to live in peace. We cannot but be in agreement with such proposals.

I have followed very closely the statements by Saudi leaders reiterating that such a settlement cannot be achieved without the PLO, sole representative of the Palestinian people, and that overall peace cannot be established without the participation of the USSR. I have also noted the appreciation of these proposals by my friend, Yasir 'Arafat and their total rejection by the Israeli leadership.

Of course, certain forces are already trying to emasculate the plan's content and to "disorient" its propositions in an attempt to attain a new separate peace. It is the responsibility of the progressive forces -- and they do have the means -- to oppose these maneuvers.

In brief, I would say that this plan constitutes a good basis for negotiation and that it champions the principles which the French Communist Party has always defended. We think the French Government can play a positive role in putting it to work. A first stage could be the adoption of a resolution at the Security Council, on the initiative of France, which could incorporate the broad lines of the plan.

[Question] Can the invitation of the French Communist Party to Yasir 'Arafat be considered as still standing? And what is your position vis-a-vis the PLO?

[Answer] The invitation which I extended to Yasir 'Arafat to visit France is, of course, permanent. I had the opportunity recently to confirm it to representatives of the PLO. Such a visit, in the new situation which prevails in our country, would undoubtedly contribute to the creation of conditions conducive to an independent and realistic initiative by France for a settlement of the conflict.

We take pride, meanwhile, in the close relations maintained by our party with the PLO as the representative organization of the Palestinian people, which has been recognized as such by the majority of the United Nations (member states) since 1974. The PLO must, and I said this earlier, participate in any process conducive to the establishment of a just and stable peace in the region. We intend to do everything possible to contribute at this level as well to the renewal process started in France. In contrast to the fuzzy demagogy of the Giscardian options, we espouse clearer positions on the right of the Palestinians to statehood and a new approach to the degree of representativeness of the PLO. In this logic, which takes realities into account, we request the official recognition of the PLO and the upgrading of its representation in Paris. All the parties to the conflict would thus enjoy in France a status corresponding to the acknowledged reality of their respective rights. This can only serve the credibility of an initiative by our country and the efficiency of its actions.

[Answer] Lebanon has been suffering dramatically, for more than five years now, from the consequences of the absence of a solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. This has resulted in the death, injury, uprooting and displacement of tens of thousands of people. During the odious bombardment of Beirut by the Israeli air force, I thought of all my friends there and all the people I had met who had extended to me such a warm welcome. I was sometimes concerned about their fate and outraged by the situation prevailing in Lebanon as a result of the aggression and the consequences of the action of those who want to impose solutions which do not take into account the national rights of the Palestinian people. Though a non-belligerent in 1967, Lebanon has become one of the parties concerned in any settlement of the conflict.

I said it during my visit to Beirut in April, 1980, on the invitation of my friend George Hawi, and I reiterated it during my meeting with President Sarkis: The French Communist Party is committed to the idea of a free, united and independent Lebanese state on the basis of the converging national reconciliation programs of the head of state and the national movement. We considered at the time that France, in view of its special ties with Lebanon, could and should play a more active role towards such an objective and an independent Palestinian state.

We thus support any initiative tending to bolster state authority. Such authority, to our mind, will rest first and foremost on a genuine national entente to which France could bring an active contribution corresponding to the requests of the Lebanese party. We also think that France should play a more active role at the United Nations for the full implementation of resolution 425, which calls for the total evacuation of Lebanese territory still under Israel control and the deployment of the UN forces all along the (Israel-Lebanese) border.

ROME THIRD WORLD DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE OPENS

[Text] Rome, 1 Dec (ANSA) -- A national cooperation and development conference got off to a start in Rome today with a message from Italian chief-of-state Sandro Pertini naming "development and disarmament" the two inseparable factors on which the future of mankind depend.

The conference was organized by the Institute for Relations Between Italy and the Countries of Africa, Latin America and the Middle East (IPALMO) on behalf of the Foreign Ministry with the aim of checking the real possibilities the country has of living up to the international development aid commitments it has made for the three year period 1981-83. The government has already made a formal pledge to have appropriated a total sum of four billion dollars by 1983.

Most of the speakers today pointed out that it would be a major effort to fulfill the pledges the government made, especially considering that Italian aid to the Third World stood at no more than 190 million dollars in 1979, the equivalent of 0.08 percent of the gross national product.

Pertini's message to the conference stated in part: "Development and disarmament, two closely linked problems, are the authentic, dramatic challenges of our times. The future of mankind depends on their solution".

Italian aid to poor countries climbed from 0.08 percent of its GNP in 1979 to 0.17 percent in 1980. The government has already appropriated a total of four billion dollars for development aid for the three year period between 1981 and 1983, an amount which will bring the nation's percentage, in terms of the GNP, to the European Economic Community's (EEC) average of 0.34 percent. Italy's GNP for 1981 will stand at an estimated 71 million dollars.

PRESS VIEWS START OF GENEVA ARMS TALKS

[Excerpts] Rome, 1 Dec (ANSA) -- Great caution tempered by some hints of optimism characterized first Italian press comment today on yesterday's start of the Soviet-American negotiations on the Euromissiles in Geneva. According to the Italian Communist Party newspaper L'UNITA; the talks began in a "cordial and practical atmosphere," adding that the two chief negotiators, Paul Nitze for the United States and Yuliy Kvitsinskiy for the Soviet Union, had found their first agreement in keeping details of their discussions rigorously secret from the press.

According to the Italian Socialist Party daily AVANTI, the "reserve" which characterized their first encounter points to the "seriousness" with which they intend to confront their task. "From this viewpoint, it is a good beginning," the paper argued. The leftleaning Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA reported that the Soviet delegation described the first meeting as "constructive." It added that, as regards the wall of reserve placed round the talks, "Moscow and Washington are aware that the negotiations must be carried on without giving in to the pressures of propaganda."

The conservative Rome daily IL TEMPO noted that since the era of nuclear-headed missiles started, "this is the second attempt by the superpowers to agree on forms of disarmament or arms limitation." "The ninety minutes that Nitze and Kvitzinskiy spent together have already supplied some weak, but well-omened positive signals," the paper said. The Rome daily IL MESSAGGERO also stressed that the statements of the United States delegate revealed "a certain optimism, even granted the objective difficulties of the negotiations."

YA HAILS REAGAN'S 'STRATEGIC' ARMS CUT OFFER

PM011347 Madrid YA in Spanish 20 Nov 81 p 13

[Miguel Cuartero Larrea commentary]

[Text] President Reagan's proposal has the merit of serving two aims: one of them direct -- offering the Soviet Union a comprehensive disarmament formula -- and the other more political and psychological, aimed at the European allies, to surmount the atmosphere of confusion created recently in the interpretation of U.S. viewpoints concerning nuclear defense in Europe.

Through the reaction of European political leaders, Reagan's statement has had an excellent reception, and it creates a favorable atmosphere and an atmosphere of hope on the eve of the talks which will begin between the great powers at the end of November in order to attempt to reach some agreement.

It seems that it also entered into Soviet plans to put forward some formula during the coming visit Brezhnev is to pay to Bonn, but in this game of alternate threats and proposals it has been overtaken by the timing and scope of Reagan's statements. The initial Soviet reactions attribute to his proposals a mere propaganda motive, when in fact such a nature cannot be attributed to them in a balanced appraisal, since he realistically offers that they be initiated gradually, beginning with the issue of nuclear weapons in Europe and continuing with the resumption of the SALT talks, which will analyze the framework of all the land, sea and air types of so-called strategic weapons.

Of the four points of Reagan's formula, the importance of the first point, which refers specifically to the withdrawal of the Soviet SS-20 launchers and to the renunciation of the deployment of the 572 Euromissiles, has been commented on extensively in the press. But as much or more importance should be attached to the fact that the comprehensiveness of the proposal is not confined to nuclear weapons but also includes conventional weapons, because the Western need to resort to a tactical nuclear response to react to the initiative of an enemy attack stemmed mainly from the marked Soviet superiority in this field.

But there is yet another aspect which deserves attention: The possibility of extending the concept of comprehensiveness to the geographical area of deployment of other fronts. Hitherto the actual implementation formulas being quantitatively and qualitatively assessed at the Vienna MBFR talks applied only to the forces deployed in central Europe and were confined to air, and more especially ground, forces. Observation of deployment in the Nordic and Mediterranean areas was ruled out, and so if limitation were confined to a mere withdrawal to other sectors -- for instance, the Danube sector -- it could mean a worsening of the threat in other theaters.

Among the partial force reduction proposals recently put forward by the two sides, the first Western proposal sought a considerable reduction of Soviet tanks in return for reducing a certain number of tactical nuclear warheads -- the only area in which the West had superiority. This was not accepted by the other camp, since it believed that it was merely a matter of a modernization of forces, not of a reduction. This was the same argument later observed in the West when the Soviets sought to justify the deployment of their SS-20's.

Reagan's nuclear, conventional and even geographic proposal eliminates that line of argument, and can even be extended to the situation in other theaters; something which indicates the genuine comprehensiveness of the proposal and makes it difficult for the Soviets to respond evasively to Reagan's strategic offer.

FINNISH, SOVIET MINISTERS VIEW TRADE PROTOCOL

[Begin recording] During the fall intense work has been done by the trade delegations, as a result of which Finland's imports from the USSR can be increased. We are at present clearly the biggest Western country importing machinery and equipment from the USSR. The USSR's supply has increased and diversified also as regards many raw and finished materials. In addition the USSR has been able to reserve half a million tons more crude oil for delivery to Finland than was recorded in the protocol for the current year. Despite a difficult starting point we have thus achieved a situation where trade will not drop from the level to be implemented this year, but will even increase somewhat. [end recording]

Soviet Foreign Trade Minister Nikolay Patolichev, who signed the trade protocol for the USSR, referred in his speech to the effects of energy prices and their unexpected changes even in trade between Finland and the Soviet Union.

[Begin Patolichev recording in Russian with Finnish translation] The high level we have achieved in trade is based on a growth in the [word indistinct] trade volume and trade deliveries and on growth in the supply of commodities, although there was also a rise in prices. Whether there will be an increase in the price of crude oil I do not know, but I have nothing against it. Why are you smiling, ladies and gentlemen? [end recording]

The exchange of goods now agreed upon exceeds the targets of the basic agreement by about 70 percent. Thus half of the economic cooperation program for 1981-85 will be achieved already in the first 2 years.

VISITING BRAZILIAN FOREIGN MINISTER SIGNS PACTS

P.010227 Brasilia Domestic Service in Portuguese 2200 GMT 30 Nov 81

[Text] Reporter (Mariza Gibson) reports from London that Foreign Minister Ramiro Saraiva Guerreiro, who has been in London since Friday, said today that the board of OPEC governors has approved the financing of a project presented by the Brazilian Government for the exploitation of coal mines in Mozambique. The project demands $5.5 million -- approximately 653 cruzeiros. This is the first time the OPEC board has approved a project for this amount. This shows that Brazil's relations with OPEC members are good, the foreign minister stated. Saraiva Guerreiro also stated that a memorandum of understanding on nuclear cooperation with the British Government will be signed Wednesday. This ceremony will mark the conclusion of the agenda of the foreign minister in London. The document does not include any specific program in Brazil, but foresees the supply of technology for research on materials, licensing, equipment for reactors and radiological protection, in addition to quality control and equipping of reactors.

On Saturday the Brazilian foreign minister paid a visit to Oxford University. Today he held a meeting with Lord Carrington, secretary of state for foreign and commonwealth affairs, and gave a lecture to politicians and businessmen. In his speech, Lord Carrington stated that Brazil is a country which (?has gained) prestige in certain areas in the international field, and that Brazil's policy on Africa is very important in the point of view of the British Government.

Saraiva Guerreiro discussed issues concerning the EEC, whose council is headed by Great Britain. The minister stated that Brazil has always awaited a better flow in international trade and also for greater understanding in this regard. Saraiva Guerreiro told Lord Carrington that the developing countries will increasingly become exporters of manufactured goods. He also reiterated the Brazilian position expressed at Cancun that the developing countries are participating more actively every day in the world economy.

Tomorrow Saraiva Guerreiro will be received by Prime Minister Thatcher. This is the second meeting between the two, in addition to a meeting during the North-South talks in Cancun. After the meeting Saraiva Guerreiro will meet with John Biffen, secretary of state for trade. Then he will have lunch at Kensington House, where he will deliver a brief speech. His agenda also includes a press conference at the Brazilian Embassy at 1500.

Based on the dualism of diversity and (?universalism), Saraiva Guerreiro in his speech today stressed the basic principles of Brazilian foreign policy. He reiterated the Brazilian position regarding the principles of nonintervention and respect for self-determination. Highlighting Brazilian diplomatic points, Saraiva Guerreiro also explained that in terms of foreign policy, the Brazilian position is in perfect harmony with the aspirations of the Third World countries. The Brazilian foreign minister stressed the need for a correction of the economic plan for the Third World, within the so-called liberal processes of interaction among states, so the plan will be adequate for the differences of power between the Third World and their partners.

Regarding the political plan for the Third World, the Brazilian minister demanded greater participation of the developing countries in international deals, seeking a reduction of the forms of confrontation among countries. Therefore, the minister explained, Brazil hopes for a greater feeling of justice in international relations, to substitute for political and economic force in dealing with treaties among nations.

GREECE SEEKS REVIVAL OF CYPRUS GUARANTOR ROLE

NC011148 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 1 Dec 81 p 8

[By Nikos Avraam]

[Excerpts] Brussels, 24 Nov -- Greece wants to revive its role as a guarantor power along with parallel invocation of Great Britain's obligations as a guarantor power, which have remained unfulfilled. This was stated to me by Greek Deputy Foreign Minister Fotilas.

Mr Fotilas warned last week that Greece will also reconsider the manner and level of its participation in the Council of Europe in the event that this organization does not impose strict respect on its members for the council's principles, mainly with regard to human rights and democratic institutions. Answering my question on this point, Mr Fotilas added: It is clear that the reference to everything we have declared as general principles indicated, among other things, the grave failures committed by the Council of Europe in handling the Cyprus problem.

Question: Given the fact that Turkey invoked the argument of being one of the guarantor powers and sent the invading army to Cyprus, could Greece do something similar to counter the presence of Turkish troops?

Answer: It is well known that for many years Greece has not invoked its role as a guarantor power. I think it is the Greek Government's intention to reconsider the possibility of reviving this role and, moreover, of invoking Great Britain's obligations as a guarantor power which have also remained unfulfilled.

Question: Does the new government intend to have contacts with Britain on this issue?

Answer: In order to be absolutely accurate, I repeat to you: If we say the new government intends to do something, this means the new government has made decisions. Its intention is to reconsider the possibility and expediency of reviving both its own role and that of Great Britain as guarantor powers.

DENKTAS ASSAILS GREEK SIDE FOR HINDERING TALKS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the whole world now knows that it is the Greek Cypriot-Greek side that is obstructing a solution to the Cyprus problem. On being reminded of claims in the Greek Cypriot press that the Turkish Cypriot side has hardened its attitude at the intercommunal talks, Denktas said: The position of the Turkish Cypriot side has been determined through the Denktas-Makarios principles, and it is clear. We are at the negotiating table with our comprehensive and positive proposals in a bid to form a bizonal, bicommunal, independent and nonaligned Cyprus. We announced that we are in favor of continuing the talks within the framework of the latest Waldheim views. The whole world now knows that it is Greek Cypriot-Greek side that is hindering the procedures.

Denktas added that the Turkish Cypriots want the Greek Cypriots to renounce their intrasigent stand and begin a positive dialogue within the framework of Waldheim's views.

'RESERVATIONS' ON WALDHEIM DOCUMENT EXPLAINED

NC011147 Nicosia O KIRIKAS in Greek 1 Dec 81 p 1

[Text] Authoritative sources have stated to O KIRIKAS that in its document on "reservations" submitted on the "Waldheim ideas," the government does not protest the new, serious reversal by the UN secretary general in not suggesting the return of all refugees to their homes -- as stipulated in the UN resolutions -- but only a "considerable number" of refugees, without further specification.

On the contrary, the government notes tersely in its document that the criteria used by Mr Waldheim on the territorial question will not lead to the return of a "considerable" number, but only a small number, of refugees. The same sources have stressed that this is the first time this principle is noted by the Greek Cypriot side through the "reservations" document.

According to other information, the government document does not reject the methodology suggested by Mr Waldheim in determining the territorial separation line. On the contrary, the government accepts Waldheim's methodology: it agrees to present data and facts substantiating Waldheim's "criteria," but it has not been learned whether the government has or has not agreed to the establishment of an "experts committee" to collect the data. Nevertheless, it was learned that the Greek Cypriot side agreed to the empirical analysis of the facts about "viability" on the basis of separate data on each of the occupied areas, which may be liberated.

Concerning the question of priority to the resettlement of Famagusta, information available to O KIRIKAS refutes the government spokesman's statement made last Saturday that the Greek Cypriot side allegedly "insists that priority should be given to the resettlement of Famagusta." On the contrary, our reports persist that the Greek Cypriot side has agreed silently to abandon the principle of "priority." According to the same information, the "reservations" document does not demand, nor does it insist, that "priority" should be given to the question of Famagusta. The matter is merely mentioned "incidentally" and Mr Waldheim "is reminded" that, according to the 19 May 1979 "Kiprianou-Denktas" agreement, "priority" should be given to the question of resettlement in Famagusta.

The "reservations" document does not demand that such a "priority" should be given, nor does it set the giving of such priority as an essential prerequisite for the continuation of discussions. Consequently, the report that the "priority" to the question of Famagusta has been abandoned is correct. The government spokesman's statement to the contrary is deemed inaccurate and misleading.

At the same time, according to our information, the Greek Cypriot document questions whether the Waldheim proposals constitute submission of "middle solutions" that are far from the positions of the two sides on various disputable points. On the contrary, the Waldheim proposals on most points are considered as adopting the Turkish Cypriot proposals on the constitutional aspect.

Moreover, according to our information, it appears now that the document sunmitted by the Greek Cypriot side accepts that the "Waldheim ideas" are not a mere "evaluation." On the contrary, it is described as a document containing ideas for "bridging the differences between the two sides," which means that for the first time it is admitted that the "ideas" are actually "proposals" and not a "mere evaluation."

Furthermore, other information available to O KIRIKAS indicates that the "reservations" document is not confined only to reservations. On the contrary, it goes further and submits proposals for the future course of the talks. Among other things the document suggests that "a detailed comparison 'point by point' study of the Waldhiem proposals" should start now.

Authoritative observers have stressed to O KIRIKAS that if this course is followed many months will be needed for the detailed analysis of, and argumentation on, every single point of the Waldheim proposals. Such a course, they added, prejudges that the dialogue will be perpetuated.

After taking into consideration O KIRIKAS' report of last Sunday on the contents of the government's "reservations" document, observers have stressed that the "reservations" are not enough, nor are they expressed strongly enough, thus revealing that the Waldheim proposals are actually what they are -- that is, unacceptable. On the contrary, they described the "reservations" document as "anemic and toothless." At the same time, many of our readers have easily drawn the conclusion that the Greek Cypriot side actually accepts the Waldheim proposals.

LISSARIDHIS QUESTIONED ON PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDACY

[Excerpts] EDEK Chairman Vasos Lissaridhis categorically rejects any offer of ministerial portfolios to his party by President Kiprianou in return for EDEK's support for Mr Kiprianou in the next presidential elections. Dr Lissaridhis also stresses the decision of the EDEK congress to run in the elections. In an exclusive interview with Andreas Kaouris, the EDEK chairman described reports in this connection as senseless talk unworthy of any attention.

Dr Lissaridhis added that so far his party has not had any contacts with any other party in connection with the presidential elections. Answering a question on his relations with President Kiprianou, Dr Lissaridhis said that "there are relations based on the identity or opposition of political views." To another question on the Waldheim ideas, Dr Lissaridhis denounced the way in which the government has handled them.

The interview is as follows:

[Question] How do you react to reports that Mr Kiprianou, president of the republic and chairman of the Democratic Party, is offering EDEK two ministerial portfolios in return for your party's support in the presidential elections?

[Answer] All of this is senseless talk, unworthy of any attention, because EDEK is a party of principles, a party based on a program, and it promotes all relations on this basis. It would be absolutely unthinkable for EDEK to discuss matters of ministries, matters of positions. I would recall that this has always been the EDEK stance, even in previous elections, and the reason EDEK did not run in those elections was that Mr Kliridhis had withdrawn his candidacy because of the kidnapping of Akhilleas [Kiprianou's son], an incident we could not explain.

As you recall, the president of the republic stated on television -- he was a candidate then -- that because EDEK insisted on a program he accepted the EDEK program, and there was an obligation taken on by the president on the national issue that he would follow the EDEK program and that our views would not be too far apart. Under these prerequisites, we made a concession and did not submit a candidate.

These are the facts. In any event, there is no question of discussing ministerial portfolios or cooperation on the basis of anything in return, because this is outside EDEK principles.

Answering a question on his relations with the president of the republic, Dr Lissaridhis said: "There are no personal relations among parties and leaderships. There are relations based on the identity or opposition of political views."

[Question] Taking for granted, as of now, that you will run for president in the next elections, have you had any contacts with other parties?

[Answer] No. As you already know, we have the decision of the EDEK congress concerning the presidential elections. Most certainly we were the first to talk about a national salvation front; we were the first to talk about the need to rally all the forces who believe in the substantive line that the Cyprus issue is a question of occupation. We have never said we wanted any forces excluded, regardless of where they belong, as long as they believe in this line.

PAPER REPORTS ISRAELI PLOT TO KILL PAPANDREOU

NC020716 Tripoli Domestic Service in Arabic 0600 GMT 2 Dec 81

[Text] The Greek paper APOGEVMATINI reported yesterday that the Greek authorities have uncovered an attempt to assassinate Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou. The paper says this terrorist operation was planned in the occupied Palestine and that the Zionists have decided to get rid of Prime Minister Papandreou following his declaration that his government intends to recognize the PLO and to invite Brother Yasir 'Arafat to visit Greece.

Spokesman Denies Report

[Text] Athens (ATHENS NEWS AGENCY) -- The government spokesman has denied an afternoon newspaper's report on a plot to assassinate the prime minister and said no such information is available from any source.

According to the report, the assassination plot is attributed to Israeli fanatics "who decided to assassinate the PASOK leader from the moment he announced his decision to upgrade the Palestinian office here to official diplomatic status and to invite Yasir 'Arafat to visit Athens on 12 December."

Referring to another press report on Mr Haig's visit to Athens, the government spokesman said there has not been any change in what he announced a few days ago. The spokesman also said that if Mr Haig or Defense Secretary Weinberger, at the NATO ministerial meeting, ask to meet with the prime minister, Mr Papandreou will not object to a meeting. In any event, the spokesman added, there is absolutely nothing [scheduled] by the Greek or the U.S. side for meetings in Brussels between the prime minister and Mr Haig or Mr Weinberger.

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES EAST-WEST, EEC RELATIONS

[Text] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt expects from his meeting with Erich Honecker, chairman of the GDR Council of State, next week in the GDR specific prospects for an improvement in intra-German relations. In a government statement on foreign and German policy the chancellor told the Bundestag today that the SPD/FDP coalition agreed that the meeting with Honecker must give indications that goodwill exists on both sides to overcome a period of setbacks in relations between the two German states.

During his meeting the chancellor hinted, in the opinion of observers, at the possibility of improved conditions for people with the remark: "I hope that this meeting will open up perspectives that will be experienced by all Germans and which will encourage them." Schmidt warned, however, against drawing up a sheet of too many demands for the meeting with Honecker. The two sides must not block one another through excessive demands. "The talk is taking place without preconditions," he said, "and I am concerned that it is not made more difficult through publicly expressed expectations and overly ambitious yardsticks." He said that dialogue is the main thing. As with the recent visit by Soviet party and state head Leonid Brezhnev to Bonn, there will be "no signing of new agreements" at the intra-German summit.

In the predominantly political part of his statement the chancellor urged the Soviet Union to make its contribution to the Geneva negotiations with the United States on nuclear arms in Europe which began on 30 November. The meeting with Brezhnev in Bonn had, in Schmidt's opinion, given a further boost to the East-West dialogue and had shown "encouraging first signs" for the disarmament negotiations. In the wake of the failure of the London summit of the European Community the chancellor urged that compromises be made in important matters of EEC reform at the forthcoming consultations of the foreign ministers this year.

Pointing to the Brezhnev visit and the efforts for the Geneva negotiations, Schmidt said that the results of recent months and days have given reason for hope. "We have made greater progress than probably many have recently wanted to think possible." He appealed to everyone: "Stick to the course because the course is peace."

With regard to the American-Soviet disarmament dialogue, the chancellor said that the Federal Government has done everything in its power to bring about the negotiations. "Our aim is to help these negotiations to be conducted briskly and to see that they bring tangible results." The worries and fears in the East and West about nuclear missile arming, which he had discussed with Brezhnev, can only be removed "if the Soviet Union also makes its contribution to the current negotiations in such a way that concrete results are achieved by the end of the summer 1983." Bonn put the zero option -- complete renunciation of medium-range weapons -- in the foreground of the talks with Brezhnev. If, however, there are no concrete results toward the end of 1983, Schmidt stressed, the deployment of American medium-range weapons envisaged in the NATO dual decision will take place.

Schmidt reaffirmed his conviction about the firm resolve for negotiations and the reduction of weapons of both American President Reagan and Soviet leader Brezhnev. He sees "encouraging signs" on the basis of the talks with Brezhnev, for example, in the Soviet readiness to reduce the numbers of medium-range missiles during the negotiations. Alluding to the proposal for a moratorium on medium-range weapons repeated by Brezhnev in Bonn, the chancellor said that "attempts to try to perpetuate the imbalance that currently exists through negotiations are unacceptable."

Schmidt again confirmed "important differences of opinion" at the German-Soviet summit, but said that above and beyond these differences is the common denominator of concern for peace.

The Soviet side made no attempt to drive a wedge between the Federal Republic and its Western alliance partners. The Federal Republic stands firmly in the Western camp; it is and will remain a reliable ally. The FRG was able to have its voice heard in the alliance. "And we do this for the benefit of a stable security partnership between East and West in the interests of great efforts and endeavours for reducing the worldwide arms spiral."

The chancellor said that the financial compromise for the European Community which the foreign ministers are to agree upon at a closed meeting this month is "necessary and possible." He explained the difficulties that stood in the way of reaching an agreement at the European Council meeting last week. He said that the following four points remain open: 1) the formula for limiting the rise in agriculture costs; 2) the question of how to limit surpluses in milk production; 3) the question of Mediterranean produce; 4) the problem of the budget's structure.

Schmidt again stressed that the Federal Republic cannot be the only EEC member with unrestricted net payments to the community. The EEC cannot allow itself, in the present world political situation, "to spend a long time disagreeing over milk and olives." Here the chancellor underlined Bonn's will to further strengthen the community and to support new political orientations. The Federal Government also agreed to remain the largest net payer but not without limits.

Schmidt also paid tribute to the German-Italian initiative for the promotion of the process of political unity in the community through the formal establishment of institutions which have arisen politically such as the regular meetings of the foreign ministers.

Schmidt also expressed understanding of the fears of young people and said he had experienced similar fears during the invasion of Afghanistan, during the Schleyer kidnapping, during international incidents and during World War II. He said that "Leonid Brezhnev has the same fear."

However, the Federal Government must not give in to fears but must overcome them in the search for sensible solutions. Schmidt recognized that the "passionate vehemence" of the peace movement is connected not only with fear "but also with morality."

The chancellor stressed that the preservation of the "liberties contained in our Basic Law" is the supreme guideline. Here the preservation of balance is of great importance because "whoever strives for and secures military preponderance does not need to negotiate, he can dictate." On the other hand, "he who comes to terms with military preponderance can get into the situation where he tries in vain for negotiation and discussion."

Addressing the churches, Schmidt said that the obligation to act politically and to negotiate "cannot be replaced or forced out by declarations."

Kohl Responds

[Text] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- As first speaker in the debate [in the Bundestag following Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's government statement], opposition leader Helmut Kohl announced "strong support for the NATO dual decision." The CDU chairman accused the chancellor of having failed to mention that French President Francois Mitterrand, too, had preferred to counterarm first and then negotiate. "Why did you only name Minister-President Strauss and not Mitterrand, or at least both of them?", Kohl asked to loud laughter.

Kohl also backed a policy of understanding and cooperation with the Soviet Union and all Warsaw Pact states. He recalled his talk with Brezhnev last week in Bonn in which the Soviet party leader said that a constructive policy with the German Government is possible, as well as with the German opposition.

But facts are more important than words. The Soviet leaders spoke of peace but continued to wage war in Afghanistan, Kohl said. He also accused Moscow of preventing definite progress at the Vienna force reduction negotiations and also in the implementation of the CSCE Final Act. Moreover, Moscow in the final joint communique during Brezhnev's 1978 Bonn visit -- "and I would have welcomed it, Mr Federal Chancellor, if today you had made a comparison with this" -- had already spoken of military balance at a time when there were about 150 individual warheads. Today, Kohl said, the Soviet Union has some 750 individual warheads on the modern SS-20s.

Kohl accused the Soviet Union of ruthless pursuit of its interests. Although the 1978 statement spoke about the indivisibility of world peace, a few months later the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan. It is "not because we are supporters of the Cold War," Kohl stressed, but on grounds of conscience that we must not remain silent over Moscow's excesses.

The fact that Brezhnev's first visit to the West after the invasion of Afghanistan was to Bonn is no coincidence given the fact that important sections of the governing parties . Bonn are critical of the American administration and the NATO dual decision, Kohl said. Brezhnev wanted to exploit this and at the same time he succeeded in breaking out of international isolation.

Speaking for the opposition, Kohl expressly acknowledged that Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher had used the opportunity of Brezhnev's visit to Bonn and had fully backed the American President's disarmament proposals. President Reagan has clearly underlined the desire to arrive at definite disarmament. Kohl called on the chancellor to see to it in his party that the "slandering of American policy" is stopped.

In this connection Kohl sharply criticized the fact that leading coalition politicians are in the meantime calling into question the date of the counterarming with medium-range weapons planned for 1983. They are busy ruining the opportunities given by the Brezhnev visit after the event and are interfering with a successful outcome to the Geneva negotiations. Moscow had to be told that any German Government would be determined in 1983 to have the medium-range missiles stationed if there were no results in Geneva.

Kohl again accused the chancellor of having a wide gulf between his policy and the policy of the SPD. This is graphically illustrated in the Soviet proposal for a moratorium on deploying medium-range missiles. The opposition agreed that Schmidt had rejected a moratorium of this kind. "But what value is the chancellor if Brandt, Wehner and others deliberate in public on whether a moratorium is not desirable after all." Schmidt no longer has a majority in his party in foreign and security policy. There would not be a Federal Government security policy, said Kohl, if the CDU/CSU does not help to carry out this policy.

With reference to the planned meeting between Schmidt and Honecker, Kohl said that the CDU/CSU hopes in the interest of all Germans that both sides support peace, that there will be negotiations on quite definite human problems and that signals will be given. Trust does not grow in Europe through impenetrable borders. The credibility of the Soviet and GDR policy of peace and detente has to be measured by definite deeds.

Kohl reviewed negatively the Federal Government's efforts for progress in the European unification process. If the coalition had in the past 10 years taken as much trouble over Europe as over the ostpolitik, progress would have been made. Kohl regretted that no problems were solved at the EC summit in London. If there is a country in Europe in need of European integration, then it is divided Germany because only under the European roof can something be done for German unity.

Kohl warned against seeing EC problems from fiscal standpoints and gave the assurance that the opposition is prepared to make the necessary sacrifices for Europe. "It is a question of money but it is above all about the vision of a new Europe." Perspectives are needed over and above the decisions that are currently necessary. The European act submitted by Bonn and Rome could be an attempt at showing these perspectives.

CHEYSSON REVIEWS POLICY OF FIRST SIX MONTHS

[Maurice Delarue interview with External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson: "Soviet Strategists' Main Objective Is To Separate Europe's Defense From Rest of Atlantic Alliance" -- date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] After 6 months in office, the government's good intentions are coming up against the harsh realities of the world. We have good relations with Washington but much less good relations with Moscow, and France is absent from East-West dialogue; the attempt at a rapprochement with London has failed and the loosening of the French-German accord is preventing Europe from running properly; we are in danger of quarreling with everybody in the Near East and although the Libyans have left, things threaten to return to chaos in Chad.

[Answer] Listening to your summary, I am delighted to disagree with virtually all you say.

We want relations with the USSR which are as close and warm as possible. We are going to sign the biggest contract ever concluded between the two countries: 8 billion cubic meters of gas and, in exchange, consumer goods with a high level of labor required to produce them. We are stepping up contacts with East Europe.

We do indeed have a problem with the USSR. Our political relations are not as intimate and regular as they were in normal circumstances because French opinion is deeply affected by the Soviet presence in Afghanistan. This is a phenomenon which, as public polls show, is more marked in France than in Britain and the United States. I think -- and I said this to Mr Gromyko -- that this stems from the French people's memory of occupation.

Judging from what my Yugoslav counterpart says, his compatriots react in the same way for the same reason. As long as this situation lasts we will not be able to have a regular series of meetings with the Soviet leaders.

[Question] Do you rule out any visit?

[Answer] I do not rule out anything. I met with Mr Gromyko in New York, and I could meet him elsewhere, but we will not restore the usual rate of French-Soviet meetings. I do not like this situation because I would like closer political relations. There is a broad measure of agreement between us on some subjects like the Near East: but on the points on which we disagree it is important to have discussions. Our main disagreement obviously relates to the excessive levels of Soviet arms in Europe.

I am not just talking about the Euromissiles. The USSR has been making a colossal arms effort for around 10 years, since it is estimated to have devoted 15 percent of its GNP to it whereas the NATO countries have set 3 percent as their objective. [sentence as published]

A considerable proportion of these armaments -- Euromissiles, tanks, artillery, tactical aircraft -- threaten only Europe. It is this which markedly increases the danger: the separation in people's minds between Europe's defense and that of the Atlantic entity.

This "decoupling" could produce a psychological demobilization on the other side of the Atlantic. The risk was particularly serious 18 months ago when the White House gave the impression that it was not taking a firm enough line. Where would we be if, as some people thought after Mr Reagan's more recent statement, a limited war in Europe was conceivable?

Let's be frank: We would be in a position of marked weakness. It is clear that the Soviet strategists' main objective over the past 10 years has been this separation between Europe's defense and that of the Atlantic entity.

Simultaneously a complementary movement is taking shape: the psychological rejection of nuclear arms. The biggest danger for us would result from the combination of this "decoupling" and this rejection, which would leave Europe with a rough proportion of one to five in conventional forces against the USSR. That would seem to warrant more detailed discussions among the allies and much more frequent contacts with the Soviets.

[Question] Strategic dialogue is finally going to resume between the Americans and Soviets. Europe's security is the subject of this dialogue and yet we are not taking part.

[Answer] There are signs of a resumption and we welcome it. Since the end of the war the French have always wanted this dialogue. Mr Reagan's latest speech contains interesting elements. His choice of the "zero option" on the Euromissiles is definitely gaining ground. All the allies, ourselves included, agree with it. It forces the Soviets to either shrug their shoulders or enter into discussion. In Bonn Mr Brezhnev merely reiterated his proposal for a moratorium, in a barely improved form. "I will not deploy any more Euromissiles and may withdraw a few of the oldest ones if you abandon your response." This is unacceptable, but Mr Brezhnev did feel obliged to respond.

More importantly, American-Soviet nuclear talks are starting in Geneva on medium-range weapons. This is only an initial step because the various types of nuclear weapons are inseparable, we welcome this, too, therefore, and we have always approved of the SALT agreements.

Finally, we hope to succeed in launching the conference proposed by the previous French Government on "confidence building" measures for conventional forces from the Atlantic to the Urals.

Far from being absent from the strategic dialogue, we are taking a much greater part in it than before. First because we have publicly stated what our predecessors thought without saying it, namely that the deployment of the Soviet Euromissiles changes the quality of the threat and introduces a new level in deterrence. We also say that this threat must either be balanced or removed, and the Soviets will only negotiate if they are convinced of our determination.

We have said so openly, and this has played quite a major role in changing thinking and supplied valuable support for governments having problems with their public opinion. This is one of the reasons why our relations with the FRG are so trusting.

British Isolation

[Question] European worries in the sphere of security are being expressed increasingly frequently. You yourself recalled the existence of the only European organization which has competence in the defense sphere -- the WEU, which has hitherto been completely forgotten.

[Answer] Unfortunately it is unthinkable, for how long I cannot say, to envisage Europe defending itself. The zone is too narrow, and the deterrence logic implies a potential escalation which must necessarily involve the Americans. The idea of building a self-sufficient European defense system is a [mere] dream as far as the foreseeable future is concerned.

However, the Europeans feel greater solidarity with each other now than when the American umbrella was foolproof. At that time we had no worries; today we do, because NATO's necessary response to excessive Soviet armament leads to a buildup of weapons in Europe which is prompting considerable public reaction.

Thus solidarity in anxiety is being formed among the governments in face of the anxiety felt by public opinion and the prospect that fear will dominate all other feelings and will spark isolationist reactions. In addition, as I have recalled, the Americans do not always speak clearly. Mr Reagan's remarks on limited war aroused fears that the Americans could move away from us. There is, therefore, good reason for the Europeans to discuss security among themselves, especially since there is this desire to utilize the EEC.

Nonetheless the community is limited by treaties and by the reluctance felt by Ireland, which is not part of the Atlantic alliance, to discuss strategy. So there is the WEU (note: since 1955 the WEU has comprised Britain and the six EEC founder members -- the FRG, France, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg); since the Europeans want to discuss security, the WEU must be revived.

[Question] But the WEU was designed to contain and control the FRG's armaments. How could it be revived without altering its provisions?

[Answer] I do not yet know what proposals we will make, but the reasons for wanting to revive the WEU are quite the reverse of those you mention.

[Question] In Europe the attempt to achieve a French-British rapprochement back in the first few weeks of Mr Mitterrand's 7-year term failed.

[Answer] No. The attempt has not failed but the rapprochement has not been achieved. This confirms the considerable difficulties which Britain is facing. There is no rapprochement between it and anybody. President Mitterrand has seen Mrs Thatcher several times. Since I have been a minister I think that I have seen Peter Carrington, my British counterpart, more than once a week, and we have contacts by telephone or some other means on average every 2 days. I think that the same is true of our other counterparts. But there is no rapprochment because Britain is going through an extraordinarily difficult crisis and is adopting specific attitudes in European affairs. The British ideas were not supported by anybody at the European Council meeting in London.

The Role of the French-German Pairing

[Question] But at the same time our relations with the FRG have stopped being preferential....

[Answer] What President Mitterrand said is that our preferential relations with the FRG cannot be exclusive. In practical terms, and especially in the process of European building, the role of the French-German pairing is decisive. That has been confirmed. Since our arrival in office the convergence between our foreign policies has further strengthened our accord. I spoke of East-West relations; I could also mention Africa, Afghanistan or Central America. But these relations are not exclusive. We also have preferential relations with Britain, owing to our interests and responsibilities in the world, our membership in the Security Council, and our nuclear weapons; we also have such relations with Italy, owing to our membership in the Mediterranean and Latin world.

[Question] The fact remains that the virtual failure of the London European Council meeting gives the foreign ministers the responsibility of solving the disputed issues. How are you going to overcome this?

[Answer] It is striking to note that the only subject on which we made progress is a new one, the one we propose: recovery. When I told our partners, 10 days after the formation of the government, that we wanted to put forward recovery proposals before discussing budgetary arrangements, many people thought we wanted to block everything. However, the only practical decisions taken in London relate to recovery.

My second observation is that the procedure adopted for the other problems -- budget and agriculture -- is the only one which makes progress possible. Hitherto the job was given to officials who could not make decisions or to heads of state and government who lacked information. In my view only the foreign ministers, meeting behind closed doors, can grasp the political dimension of the problems while being sufficiently well informed. Moreover the community foreign ministers' council should be given the role of "general affairs council" which is conferred on it by the treaties and which has been shelved.

The Palestinians' Right

[Question] Europe also has the Near East on its agenda. But Mr Begin has just said that he regards Mr Mitterrand, but not you, as Israel's friend. What is your reply?

[Answer] I hope that Mr Begin's accident will not prevent him from receiving me next week. When I saw him on television I would have liked to tell him that his opinion is based on misinterpretations. If what he said were true, I would not last 24 hours as minister. I regard myself as having been Israel's friend for as long as it has existed, and moreover the same is true of most French people. But I think that Israel's future is to be found in the region and in peace. Peace must be restored to the region. However, there will be no peace in the region unless the rights of the other peoples are also recognized. The Palestinian people have the same rights as the Syrian, Iraqi and Israeli peoples. Who can believe that those people can live in peace if they have no state? Who can think that that will happen without negotiations among the forces in the region, including those represented by the Palestinian people? Mr Begin says that he is interested in how I will answer his questions. I am very interested in how he will answer mine, if he allows me to ask them. France has a very clear policy in the Near East and expresses it in the same way everywhere. President Mitterrand will say the same in Israel as in Riyadh and Algiers.

[Answer] In such a troubled region the nuance between getting on well with everybody and falling out with everybody is slight. Should we limit ourselves to fine statements? After repeating that we supported the Security Council resolution calling for withdrawal from the occupied territories, could we refuse some small responsibility once those territories have been evacuated? It would be shameful to dodge the issue.

There is more to it than this. There was a tragic event, namely As-Sadat's death. Now there will be no peace without Egypt, and those who want peace must hope that Egypt will be consolidated. What would become of Egypt if Sinai were not evacuated? We are too close to the Near East in all respects to be indifferent to it. You know what the continuation of tension in the Near East ultimately means: the massive presence of the superpowers using the Israelis and Syrians as intermediaries. That is certainly not in our interest.

Moreover, although we are openly criticized by everybody for our participation in the Sinai force, we are congratulated by many people behind the scenes.

[Answer] We do not approve of all those ideas. We simply say that Prince Fahd's statement is the most promising to be made for years. In my opinion it will continue to be the most interesting basis for consideration for a long time. What happened in Fes does not contradict that and, finally, the PLO similary deemed Prince Fahd's declaration premature.

[Question] What do you expect the president's visit to Algiers to produce?

[Answer] An atmosphere. We can count on this because a number of years have elapsed since the war, because the Algerian leaders show great realism and because the left has come to power in France with a whole range of expressions and approaches which are sympathetic to the Algerians. The value of this visit can only be assessed in 6 months or a year.

[Question] Does France have a Maghreb policy?

[Answer] It is our dream to have one. In 1956, long before independence, I contributed to a report known as the "senior civil servants' report on Algeria," which placed the future of French-Algerian relations in the Maghreb framework. Our relations with Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia must be given Maghreb aspects. Similarly their relations with us must be given European aspects. However, they still have to agree to this. That is why we are at least happy to see some development taking shape in the Saharan conflict. The Moroccan king made a very courageous approach which gives rise to great hope and which is also linked to Libya's approach.

[Question] While we are on the subject, Libya's withdrawal from Chad is a diplomatic success, but isn't there a danger of a return to chaos?

[Answer] I would not say that it was a success. It would have been a success if the withdrawal had taken place in conditions which enabled Chad to devote itself to the task of rebuilding, but a hasty withdrawal does not make this possible. Let us say that things are developing more favorably.

[Question] What about our relations with Libya?

[Answer] There is now no reason why they should not improve.

A Socialist Policy

[Question] The partisan, Socialist character which you display in your action abroad has prompted strong criticism even in our newspaper. What is your reply?

[Answer] Why should a country pursue the same policy whatever party is in power? There is no such thing as a foreign policy but a French policy which has foreign aspects, and this policy necessarily bears the stamp of the party in government. Where have I spoken of the Socialist nature of this policy? In countries where this nature opens up the best possibilities for us, in Yugoslavia for instance. We have undoubtedly adopted attitudes in Central America which a rightwing government would not have adopted. I do not see what reason there is for criticizing that. I am not the pope and I do not propound ecumenical ideas, I am a member of a leftwing government defending the interests of France -- the whole of France, of course -- and we do not necessarily view those interests in the same way as the previous rightwing government. I should probably not have spoken of "Socialist France" but of "France's leftwing government." The expression does not change the essence of my thinking.

MINISTRY SAYS POLISARIO FREE TO OPEN OFFICE

[Text] Paris, 3 Dec (AFP) -- The Saharan nationalist guerrillas, the Polisario Front, are now free to open an office in France whenever they want, but such a move would not imply any official recognition or privilege, the Foreign Ministry said Wednesday. The law requiring foreign organizations to get official permission first was abolished last month. Top French Socialist Party officials visiting Algeria earlier this week with President Francois Mitterrand had talks with Polisario representatives in Algiers about official French recognition.

NAPOLITANO INTERVIEWED ON DIVERGENCES IN PCI

[Lucio Caracciolo interview with PCI Secretariat Member Giorgio Napolitano: "Time for PCI-PSI Dialogue Has Arrived"]

[Excerpt] [Question] Deputy Napolitano, profound political differences within the leadership group have emerged in the Communist Party in recent years and months. On the other hand, your debate is often incomprehensible to the uninitiated. You have proposed that "differing tendencies and opinions be compared more openly." Is this happening?

[Answer] Two requirements are borne in mind by our party and its leadersip group: an open and clear deba e and a united effort designed to avoid damaging counterpositions or even tendencies toward factious or splittist attitudes. All of us are equally aware of these requirements. We are trying to find a balance between them. I regard the result achieved with the document passed by the Directorate and later by the Central Committee as positive. We have not denied the existence of differing opinions on this or that aspect of our policy, but I would like to state now that grossly oversimplified or distorted, and sometimes entirely gratuitous, portrayals of our debate are still being made.

[Question] For instance?

[Answer] It is suggested that some of us are seeking alliances with the PSI at any price, irrespective of substance, or are concerned only with day-to-day political tactics and not with plans for the transformation of society, and so forth. Also it is being suggested that others of us are entirely insensitive toward the PSI and in general toward the parties with which we cooperate in local government, because of problems concerning trade union unity, and so forth.

[Question] But these are not just journalistic simplifications. There is the authoritative example of Franco Rodano, rightly or wrongly regarded as one of the Communist Secretariat's advisers, who recently launched a scathing attack on the "paranoid fans of Craxi-ism," the "burdensome deadwood" that are tainting Berlinguer's "correct" line. Do you consider yourself one of these?

[Answer] That article (I will ignore the regrettable language that he uses) lies within the framework of the unreliable portrayals of our debate that I mentioned before.

[Question] You have admitted, however, that divergences on "this or that point" do exist among you. What are these points?

[Answer] The nature of the debate emerged clearly back at the July Central Committee meeting. The points on which the dialectic and a resolution were understandably open could be identified, even then, as relations with the PSI, what approach to adopt toward the need for leftwing unity, how to approach the morality issues, how to regard the PCI's distinctness and how to pursue the objective of the democratic alternative. I would like to state with great conviction that the Central Committee document for the regional congresses constitutes a satisfactory synthesis of various opinions or emphases, which it is proper to compare without the personalizations which the press has emphasized so much.

FIRM NATO POLICY AFFECTS USSR'S MISSILE STANCE

[Francesco Gozzano article: "Brezhnev's Apparent Flexibility To Be Tested in Geneva"]

[Excerpt] What a long time ago it seems that Gromyko announced that any decision by NATO to deploy medium-range missiles in Europe would "destroy" the basis for negotiations! And yet it was only 2 years ago. NATO has pursued its policy and the USSR has been forced to backtrack from its previous intransigence and is now offering a partial reduction of its own missile arsenal on certain specific conditions.

Essentially the Soviet leader's Bonn talks revealed the USSR's willingness to begin the dialogue with the Americans on the reduction of theater weapons, abandoning the rigid conditions established on previous occasions. At first Moscow proposed a simple moratorium that would have left the imbalance between the alignments unchanged; then it threatened not to start negotiations unless meanwhile SALT II were ratified. Later it lowered its sights to simultaneous discussion on the subject of the U.S. forward-based systems in Europe, offering a unilateral moratorium, and now it has taken a further step by declaring its willingness to reduce its own weaponry as an "advance" against the results of the Geneva negotiations.

This apparent flexibility by the Soviets, which in fact implies no relinquishment of the demand for similar behavior from the West, is the realistic consequence of the steadfast stand adopted by the NATO countries. Having seen their determined refusal to accept the moratorium and at the same time their determination to carry forward the missile modernization program, Moscow saw itself forced to modify its own stance, at least at the tactical level, by introducing some variations on its old demand for a moratorium. This is in itself an initial step, even though the USSR still claims undauntedly that there is substantial parity between the two blocs' medium-range forces. But this is a contrived argument, because in presenting his case to Schmidt, Brezhnev equated both the new triple-warhead SS-20 vehicles and the old SS-4 and SS-5 missiles, which deliver only one warhead each. And as is well known, the West considers a mere counting of the various delivery vehicles inadequate and unsatisfactory.

NATO DECLARATION ON ACCESSION REPORTED

[Text] Spain today took the final step on the path toward NATO membership with the presentation of a letter from the minister of foreign affairs, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca, to NATO's secretary general, Joseph Luns, and with the letter's favorable reception by the organization, RNE [Madrid Domestic Service] in Brussels has had access to the documents exchanged on the matter. Here is the complete text of the declaration on the event read by an official NATO spokesman:

[Begin recording of unidentified NATO spokesman in French with superimposed Spanish translation] On behalf of the North Atlantic Council, the secretary general of NATO, Joseph Luns, welcomes the initiative which the government of the Kingdom of Spain has taken in expressing its readiness to become a member of the North Atlantic alliance. The members of the Atlantic alliance will now set in motion the process for accession which will begin with the drawing up of a protocol of membership which will be submitted for the consideration and formal approval of the foreign ministers who will have the opportunity of expressing their points of view during the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Brussels on 10 December. This protocol will be ready for signing in Brussels at a formal plenary session of the council on the afternoon of the same day. In accordance with the existing procedures the Kingdom of Spain will be invited to join the alliance once the protocol of membership has been ratified by the member countries in agreement with their national constitutional procedures. As laid down in article 10 of the North Atlantic Treaty, membership will become effective on the date on which the instrument of membership is deposited with the government of the United States of America. [end recording]

In a personal letter from the secretary general of NATO, Joseph Luns, to the Spanish minister of foreign affairs, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca, which contains the text of the communique, the following paragraph is added:

You are cordially invited to attend the said ceremony. Moreover, I should like to convey the invitation from the acting honorary president of the council, the Hon Mark MacGuigan, secretary of state for external affairs of Canada, to join us that night in the traditional dinner for the foreign ministers.

SAHAGUN EXPLAINS RESIGNATION OF UCD CHAIRMANSHIP

"I wish to remind you that I agreed to submit my candidacy for the party chairmanship because this was asked of me by many comrades of various sectors, and sincerely believing that I should not refuse at that difficult time. Since that time I have devoted the rest of my time to working for party unity by following a unifying policy and seeking to ensure that the UCD would remain loyal to the centrist political blueprint in order never to disappoint our members and voters. At the same time, I have attempted to strengthen the organization and contact with our provincial members and leaders in a desire to raise our comrades' morale and enthusiasm in order to maintain a lively and constantly expanding party.

"I have striven to fulfill the pledge undertaken at our second national congress to attend to the party's internal democratization and to give impetus to the functioning of the collective bodies -- the Political Council and the Executive Committee."

"And all this is without a reduction of the party's support for the government, which has been expressed on many occasions and under many circumstances: support based on sincerity and loyalty to the guidelines and instructions of the national congress -- the party's supreme body, of whose decisions the chairman is constitutionally the repository and guarantor.

"Our party has been experiencing for over a year a grave crisis which can only be resolved if people really change their behavior and attitudes and there is dialogue, understanding and generosity on everybody's part. It is within this framework and believing that reunification of the offices of prime minister and party chairman could be advantageous at this moment -- for reasons of political opportuneness -- that I have tendered my resignation from the UCD chairmanship.

"And I have done so on the basis of my sense of responsibility and hope that this reunification could be positive for resolving the UCD's crisis.

"I leave the chairmanship in the hope that the UCD will be able to be the strong party for which I have struggled; a champion of the society of freedom, capable of carrying out without dangers the reforms which Spain needs and of attracting voters with its political blueprint for many years, in order to prevent the recurrence in our country of a division into two blocs, which has always ended in confrontation among Spanish people."

CALVO-SOTELO TO TRAVEL ABROAD BEGINNING JANUARY

The prime minister's first two trips will be to Tunis and London. The first of these being combined with a visit to the Arab League headquarters, though the main point of the trip is to discuss Spanish membership in the EEC, which the Tunisians think will be harmful for their exports of farm produce. The EEC will also be the main point in the prime minister's trips to London and Brussels. The trip to London is scheduled for 8 January at the invitation of Mrs Thatcher.

But that is not the end of his schedule of foreign trips for the first 2 months of next year. The next one will be to Peru, within the framework of what is seen as the bridge which Spain provides between the EEC and the Latin American countries. Another trip will be to Mexico, to get to know personally the next Mexican president, the Institutional Revolutionary Party candidate Miguel de la Madrid.

Finally, there will be trips in the context of what is seen as a new phase of opening up towards East Europe. Calvo-Sotelo will be making a trip to Yugoslavia and the foreign minister -- still Perez-Llorca -- will visit Bulgaria and Hungary.

USSR MINISTER COMMENTS ON ECONOMIC RELATIONS

[Text] Soviet Minister of Foreign Trade Nikolay Patolichev regards Finnish-Soviet economic relations as internationally exemplary. Patolichev today addressed the annual meeting of the Finnish-Soviet Chamber of Commerce in Helsinki. He referred to the tense world situation and assured his audience that the Soviet Union supports a strengthening of security and peace in the world through, among other things, trade and economic cooperation. Patolichev pointed out that Finland has risen to become the USSR's second largest Western trade partner. He said that the Soviet Union takes these economic relations into consideration when formulating its development plans and that such relations also benefit Finland, which is affected by the difficulties caused by the Western economic crisis.

ICELAND

PARTY PROPOSES DEMILITARIZED NORTH ATLANTIC

PM021213 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 29 Nov 81 p 7

During an Althing question time, which was the introduction to the debate, it was announced that Iceland had given its approval to the deployment of 600 new nuclear missiles in West Europe. Foreign Minister Olafur Johannesson stated that within NATO, decisions were made not through voting, but through consensus or general declaration. The fact that Iceland had granted its approval in December 1979 gave rise to a certain amount of controversy, since the country was then being ruled by an interim Social Democratic minority government whose main task had been to hold new elections in the country. At the time the Social Democrats had 14 of the Althing's 60 seats and were the biggest losers in the December election losing 4 seats. It also became clear during the debate that in recent years Soviet submarine traffic around Iceland has increased significantly.

Some Althing members expressed concern over a possible future nuclear accident in the ocean off Iceland, since the country is extremely dependent on its fish exports. The Progressive party, which is Foreign Minister Johannesson's own party, now wants the government to invite all nations possessing nuclear arms and North Atlantic littoral countries, as well as representatives of the World Peace Council to a conference. The idea behind this conference would be to gradually demilitarize the North Atlantic, the first stage in which would be to stop any further increase in nuclear weapons in the area. Thereafter nuclear disarmament would take place in stages within a certain period of time, after which the North Atlantic would be declared a nuclear-free zone.

An international body would then be given the task of monitoring and implementing these plans, and it could be based in Iceland, the proposal states. The proposal looks as if it has a good chance of being approved by the Althing since the Progressive party's 17 members and the leftwing socialist People's Alliance's 11 members are expected to support the proposal. This would mean that the support of only three other Althing members would be needed. During the debate Foreign Minister Johannesson stated in the Althing that Iceland's commitments to NATO and the 1951 defense treaty with the United States do not prevent Iceland from participating in or signing declarations about nuclear-free zones.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS RESUME IN NICOSIA 2 DEC

Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot representative at the talks, stated that methods for holding the talks following the submission of the Waldheim evaluation were to be discussed. He also said the agenda has been agreed on between the parties and is based on the 1979 summit agreements and the opening statement [by Waldheim]. He said: There is no reason to change it. Mr Ioannidhis said the Waldheim evaluation is not a substitute for the UN resolutions or the summit agreements. He added: It is an accessory, as the UN secretary general has said, to help effect some progress in the talks.

Onan, the Turkish Cypriot representative at the talks, stated that at today's meeting he was to comment on the Waldheim document and on the document submitted by the Greek Cypriot side. Mr Onan said he was not going to submit a document.

'Method for Discussion'

[Excerpts] The Greek and Turkish Cypriot sides in the intercommunal negotiations yesterday agreed that the UN secretary general's evaluation so far constitutes "a method for discussion".

The communique issued by the UN said: "Procedural aspects arising from the secretary general's evaluation were discussed. Both sides agreed with the special representative of the UN secretary general that the evaluation constitutes a method for discussion. Each side put forward fully its views as to the methodology of future negotiations." The next meeting has been tentatively fixed for next Wednesday, 9 December. It added, however, that if this meeting does not take place due to the visit to UN headquarters in New York of the UN secretary general's special representative, the meeting will be on Thursday, 7 January, 1982.

Reliable sources said there is no firm date for Mr Gobbi's departure. The exact date will depend on when the Security Council debate for the extension of the UNFICYP mandate takes place.

Yesterday's meeting was the first since the Waldheim evaluation paper was formally tabled on November 18, which Dr Waldheim himself described as a "negotiating vehicle for the intercommunal talks".

A UN source in Nicosia expressed guarded optimism about the outcome yesterday, saying that while it has not been agreed whether it is a drive-on vehicle, the two sides appear agreed at least that it is the only form of transport around.

OZAL ANNOUNCES FAVORABLE BALANCE OF PAYMENTS

TA021057 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 2 Dec 81

[Excerpt] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal, speaking at the seventh livestock breeding congress in Ankara, has said that Turkey currently has no serious foreign exchange problems, as a balance of payments is certain. Noting that Turkey's exports for the first 10 months of 1981 reached more than $3 billion and increased 64 percent in comparison to the same period last year, Ozal said he hoped this figure would reach about $4.5 billion by the end of the year.

Recalling that a large market exists for Turkey's livestock in neighboring countries, the deputy prime minister said that up to 15 November export agreements for 2.5 million head of livestock have been concluded. Ozal added that correct foreign exchange policies have provided for a speedy development of Turkey's livestock and meat exports. He said the export of livestock would play an important role in the future in Turkey's foreign exchange balance.

Production Increase

[Text] Industry and Technology Minister Sahap Kocatopcu has said that production at the economic enterprises under his ministry have risen by an average of 20 percent over last year. A meeting is being held in Ankara to discuss the administration and investment activities of the state economic enterprises for the period January-September 1981. In an opening speech, Kocatopcu pointed out that even though the number of workers employed at the state economic enterprises had been reduced by 5 percent since the beginning of the year, production and productivity had risen in the same period. However, he added, the state economic enterprises did not fall in step with the exports of 1981.

The minister stressed, however, that only the cement industry and the machine and chemical industry establishments were successful in exports this year. The meeting is also being attended by officials from the Consultative Assembly budget and planning committee, the prime ministry supreme supervisory council, the State Planning Organization and the Finance Ministry.

SOCIAL CHRISTIANS' VANDEN BOEYNANTS RESIGNS

PM031101 Brussels LE SOIR in French 1 Dec 81 p 2

[Guy Duplat and Jacques van Horebeeke report]

[Excerpt] I have given it a great deal of thought, and I think I am being consistent. I have always supported clear stances. I have been defeated. I am acting on that. I am leaving.

By resigning his post as Social Christian Party [PSC] chairman at noon on Tuesday after a "disastrous" Executive Committee meeting, Paul Vanden Boeynants has sparked off a crisis within his party. It is true that the crisis had been imminent since the election defeat on 8 November, but it assumed an unprecedented scale over the past week. This afternoon the PSC Executive Bureau was to choose a temporary chariman from among 13 candidates to fill in for 3 months.

VAN DER STOEL QUESTIONED ON DISARMAMENT, CSCE

LD292358 Budapest Domestic Television Service in Hungarian 1800 GMT 29 Nov 81

[Text] [Question] Your government program attributes fundamental importance to continuation of the SALT process. Do you continue to believe in this process, which is considered dead by most?

[Answer] Well, I am not such a pessimist. I would very much have liked to see the SALT II treaty come into force. But the SALT process itself has not ceased to exist totally. In fact I hope it will be possible to continue the talks in the spring of next year. I also hope resolute efforts will be made not only with regard to the stabilization of the arms race and the nuclear race, but that we will really attempt to reduce the strategic nuclear weapons on both sides.

Political goodwill is necessary to enable us to achieve this goal, but I think it is essential for us to really achieve this goal, because if the increase in the number of nuclear weapons on both the Russian and the American sides continues in the same way I think it will become increasingly difficult to stop the spread of nuclear weapons in other countries. It is for this reason as well that the continuation of the SALT process is essential.

[Question] There is a sentence in your government's program. Let me quote it: It is no secret that the emphasized peace and security concepts of the Netherlands often do not meet with total approval and favorable reception within the alliance system. Would you please explain this sentence?

[Answer] Even between good friends differences of opinion occur, but I think that with regard to the main goal there is total agreement among us. The goal is not only to have a collective armed force within NATO; the search for detente and disarmament is just a much a goal. We are of the opinion that various forms of activity are possible to astain this goal. There is a need for the SALT talks. We have to prevent the race in medium-range nuclear weapons. We would like it if there were no SS-20s and if the modernization of weapons on our part did not take place. This is what we are in fact seeking. It is our firm opinion that new impetus has to be given to the long-drawn-out talks in Vienna and, finally, that we have to act in Madrid in the interest of creating a European disarmament conference.

Of course there are other very important topics in Madrid which have to be discussed, but we very much hope that it will be possible to attain success in this question. So we have an extensive agenda ahead of us, and we have to do everything not only to secure stability, but also to strive for a reduction of weapons in Europe.

[Question] In your opinion, does the Netherlands play a somewhat more active role with regard to these topics than other states?

[Answer] I can only say that the Netherlands is extremely active as regards these topics, and would add that the reactions to our ideas are starting to become increasingly positive.

[Question] In your judgment, do the countries with a small area but densely populated have a special role in safeguarding detente, since both Hungary and the Netherlands are such countries?

[Answer] I think small countries also have a role. We try very hard, in an appropriate way, to call for stability, for a reduction in nuclear weapons and weapon control. I believe and hope that Hungary, on the other side, is doing the same. Over and above this, it is my opinion that direct contacts between the governments and peoples, the relations of the governments of the Netherlands and Hungary, the relations between our peoples, are also playing an extremely important role.

PAPER VIEWS U.S.-USSR ARMS DIALOGUE PROSPECTS

PM031501 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 26 Nov 81 p 7

[Excerpts] Whether Schmidt has been successful in his long talks with the Russian leader will be made clear only by the American-Russian talks on the Euromissiles which begin in Geneva on Monday. Compromises between East and West will then have to be reached. It is obvious that the Bonn talks have not yielded any really new approaches to the arms limitation issue.

It is true that the Russians demonstrated a certain willingness to take part in step-by-step negotiations on medium-range nuclear arms, and this could lead to decisions being made before the end of 1983, as Chancellor Schmidt announced. But Brezhnev was unwilling to include this in the joint communique. It would seem that Moscow wants to say this out loud only to the Americans in Geneva.

It is interesting that the Germans had the impression that the Russians are indeed willing. And Brezhnev's remark that the East-West dialogue must be carried on at the highest level and that bridges must be built points in this direction.

The Germans also had the impression that the Russians feel really threatened by Reagan's line, but are now very ready to sound out the nature of the U.S. willingness to negotiate.

All this must be deemed a positive development, for, as Brezhnev said on one occasion, although the fact that meetings are held does not mean that a solution has been found, the fact that the two superpowers are once again prepared to take part in a common search for political solutions is a step forward. It is a vast improvement over the situation in recent months, when the exclusive pursuit of military power increasingly seemed to be taking the place of the ambition to give political form to international relations.

There can be few objections to such an endeavor to place arms limitations in the broader framework of a foreign policy which aims at making all other sources of conflict possible objects of discussion -- at least, that is, if a reasonable attempt is made to find solutions which do justice to the interests of all the parties involved and the linking of many divergent problems does not lead to obstruction and stagnation in the already highly complicated negotiation process.

SCHMIDT SPEAKS TO BUNDESTAG IN POLICY DEBATE

DW031309 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0802 GMT 3 Dec 81

[Excerpts] But first please let me say a word about the European Council meeting last week in London. In the center of the official agenda in London was the so-called mandate. This key word mandate stands for a universal conciliation of interests within the community. That means new emphasis regarding the policies of the community. New instruments for the community or the concentration of financial means from already existing instruments and policies, such as the regional and social funds, on those policy fields and regions that really need it. The adaptation of agricultural policy and agricultural expenditures is involved here, and finally the settlement of the European Community's budget structure is involved.

Naturally it is not simple to tie such a voluminous compromise package together because reconciliation must take place between numerous, diverse and contradictory interests of a national, regional and sectional nature. This entire process is taking place against the background of a most critical economic situation in the entire world, throughout the entire European Community and in every individual member state. Thus there are extreme complications for the conciliation of interests. The fight against unemployment is currently the number one problem in all countries and throughout the whole community. Our partner countries in the community all clearly have greater employment difficulties than we. Only in the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg is the unemployment rate lower than in our country. In most other countries there is also a simultaneous fight against very high inflation rates.

It became clear again in London that nobody, no government of the 10 states, has a patent recipe at hand to offer to the others for these difficulties. There is not even a recipe for one's own country because the fiscal policy leeway has become extremely narrow in each of the member countries. We Europeans relaize and must adjust to the fact that a great part of our economic problems comes from the outside. Only persistent efforts to improve our own efficiency and our ability to compete can help against the oil price explosion and the worldwide high interest rates. Thus efforts must be made not only by the organs of the European Community, they must be made most of all by the respective national economic policies; efforts must be made particularly by plants and plant managements, and by workers and their trade unions in the individual member states.

I pointed out very thoroughly in London that in this situation facing the European Community we cannot afford to have national economic policies act against each other. [applause] Thanks to current cooperation in the areas of economic, monetary and trade policies, we have so far better handled the worldwide economic crisis than in the twenties or thirties. This advantage must in no case be lost by the European Community even though due to high unemployment and narrow financial leeway the temptation is very great for all parliaments, and particularly all governments, to at least temporarily pass their own difficulties through protectionist measures to other countries. There is no reasonable alternative to cooperation and mutual concern.

It also became clear in London that all member states must correct erroneous developments in their own countries. In some member states high inflation rates are a dangerous potential for unrest, and these rates have been mainly self-made. Many industries and many jobs are endangered because the structural change has been artificially delayed or watered down for many years.

Only an increased ability to compete internationally can create leeway in the long run for interest rate cuts and lessen the effect of high and unstable interest rates in the great states outside the European Community. [applause] The course of discussions in the European Council was not completely satisfactory, but it was still better than I had expected.

This was possible due to the direction of the negotiations by British Prime Minister Mrs Thatcher and to the most active cooperation of French President Mitterrand, as well as to the preparatory work by the commission. I think I can also say about my colleague Genscher and myself that we have worked hard to achieve compromises.

Four points remain unsettled:

First, the formula for limiting the increase of agricultural expenditures; second, the question of how the milk production surplus in Europe should be limited; third, the matter of Mediterranean products; and fourth, the budget structure problem. In these four points, too, the European Council achieved an approximation of positions which in some cases was rather considerable, though it was unable to tie the package completely together. But that definitely was not the fault of German motions or Gereman reservations. The two important German positions, by the way, were recognized in principle, namely, that we cannot be the only one making unlimited net payments in the community and that the increase in the agricultural costs must remain below that of the European Community's own revenues.

We made it quite clear that new policies cannot be started or implemented unless funds are released for that purpose elsewhere. It seems to me to be necessary and possible for the foreign ministers to achieve in closed session a conclusion before the end of the year on the basis of the understanding reached in the European Council.

By the same token, the EEC cannot choose the path of a lack of financial discipline. The elements for a solution do exist, and the readiness and the will to achieve them are great, at least at the level of the heads of government. The Federal Government wants to strengthen the European Comunity, especially in these difficult political and economic times. For this reason we are prepared to meet our EC partners half-way. In principle we are just as prepared to help support new policies which are advantageous above all to our partner countries. We also are prepared to remain the European Community's biggest net contributor, by far the biggest of all; but definitely not the only state in the community making unlimited net payments. [applause]

The German-Italian initiative concerning a European union is a contribution made at the proper time to promoting the political integration process in the community. My overall impression of those 2 days in London is that the will is strong, also among our partners, to stand together more firmly particularly at this time.

Let me now return to the visit by Mr Brezhnev. During this meeting there was no attempt made to drive a wedge between our alliance partners and ourselves. Messrs Brezhnev and Gromyko had rather expected that we would be talking on the basis of the common alliance positions. They were aware, of course, that we in Bonn greatly contributed to the formulation of the positions of our alliance. They also know, of course, that we would raise our voice in the alliance, and that this voice would be heard there in the future because our weight lies fully on the Western side of the scale and has its impact there.

I expressed to the Soviet guest my understanding for his concern, the concern of the Soviet Union, over the development of U.S. medium-range weapons in West Europe. But I was neither able nor willing to dispel their concern. Rather I explained to the general secretary that we understand that concern perfectly well because we have felt directly threatened for quite some time by the constantly increasing numbers of Soviet medium-range missiles. We are familiar with such worries. Thus to us attempts to perpetuate the existing imbalance in its present form through negotiations are unacceptable.

The concern and the anxieties of both sides can be dispelled only when the Soviet Union also contributes to the current negotiations in such a way that concrete results will be achieved by the end of the summer of 1983. [applause]

In this connection we have moved the mutual zero option into the foreground. Yet, if by the end of 1983 no concrete results have been achieved -- and I stated that in no uncertain terms -- the Federal Government, any Federal Government, would abide by the commitments contained in the dual decision regarding German security interests and the common security interests of the alliance. This means that the deployment would be carried out to the planned extent. [applause] In this connection, by the way, I warned against any misjudgment of the peace movements in West Europe and against trying to replace political discussions between governments with an attempt to exert influence on public opinion on the other country.

Let me add that I on my part do not doubt the Soviet Union's readiness to negotiate seriously in Geneva to achieve essential reduction in medium-range weapons. Even if no essentially new proposals were advanced during our talks, I do see encouraging beginnings -- for instance, the Soviet readiness to reduce its inventory of medium-range missiles even during the negotiations. There was the implied possibility of proceeding in stages in the negotiations proper. This is in keeping with the Western proposal to concentrate in an initial phase of the negotiations on the medium-range missiles of the two sides.

It was with satisfaction that we noted that the Soviet side also voiced keen interest in headway in the current negotiations on the mutual reduction of forces and weapons in Vienna -- generally referred to as MBFR -- as well as in a satisfactory conclusion to the CSCE followup meeting in Madrid with a clearly defined mandate for a conference on confidence building and security promoting measures and on disarmament in all of Europe. I also welcomed the endorsement of the principle of restraint and moderation in the relations among all states.

We in the Bundestag are committed to listen very closely when the churches, and when trade unions or other large groups give us advice on how to ensure peace. The public has received much advice in past months on the peace problem. Some of this advice was carefully thought through, some was confused and still more sprang directly from fear, particularly the fear of young people. One of them has written that he is afraid because the federal chancellor or the Federal Government is not afraid. How does he know that we are not?

I have been afraid and fearful many times in my life. But we in parliament, we in the Federal Government must not be overcome by fear. [applause] We are responsible to the people to act reasonably even when we are in a state of fear. [applause] The memory of fear during the war and the fear of another war force us to work with all our reason and strength for peace.

Many of us have been probably surprised and baffled by the passionate vehemence with which fear gains ground and expresses itself in peace movements existing only in West Europe and not in East Europe, and how often reason is being endangered that way. If somebody simply yields to his fear, it does not mean that he acts morally. If somebody yields to his fear although he bears public responsibility, he runs a great risk of acting immorally. [applause] The peace movement most certainly has to do not only with fear but also with morality. And most certainly the current mass destruction arms are a particular challenge to moral thinking. [applause]

If one is bewildered, then one must not just remain inert in this bewilderment or anxiety. One must face up to the questions resulting from the bewilderment, for instance, the question: Have we, the politicians, done everything to make the objective and the course of our policy morally understood?

The standpoint of the Federal Government and the starting point of our peace policy initiatives are unequivocal. I have explained that. The antagonism between the two world powers and their alliance systems, however, also is an antagonism of views about the order of society, above all about the basic rights, the freedom rights of the person, of the individual. What we want is to preserve the provisions of freedom by our basic law; not just the freedom of the market, as important as it may be for our prosperity; not just the freedom of the intellectual, as important as it is for the freedom of thought and criticism; but above all the freedom of working people to gather and jointly advocate their interests.

One might speak of three basic philosophies of avoiding wars, to put it somewhat coarsely: The first course pursues the superiority of one's own arms as the guarantee of one's own security. Its motto is: We must be the stronger and show it to the Russians. Or conversely, we must be the strongest and demonstrate it to the Americans. This course inevitably leads to the arms spiral. This course endangers peace instead of preserving it. [applause]

The second course aims at unilateral disarmament. This is the stance of the morally justified pacifism, but often also an attitude which springs from wishful thinking or naivete. This course, too, leads onto dangerous ice in any event, because unilateral impotence -- this we learned in our lives -- does not prevent the aggression and the defeat by the superior power. [applause] The one who is unarmed, who has disarmed himself, loses the capability of resisting political blackmail, and thus he loses the capability of representing the interests of his own people. [applause]

And in the third place, there is the course of balance of military forces and of equal security for both sides. No government of a world power can sign an inequitable disarmament treaty; neither the U.S. Senate nor the Supreme Soviet would ratify an imbalanced treaty. The principle of balance is an inalienable basic component of any agreed, any contractually insured, policy of disarmament and arms limitation. There is no other way of insuring arms reduction and arms limitation contractually under international law.

Balance, in contrast, creates for both sides the chance for dealing with each other in a civilized manner. It is a foregone conclusion that security is not created solely by the balance of weapons, definitely not. What is required in addition is the civilized dealing with each other, the dialogue, cooperation, the security partnership. [applause]

A final word, ladies and gentlemen, concerning the strategy of deterrence. From the realm of the two great churches utterances on the peace issue have been made in the past few weeks. The Federal Government cannot and will not claim these utterances, or parts of them, for its own course, but it does take seriously the moral share in the responsibility by the churches in this issue as well. All differences, in part considerable differences, in the points of emphasis and in nuances notwithstanding, both statements are agreed in one basic consideration which I may sum up as follows: A security system based on deterrence in Christian opinion constitutes a considerable moral or ethical problem. It can be ethically justified, or is bearable on the whole, only if and when real steps of disarmament are pursued with full force. The will for negotiations is indispensable to this end. The two lay-church bodies have made it clear that for moral reasons the existing world security system of deterrence and counter-deterrence makes politically action and negotiation morally necessary. I want to add that this moral duty cannot be replaced or pushed aside by a policy of mere avowals. [applause]

Let me address a word to the opposition. It still seems to me that the opposition is not sure whether it wants to pursue the course of the social-liberal Federal Government or whether it wants to pursue a different course in this matter. The CDU/CSU image regarding peace and security policy is diffuse. [applause] There are indications of an understanding of peace-political necessities, to be sure, but there are also other signals.

The North-Rhine Westphalian opposition leader, our former colleague Professor Biedenkopf, raised the question recently of whether consensus on a long-term basis is possible at all in the strategy of nuclear deterrence. The CDU federal congress held immediately after that did not discuss Biedenkopf's question. But this question is worth an answer, Dr Kohl. [applause]

I also read almost at the same time that Minister-President Spaeth signed the German Trade Union Federation's peace appeal. I welcome this, but I would like to know what his Munich colleague Mr Strauss thinks of it. [applause] At the CSU congress Minister-President Strauss said that the equivalence of defense efforts and the willingness to negotiate was -- I quote verbatim -- a congenital defect of NATO's dual decision which was due to tactical reasons but illogical in the matter -- end of quotation.

Mr Minister-President, this is in clear contrast not only to the Federal Government's policy but also to the policy of the United States and all states in the alliance. [applause]

I was even more shocked, Mr. Minister-President, when on the occasion of Brezhnev's Bonn visit you termed the negotiating aim of a zero solution set jointly by the alliance for Geneva pure nonsense. You said this at a time when the United States, which is one of the negotiating partners, expressly made the zero solution its negotiation aim. [applause] Mr Kohl and Mr Minister-President Strauss, I want the opposition to make its course and its intentions clear. [applause] But you must take into account that the peace-political course of the social-liberal Federal Government is backed by the overwhelming majority of our people [applause], backed by the overwhelming majority of our people [applause], and that it originates in the deep longing of the Germans and of the other European nations for peace and good-neighborly relations.

You know, ladies and gentlemen, that yesterday I accepted with thanks an official invitation from Erich Honecker, the GDR State Council chairman, for a meeting on the 11th, 12th and 13th of this month. The meeting will be held at Lake Wehrbellin. I consider this first meeting on German soil after the Erfurt and Kassel meetings in March and May 1970 between Willy Brandt and Willi Stoph as an important sign for the two German states, above all for the bonds between the people in Germany and also for detente in Europe. [applause]

I intend to hold a comprehensive exchange of opinion with Mr Honecker on the state and development of relations between the two German states as well as on international affairs and in particular the safeguarding of peace. The social-liberal coalition is agreed that this meeting is to show that goodwill exists on both sides to overcome a phase of setbacks in relations between the two German states. I hope that this meeting will open feasible prospects for all Germans and inspire them with courage.

Ranking first will be talks and the dialogue between both German states. Like during the Soviet general secretary's recent visit, there will be no conclusion of new agreements. The talks will be held without any preconditions and I do not want them to be unnecessarily complicated in advance by speculation or publicly voiced expectations and high yardsticks. Making a list of many demands would be very easy for those who are not willing themselves to hold a patient dialogue and bring about a consensus. Some people still are keeping to the practice of the sixties -- confrontation instead of cooperation, pressure and counter-pressure instead of detente and balance of interests -- and this exists on both sides, in the GDR as well as in our country.

Let me say in conclusion, ladies and gentlemen, the peace-political course of the social-liberal Federal Government is a course of active willingness for talks. I agree with Herbert Wehner that being able to hold talks with both sides is our German contribution to peace policy. I want to add that it is our task to safeguard peace with our whole heart and also with absolute passion for clear reason. [applause] The results of the past months and days give reason for hope. We have made headway, more than some people thought or were willing to think possible. I am appealing to all: Let us keep to this course because this course means peace. [applause]

Strauss Comments

[Excerpts] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- In the Bundestag debate, CSU Chairman Franz Josef Strauss said that the advantage of Brezhnev's visit to Bonn is that after it the Soviet party leader will have to "certainly correct" false ideas. The lack of definite results is no surprise, Strauss said. He strongly attacked SPD Chairman Willy Brandt and his colleagues, who allegedly are already considering postponing the date for NATO's counterarming beyond autumn 1983. "I warn against misuse of the time factor," Strauss said and reaffirmed that the question of medium-range missiles must be settled "one way or the other" by 1 October 1983. To prevent a drifting apart in the alliance, there must be no postponement of the date which was jointly agreed.

In a discussion of the ranges of various weapons Strauss also pointed to the security needs of China, which, he said, will be affected by a widescale redeployment of Soviet SS-20 missiles beyond the Urals.

Strauss stressed that he shared Schmidt's views on Moscow's earnest desire for disarmament. This does not mean very much, however, because the Soviet Union possesses a different system of values, as the genocide in Afghanistan showed. Moreover, Brezhnev himself is struggling for recognition of his policy within his own circle.

Strauss reaffirmed his conviction that only a military balance can safeguard peace. The Kremlin leaders are very aware of risks and very wary of them. The past has shown that the Soviet Union penetrates only into those parts of the world where they have not faced a nuclear opponent.

Barzel Appeals for Unity

[Text] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- The chairman of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee, Rainer Barzel (CDU), has appealed to all NATO states to stick to the alliance's dual decision, as this is the only way to achieve a result in Geneva. Certain neighbors should think carefully about whether they intend to hold back from the German position, because either "everyone will have peace, or none of us will."

As did other opposition speakers, Barzel attacked SPD Chairman Willy Brandt and the head of the SPD parliamentary group, Hebert Wehner, because they had made headlines at the cost of the government and the situation with statements on the possibility of postponing NATO counterarming. Barzel challenged both of them to immediately state their support of the government's position. The opposition is slowly "feeling funny" at being the only one in the Bundestag to unanimously support the chancellor's position on this question.

On the subject of the chancellor's meeting with the chairman of the GDR State Council, Erich Honecker, Barzel said that the opposition welcomes the talks and wishes them success but that the CDU/CSU would not be silent if the meeting is used only to make "disarmament speeches aimed at television." "Above all, the talks must be about mines and self-detonating devices, about the wall and about the suppression of human rights." Barzel also expressly warned about giving in to the Honecker's demands about citizenship, the Salzgitter registration office and the Elbe frontier. These are attempts by the GDR to continue their cordoning off policy.

BUNDESTAG PASSES RESOLUTION ON ABC WEAPONS

[Text] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- All parties in the Bundestag unanimously demanded an unlimited outlawing and controlled abolition of all atomic, biological and chemical weapons (ABC weapons). The session passed a corresponding CDU/CSU group resolution on Thursday evening without debate, after the big foreign affairs debate.

The FRG voluntarily renounced atomic, bacteriological and chemical weapons when it joined the Western alliance on 5 May 1955, and agreed to inspections by its alliance partners.

Another CDU/CSU group resolution that the Soviet Union should immediately halt the construction and stationing of further SS-20 missiles and start to dismantle the existing missiles step-by-step, was, however, rejected by the majority of the SPD/FDP coalition. The coalition expressed the view that a further resolution was unnecessary, as the Bundestag already passed a corresponding resolution on 26 May this year which covered the concerns of the resolution now presented by the CDU/CSU group.

BRANDT ON TNF TALKS, SCHMIDT-HONECKER MEETING

[Excerpt] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- It is not intended that the SPD congress in Munich next April will make any new statements on the NATO dual decision. Speaking in the Budestag debate today, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt said "we are concentrating on what faces us now," because "there is nothing new in discussing what was decided in Brussels at the end of 1979." Brandt said that with regard to the Munich congress "an attitude must be adopted -- perhaps a little more clearly than is possible at the moment -- toward that with which the great powers are now dealing." Brandt then looked ahead further to 1983, when an attitude to what had been achieved by that time would have to be drawn up again. "I think it is good that now, at the end of this year, the Bundestag is discussing peace policy," Brandt said at the start of his speech. But he also warned against "over-optimistic expectations" of the Geneva medium-range missile negotiations. He criticized the widespread disquiet at "what I may call, with all caution but quite clearly, the occasional inadequacy of those who represent the two great powers" and their "alternating between squabbling and stubborness," which does not make for trust.

Brandt praised the "important offer" made by the U.S. President 2 weeks ago. The fact that Brezhnev had also said he was prepared for "substantial measures" justified all those who had been suspected by the CDU/CSU of illusions and sometimes also of anti-Americanism, Brandt said. "The CDU/CSU must rid itself of this nonsense."

Brandt urged that attention should be paid to the growing problems of the Third World, which inevitably affect every group of states.

Brandt said Poland could and must settle its affairs itself. He criticised the opposition for the fact that three CDU/CSU governed Laender had withdrawn financial support for the Institute for Research Into Peace and Conflicts.

With regard to the forthcoming meeting between Schmidt and Honecker, Brandt expressed the hope that the possible results will "benefit people over here and over there."

On behalf of the FDP parliamentiarty group, foreign policy spokesman Juergen Moellemann thanked the federal chancellor and the federal foreign minister that as a result of their [word indistinct] the East-West dialogue on arms control is again under way. Revival of the dialogue across bloc frontiers is urgently needed to make peace more secure. Moellemann demanded further confidence building measures in East and West because the mutual mistrust between the two blocs hampers efforts to limit arms at the lowest possible level.

The FDP deputy stressed that NATO's "devastating concept" for nuclear deterrence could only be accepted if every effort is made to reduce the volume of nuclear weapons. The main aim of deliberations must be on how war could be avoided and not how it could best be waged.

With reference to the forthcoming intra-German summit, Moellemann said the FDP parliamentary group emphatically welcomes the fact that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, together with Ministers Otto Graf Lambsdorff and Egon Franke, will hold talks with the GDR. This could be a useful contribution toward revitalizing the dialogue between East and West and especially between Bonn and East Berlin.

WISCHNEWSKI COMMENTS ON ARMS TALKS, BURUS SPEECH

[Text] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski emphasized that he considers it possible to postpone the realization of the NATO dual decision, planned for the end of 1983, under certain circumstances.

A situation could arise in which both superpowers might reach an interim agreement in Geneva, the SPD politician said. If this mutual agreement occurs, "we would not say no." This is also true if both superpowers come to "agreements on a timetable." Willy Brandt and Herbert Wehner could be understood in this sense. They, too, said that an extension of the time limit was possible, and were heavily criticized by the opposition for this.

Wischnewski challenged the opposition to decide on a constructive attitude of cooperation in foreign policy. The forthcoming meeting of the federal chancellor with the chairman of the GDR State Council, Erich Honecker, was of decisive significance for people in both parts of Germany. The federal chancellor was not traveling to the GDR to make agreements. At the meeting, however, prerequisites for a "whole series of agreements" could be created, which are of importance for peace in Europe.

On the much debated foreign affairs speech of U.S. Ambassador Arthur Burns on Tuesday in Bonn, Wischnewski said that the overwhelming majority of the people in the FRG welcomes the 237,000 U.S. soliders, without whom a balance is not possible. The U.S. presence is of vital interest to the FRG. This view "does not mean, however, that when U.S. politicians have differing views and sometimes even say stupid things, that we will not say this quite clearly."

MINISTER PREVIEWS SCHMIDT VISIT TO GDR

[Excerpt] Bonn, 2 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Minister for Inner-German Relations Egon Franke (SPD) has said that it sensible for Chancellor Schmidt to visit the GDR immediately after Brezhnev's visit. "There is a direct connection between the two meetings; the visit to the GDR is part of the efforts to continue talking and, where necessary, to resume talking," Franke said in an interview with BILD ZEITUNG (Thursday edition).

Asked whether the chancellor would also raise subjects like the compulsory currency exchange and lowering the age for visits to the Federal Republic, the minister said that the meeting should not be made difficult from the outset by high expectations. However, it is certain that no topics will be excluded. According to Franke it is not a question of concluding definite agreements or accords. However, many agreements with the GDR could be augmented or revived. This includes interzonal trade.

BAHR REAFFIRMS BELIEF IN FRG-GDR COMMON SECURITY

[Excerpt] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- SPD politician Egon Bahr has linked the forthcoming Schmidt-Honecker meeting with the expectation that the German states will be aware of the situation in which they both find themselves in central Europe. In an interview on North German and West German radio, he reaffirmed today in this connection his idea of the "common security" of the two German states.

"The security of the GDR is our security, and our security is that of the GDR" Bahr stated. To become aware of this would mean that this dimension would be added, as the basic treaty also envisaged. However, he said, this aspect of the treaty has not yet been fully exploited. Bahr stressed that he would consider it an important thing if both German states could finally achieve that "normal level of dealing with one another" as was the case between other European states. Bahr endorsed constant consultations with the GDR and added: "After all, we also talk with the Russians." Regarding the Geneva negotiations on medium-range weapons he did not see the time as having arrived yet when Bonn and East Berlin could take direct action or come to a joint proposal.

In an interview on Saarland Radio, the CDU/CSU spokesman on Germany policy, Peter Lorenz, according to the radio station said that the time had not yet arrived for regular talks with the GDR. He said that agreement to regular talks would mean a considerable international upgrading of the GDR Government.

GENSCHER ADDRESSES EUROPEAN COMMUNITY PROBLEMS

DW041029 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1500 GMT 3 Dec 81

[Speech by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bundestag debate in Bonn -- live]

[Excerpts] Ladies and gentlemen, we want security policy problems to be included in European political cooperation, in our foreign-political cooperation. I think in recent months we have realized above all that it is necessary to make Europe's voice heard more clearly. We are aware that we must act with circumspection in this respect. We are aware of the problems resulting from the fact that one of the member states does not belong to the Western alliance. But we consider the inclusion on the political and economic dimensions of European security into the future common foreign policy to be indispensible. In other words, it is not very useful for Europeans to constantly complain about the lack of consideration for their interests without developing the ability to define these interests jointly -- not against each other. [applause]

It must be added that the safeguarding of these interests also requires the European partners in the Western alliance to be aware that the United States must never be seen by us as a watchman for Europe who can even be hired free of charge. The power of the alliance is based on the political, defense-political and economic contribution of the Europeans to the West's common position. [applause]

Ladies and gentlemen, our common tasks include common analysis of worldwide and regional dangers to the community's security, the development of active international policies by the 10 to counteract such dangers and safeguard the community's economic security as well as its energy and raw material supplies, the improvement of ability of the 10 to react to world crisis in coordination with others according to their common interests and, finally, above all the development of an all-European policy by the 10 which will be rich in initiative and which, despite the division of our continent, will lead to an agreed stability on the basis of a balance of forces through dialogue and cooperation, through the building of confidence, through arms control and disarmament -- a policy which will lead to a European peace order for which we will have to develop the political and economic dimensions.

In all our European policy activities, in all our statements about Europe we Germans must never forget that Europe does not end at the borders of the community or at the borders of the states of the Council of Europe. Europe belongs to all European nations, including those who unlike us cannot live in democracy. This Europe must see its task as one of peace beyond all ideological borders.

Earlier today the peace movement in Germany was mentioned. I want to say in this respect that the powerful avowal of peace not only by the younger generation is an indication of a European identity, a European identity which is growing irrespective of the political systems, even though this desire for peace of every individual can be articulated more clearly in our West European democracies than in the other European states which do not have the privilege of living in democratic systems.

This form of European identity is growing everywhere and an advance of the European Community's foreign policy to the security policy area must be linked with the desire to overcome the division of Europe as well as with close and trustful cooperation with the North American democracies with which we are allied not only militarily as in former alliances but with which we are allied as a community of values and guaranteed freedom. It is on this realistic basis that we must develop a security of partnership for Europe, a security partnership which together with political and economic elements will enable a lasting European peace order embracing, and in the very distant future, eventually overcoming the bloc. For this goal we will need to have much patience, perseverance and realism. The task we must set ourselves today is to do everything in our power to create a realistic security partnership in Europe.

We must do everything in our power to ensure that peace initiatives emanate today from Europe where wars emanated from previously. Regarding the Third World, Europe has a great task and cannot be suspected of representing hegemonic interests. Our colleague Brandt is right in saying that North-South relations are primarily also a peace task. We cannot expect the world to be stable unless the North-South differences are resolved. Just as the nations at the end of the last century were shaken by their own social problems, we will also see this happen worldwide in the North-South relationship.

Seen this way, it certainly is wrong to assess the situation in the Third World only from an economic viewpoint. It certainly is also wrong to see possibilities of influencing others only under military conditions. It is my opinion that the best way to further the independence, sovereignty and stability in the Third World countries is for us to consistently continue along the road of partnership cooperation with these countries and enable them to overcome their social problems. However, this must be done through a policy they consider correct and without any attempt to exert influence on them. [applause] In this respect the Cancun North-South summit was an important event.

We must be partners in regional cooperation everywhere in the world. This is also a part of our peace policy. Our cooperation with ASEAN is such cooperation. Our cooperation with the states of southern Africa, the Lusaka states, is such cooperation. Our willingness to cooperate with the Gulf states contributes to stability in the region. Ladies and gentlemen, irrespective of our concern about developments in Central America, for instance, and of the differing views on the developments and forces to be supported, it should be the common goal of the Germans and the common goal of the Europeans to encourage the Central American states to try and form a regional alliance. For such an alliance we are the proper partner because we can guarantee that we will not introduce the East-West conflict into that region. This must be our aim. [applause]

I think that whenever we speak of peace policy, as Germans and as part of the European Community, we bear a great responsibility which we can, however, fulfill. The safeguarding of peace is indeed a task that has involved us in connection with the visit that has been very much discussed today. We are aware that East-West relations are of great significance for stability and security in the world. If we do not succeed in setting the course toward arms control, stability and cooperation, all other problems will be difficult or impossible to solve.

We must realize that the development of East-West relations which began in the late sixties has suffered a severe setback due to the exaggerated armament of the Soviet Union in the seventies and eventually to the invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979. But we also realize that the international situation has again begun to move and that new insights and new opportunities exist. We must campaign for the view that security cannot be achieved by striving for superiority but really only on the basis of a balance.

The political responsibility for the West and the East requires that the dangers of the current situation be kept under control. This goal is served by the West-East dialogue, by the meetings between the U.S. secretary of state and the Soviet foreign minister in New York and by the next meeting between the two planned for January. This was also served by the visit by and the meetings with the Soviet leadership here in Bonn. We act in this connection, without overtaxing ourselves, in the awareness that our country must play an active and significant role in the efforts to improve East-West relations. There is no doubt that German-Soviet relations are of considerable significance with regard to East-West relations as a whole, and vice versa.

The clear desire of the Federal Government to form lasting relations with the Soviet Union on the basis of treaties is an essential part of our consistent and confidence building German foreign policy. This policy is based on the firm committment to the Western alliance and the European Community.

The Geneva negotiations which began on Monday offer the opportunity to bring a definite negotiation subject to concrete results in a specific time -- namely the medium-range missile problem. And an opportunity might be created to bring influence to bear on other disarmament fields.

I believe that the talks and the common attitude shown here in Bonn have made their contribution. As interpreters of the Western position, we stressed the sincere will of the West with regard to constructive negotiations and concrete negotiation results. We also left no doubts that only concrete negotiation results can influence the deployment of medium-range missiles slated by the Western side for late 1983. We did this out of the awareness that doubts regarding one part of the dual decision would deprive the other part of its foundation. That is true both ways. In other words, doubts regarding the seriousness of the Western will regarding deployment worsen the chances for those negotiations from which we hope results will emerge that will lead to making this deployment unnecessary.

We also termed the so-called zero solution, that is renunciation of land-based medium-range missiles by the Soviet Union and the United States, not only a desirable result but the result we want to achieve at the Geneva medium-range weapons negotiations. I repeat that we hope that this will also give impetus to other fields.

Esteemed ladies and gentlemen, are we aware of what it means that the demands of the Federal Government for mutual renunciation of medium-range missiles has been accepted not only by the United States, leading the negotiations for the West, but also by the other alliance partners? Are we aware that this demand has made an impression on the Warsaw Pact states? I recall the statements by the Romanian president on the occasion of the federal president's visit to Bucharest.

The Geneva negotiations on medium-range weapons must be also seen in connection with other disarmament efforts mentioned in the speech -- the remarkable speech -- of the U.S. President. We are convinced that the resumption of talks on strategic arms, with the aim of not just limiting but reducing them, will also have a positive effect of medium-range missile negotiations.

Ladies and gentlemen, we have always supported a continuation of the SALT process. We consider it important that negotiations will continue next year in this important field.

We must view the Vienna MBFR talks on the reduction of forces in central Europe in connection with the two areas of negotiation involving nuclear weapons I just mentioned. The Federal Government hopes that the continuation of the CSCE process and particularly the work of a European disarmament conference will improve the framework conditions for these three fields of concrete disarmament and arms control policy.

The Federal Government will do all it can at the Madrid CSCE followup conference to facilitate the work of European disarmament. Progress on confidence building measures would give European security policy a new quality and considerably facilitate efforts aimed at arms control and disarmament. Viewing the state of the Madrid conference, we are concerned because the conference is stagnating. The Finnish Government has made a suggestion which is an attempt to find a way out of the current situation. The Western side supports this suggestion. But a positive response from the Eastern side has not yet been given.

There are voices already suggesting the interruption of the conference and waiting to see whether 6 or 12 months from now better prerequisites for good conference results would exist. Ladies and gentlemen, I want to leave no doubt that the Federal Government will do everything it can to lead this conference to constructive results now. [applause]

The work of a European disarmament conference offers a chance today to make a beginning in solving the tangle of contrasting security interests by agreeing on confidence building measures for Europe. If this step is successful -- and we must struggle very hard to see that it is -- prerequisites can be created for the security partnership between the West and the East which the federal chancellor has mentioned.

We believe that such a security partnership with the aim of having security agreements going beyond the alliances would be more than an arms control policy structure. Political steps are necessary to create confidence. It is necessary to coordinate interests on both sides. This is also served by economic cooperation between the West and the East.

The persistent implementation of all sections of the Helsinki Final Act by all partners is, next to building confidence in the military field, a prerequisite for political confidence building. We must always be aware of the fact that according to the way the CSCE is set up, such a security partnership between the West and the East makes the participation of the United States indispensable because of the power situation in Europe. The Soviet Union considers itself to be a world power competing in the military sphere with the other world power, the United States. A balance of power in Europe is therefore only feasible if the United States participates on the Western side. This means that regarding an overlapping European security system, the participation of the United States is indispensable.

I believe it would serve the interests of Europe and the world if the Soviet Union considered its own long-term interests as not being served by further development of its military potential and the resulting military and political imbalances. Rather the Soviet Union, by fully maintaining its security interests on the basis of as low a balance as possible, should realize the option, the chance of firm and extensive cooperation with the Western democracies. [applause]

Ladie and gentlemen, I am firmly convinced that when the federal chancellor goes with colleagues Graf Lambsdorff and Franke to the GDR next week, the vast majority of Germans here and there will say yes to this visit. Many wishes and expectations will accompany the talks between the federal chancellor and Mr Honecker. This common support, these common expectations will demonstrate again that more links the Germans in the West and the East than just a common past. [applause] What unites the Germans in the West and in the East is the awareness of a common present and the awareness of responsibility for a common future. We realize that the Germans cannot move in isolation -- neither the Germans in the West nor the Germans in the East -- because not only do others not want that, it would also not correspond to our national interests. It is in the interest of the divided nation for us to always be aware that German policy is first of all a European peace task. Europe is a peace task for the Germans. This awareness and this realization must dominate our action. That is the way along which we want to continue.

Mr Federal Chancellor, I hope that you will take a step forward on the occasion of your GDR visit -- a step forward with regard to the Germans in the divided country and to peace in Europe. Thank you. [applause]

FURTHER DETAILS ON GDR-SOVIET ESPIONAGE REPORTED

LD021706 Hamburg DPA in German 1308 GMT 2 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Berlin, 2 Dec (DPA) -- According to the U.S. Military Mission in Berlin, one Soviet diplomat, three Soviet members of the military and a 41-year-old GDR citizen were arrested near the Grunewald municipal railroad station by allied authorities and German police on suspicion of intelligence activities. According to the BERLINER MORGENPOST the men had allegedly met a German who was interested in information on military installations in West Berlin.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH EL SALVADOR TO RESUME

PAPER COMMENTS ON SCHMIDT-HONECKER MEETING

[Hans-Herbert Gaebel editorial: "The Second Interpreter"]

[Text] After the enterprise had failed twice, first because of Afghanistan and then because of Poland, it seems that the federal chancellor and the GDR state and party chief want to meet this month. Schmidt and his spokesmen have made sincere efforts to dampen expectations. But the drawn out approach has its own impetus.

The opportunity for rich booty is indeed small. Treaties in which the Federal Republic would formally accept GDR citizenship or West Berlin is treated fully according to Bonn's concepts, are as before, unacceptable to one side or the other. Cancellation of the higher minimum amount to be exchanged by West German visitors to the GDR, a grave setback for all Germans according to Federal Chancellor Schmidt and something which the Federal Government cannot accept, can hardly be expected. In the best case there could be slight alleviations for pensioners or young people. The GDR needs foreign currency, and with the increase it could reduce the influx of West German and West Berlin visitors which seemed to be becoming too voluminous.

Maybe Honecker can be talked into further liberalization of the family unification problem and an attempt might be made to permit more groups of GDR visitors to go to the Federal Republic than before. Otherwise there will be the usual talks on transportation and technology as well as on the elevated train in Berlin, water protection, the Staaken checkpoint and organized development of economic cooperation. Since quite a lot has been settled in past years, the list of topics is shrinking.

But it is probably not the main intention of the Federal chancellor to prepare technical agreements. For him the visit is obviously a continuation of his contact with Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, who welcomed this meeting and thus facilitated it, regardless of how sovereign the GDR leadership may feel it is. Regardless of how different the Western and Eastern alliances may be set up, in one aspect both German states have almost identical positions -- they are the most important allies of the two big powers in the heart of Europe.

Negotiations have begun in Geneva now which may be the most important ones since 1945. "Interpreter" Schmidt has contributed his share to it. It is obvious that he wants to talk to a man who could be used as a translator. They both speak German and thus they do not need an additional interpreter in this respect. This must not be overrated because the basic ideological-political differences of opinion will remain. We should not harp in this connection on the "European peace patriotism" invented by Foreign Minister Genscher, but if there are two states who should wish every possible success for the Geneva negotiations, it is the two German states. Cooperating for the sake of such success as much as possible would be worth every effort.

The experience particularly during the past 2 years -- since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan -- has most clearly stressed the common interest. Each German state had to and wanted to play its part in the community it belongs to. So it was inevitable that relations were jeopardized by the quarrel of the big powers. The fear about its existence, which shakes the East German regime whenever it looks at Poland, slowed things down in the all-German area. But these 2 years have also proven that by and large both parts have adhered to the rules and agreements they set themselves previously. Regardless of who can claim the greater merit for himself in this respect, without this bridge that can carry quite a bit of weight on both sides, matters would look much darker in Europe and the Geneva talks would probably not take place. The direct contact between the two top-ranking German politicians is therefore indispensable also for the future, even if no great Christmas gifts will be distributed.

DIE WELT SEES SCHMIDT AS FULFILLING ROLE

[Herbert Kremp commentary: "Bread and Water"]

[Text] The negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union which begin today in tradition-filled Geneva, have already reserved a good position for themselves in the history of diplomacy. Along a long and winding road it will become clear whether the highly armed world powers, particularly the Soviet Union with its advantage of several options, will be able to contain their capacities for destruction.

The dialogue does not seem to be completely hopeless. With their unified position in the days preceding Geneva, Washington and Bonn have clearly indicated to the Soviet side that the Western counterbalancing weapons will be deployed in Europe if the negotiations have not made acceptable headway by 1983. The federal chancellor does not tire of pointing out this countdown, and in so doing he fulfills the role which this part of Germany can play in the big poker game: to be taken seriously with regard to its strategic decision.

The forthcoming months will be a heavy burden on our nerves. The Soviet Union will naturally try to prolong the Geneva negotiations so as to reap the benefits of European fear. Only those who are ignorant will fail to see that by supporting the peace movement they are promoting the international class struggle with current means. It is obvious that power politics are involved. If the counterweapons are deployed, then Europe cannot be treated like a hostage over a definite period of time; then Soviet Russia would have to change its strategy of "offensive defense." The fact that the differences between ideology and reality and smaller in Soviet foreign policy than in domestic policy may justify the almost exaggerated optimism of some Western authorities -- but only the most cautious form of this optimism. After the chancellor's toast to Brezhnev, which corresponded to our interests, a long dinner will now follow made up of black bread and water. Steadfastly perservering is the true art of governing.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE LAUDS BURNS SPEECH

[Commentary signed G-N.: "A Serious Word"]

[Text] Hopefully there will be red ears not just in Bonn now that the speech by the U.S. ambassador on the state of German-American relations has been heard and read. The American ally has endured with great patience the experiences of past years, but particularly those of this year. First there was a cooling down, then disassociation and insinuations, and finally defamation of American policy with regard to Europe. The ambassador properly differentiates between the "excesses" of German students who do not know what they are doing, and the adults in the Federal Republic, and particularly their leaders who know better and yet let the others have their way -- as they let so many wrong things happen since 1968. Two warnings by the ambassador are particularly applicable: In the long run, the Americans will not provide their protection to those who do not want it because America is not an occupation forcelike the Soviet Union. The other thing is America's shock over the obvious political demoralization of the Federal Republic, that is the discovery that with the exception of their prosperity (and the fear of losing it), the Germans do not seem to have any other values they are willing to make sacrifices for.

EGYPT SEEKS TO PURCHASE NEW MILITARY HARDWARE

[Text] Gen Jacques Mitterrand, chairman and managing director of the National Industrial Aerospace Company [SNIAS] was received by Egyptian head of state General Mubarak in Cairo on 25 November. The French president's brother, who arrived last week, is on a 2-week visit to Egypt, to which France recently sold military equipment.

General Mitterrand's visit is taking place a month before the visit which Defense Minister Charles Hernu is scheduled to pay to Egypt in late December 1981 and early January 1982, during which he too is to be received by General Mubarak.

In 1981 Egypt ordered 30 Alpha twin-jet aircraft from France, in the ground tactical support version -- an order worth around Frl.6 billion. At the Le Bourget Airshow Egypt ordered 14 Mirage F-1 air defense interceptors, which come in addition to the 28 Mirage III fighters whose purchase was financed by Saudi Arabia.

New discussions are now taking place between the two countries on military supplies in other spheres. For instance, during a recent exhibition of military equipment in Cairo attended by the representatives of 92 American and European companies, Egypt informed France that it was interested in buying around 60 Mirage 2000 aircraft. But it is known that the United States made counterproposals: Indeed, from March 1982 Egypt will start receiving 40 F-16 fighter aircraft (at a rate of 2 per month) and the U.S. Defense Department has offered it the opportunity to buy another 40.

In addition to the delivery of Mirage 2000 aircraft, the negotiations with France relate to the supply of Puma helicopters equipped with AM-39 air-to-surface missiles, to the supply of Milan antitank missiles, which would complement Egypt's purchase of Gazelle helicopters armed with Hot antitank missiles a few years ago. All this equipment, which has already been sold or is being offered to Cairo, was designed by SNIAS.

Egypt is also interested in the possibility of installing French-made electronic equipment (inertial navigation systems for instance) on Soviet-made fighter planes and in the possibility of combining French-designed instruments to aid artillery firing with existing Soviet-made batteries or guns.

Finally, Egypt, which has already bought Crotale air defense missiles and Otomat sea-to-sea missiles, has asked whether its aircraft (Mirage or other types) could be equipped with French missiles or bombs like Super 530 air-to-air missiles, the Durandal weapons for attacking airstrips, and the Beluga dispersion grenade launchers. As regards bombs, it is mainly laser-guided bombs that are involved.

MITTERRAND, KIPRIANOU CONFER ON CYPRUS ISSUE

[Text] Paris, 3 Dec (AFP) -- Visiting Cypriot President Spiros Kiprianou conferred here today with French chief of state Francois Mitterrand on the demilitarization of Cyprus and its links with the European Common Market. Emerging from his talks, Mr Kiprianou said they had [word indistinct] "very constructive." On the demilitarization issue, Mr Kiprianou had indicated recently that he would be asking Mr Mitterrand for support for a plan to demilitarize his island and a conference under the auspices of the United Nations that would [words indistinct] the respect of the new status. Both Britain and Turkey maintain military facilities on Cyprus.

Concerning relations with the EEC, Cyprus is seeking more favorable terms of association notably with regard to its agricultural exports. The reaction to his plea today had been "favorable," Mr Kiprianou said. In reply to questions by newsmen, he voiced guarded optimism that the deadlocked negotiations between his government and representatives of Cyprus's Turkish community would move towards a solution. He said new efforts were underway, adding that [words indistinct] would become clearer in two to three months. Cyprus, he stated, could only survive in an independent state if reunified.

Mr Kiprianou is due to leave here tomorrow (?for) the United States where he is expected to urge President Ronald Reagan to use his influence to obtain more flexibility from Turkey on the Cyprus issue.

PDRY FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS 3 DEC

[Text] Paris, 3 Dec (AFP) -- The foreign minister of South Yemen, Salim Salih Muhammad, arrived here today for a four-day visit during which he will have talks with French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson.

Before leaving Aden Mr Muhammad expressed the hope that he could discuss with French President Francois Mitterrand the "dangerous situation" in the Gulf region created by "the attacks of American imperialism and its constant support for the Zionist enemy." Observers said the question of unifying the two Yemens might also be discussed in Paris following the formation of a "Yemeni Council" composed of the presidents of North and South Yemen.

ALGERIAN GAS AGREEEMENT -- The Elysee has announced the agreement on the price of Algerian gas. The rate should be fixed primarily around 5.30 dollars per thermal unit, but certain technical terms and conditions remain to be settled. Thus Paris would pay for gas at a relatively high price, but in exchange major projects will be entrusted to French firms. [Text] [Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 3 Dec 81 LD]

The German minister stated that the FRG was going to send a mission to Chad and make available DM50 million or more than Fr100 million. [Text] [LE FIGARO in French 2 Dec 81 p 2 PM]

PCP ACCUSES SOARES OF COLLUSION WITH GOVERNMENT

PM031047 Lisbon AVANTE in Portuguese 19 Nov 81 p 2

[Apparent text of PCP information and propaganda section 13 November communique: "Mario Soares, the Constitution and the PCP"]

[Text] The statements made yesterday by Socialist Party Secretary General Mario Soares on leaving a further meeting with Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao justify the following comments:

Dr Mario Soares chose a very bad time to seek once more to teach the PCP lessons about the defense of freedoms. In fact, if there were no precedents -- and they are not lacking -- it would be sufficient, bearing in mind the Socialist Party [PS] secretary general's involvement in and well-known responsibility for the conclusion of the PS agreement with the "Democratic Alliance," which aimed at paving the way for the domination of the armed forces by the "Democratic Alliance" government and by Freitas do Amaral, to conclude that Dr Mario Soares, yesterday as today, is clearly lacking in moral and political authority to teach lessons about the defense of freedoms to a force which, today as yesterday, is struggling tirelessly to safeguard freedom and democracy in Portugal.

Moreover, it is only too clear that Dr Mario Soares, in accusing the PCP of seeking to "block the revision of the constitution," is not only servilely copying statements by Pinto Balsemao but is seeking above all to distract attention and to lull public opinion as regards the real dangers to democracy represented by the PS leadership's cooperation in the realization of the "Democratic Alliance's" plans for concentrating the whole of political and military power in its hands. What Dr Mario Soares cannot bear is that the activity of and denunciation by the PCP and other democratic sectors has thwarted his plan to drape a thick curtain of silence and impunity over his behind the scenes agreements with the "Democratic Alliance" on matters vital to the democratic system. It is clear today that Dr Mario Soares, holding restrictive concepts with respect to the country's democratic life, is indeed visibly annoyed about the development of a broad and politically diversified movement of opinion in defense of the democratic system and the constitution.

Dr Mario Soares' reference to the PCP's use of its broadcasting time on television is also clearly unfortunate. A minimum amount of good sense would have spared him the PCP's reply by reminding him that, whereas the PCP and its leaders are systematically discriminated against in the Portuguese radio-television system's reporting, for some reason the same does not happen to the PS secretary general, who has long found a favorable reception there.

The fact that Dr Mario Soares has once more announced an intensification of his party's "opposition" to the "Democratic Alliance," after conferring with Pinto Balsemao, cannot fail to be regarded as a mere gesture with demagogic intentions, aimed at concealing political realities and courses of a contrary nature. It has not been forgotten that Dr Mario Soares announced some time ago a "fall offensive" against the "Democratic Alliance," although what has marked that "offensive" has been the campaign, in alliance with the right, against the United People's Alliance's democratic administration in the Loures municipal council.

It has not been forgotten that the PS leadership announced a "leftward shift" on 29 October and on that very day concluded an agreement with the "Democratic Alliance" in the committee on the revision of the constitution on the method of appointment of military leaders on the exact lines proposed by Sa Carneiro in 1979 and in the "Democratic Alliance" 1980 election program. In light of previous experience, the suspicion is thus entirely legitimate that whenever Dr Mario Soares announces an "intensification" of opposition to the "Democratic Alliance," this really means that some further step has been taken in his agreements with the "Democratic Alliance."

PSOE'S GONZALEZ ON POLITICAL SCENE, NATO ISSUE

[Thierry Maliniak interview with PSOE Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez in Madrid; date not given]

[Text] Madrid -- In the interview he granted to LE MONDE, Spanish Socialist Workers' Party [PSOE] Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez condemned a "scare campaign" aimed at preventing the PSOE from coming to power in the 1983 elections. "People are trying to suggest that the armed forces are vetoing us," he explained. "Nonetheless it is clear that there is less resistance to a process of social change in the armed forces than in some sections of the civilian rightwing, which advocate a return to the past. The problem is how to prevent these civilians from using the military as tools for a putschist plan, and the present government is failing in that task. The fundamental question is whether there is in this country today, 6 years after Franco's death, a rightwing capable of forgetting the trauma of the Spanish civil war and prepared to take its place in opposition tomorrow should the rules of the democratic game so decide."

As regards the process of Spain's joining NATO, Gonzalez stated: "All indications are that this process will not really be completed by the next election. It is not very likely that integration into the Atlantic alliance's military bodies will be a fait accompli by then. That means we will be able to hold a referendum on this issue if we are elected to government. The ballot will not only relate to membership in the integrated military organization but to membership in the Atlantic pact itself."

Gonzalez, leader of a party which, as opinion polls show, could win a parliamentary election, explained his party's position on NATO membership.

"We are," he said, "totally opposed to joining NATO because we consider that it would not improve Spain's military security in any way. Our defense priorities and our potential sources of conflict are on the southern flank of our territory, around Ceuta and Melilla (Spanish enclaves on the North African coast claimed by Morocco) and Gilbraltar. The strategic interests of Spain, which faces North Africa, do not coincide with those of NATO and may conflict with them. This is an entirely different situation from that of the FRG, for instance, whose defense concerns relate essentially to its eastern flank and hence coincide perfectly with those of the Atlantic alliance."

According to Gonzalez, "the Atlantic pact was signed shortly after the war by the West European countries which were indebted to the United States for its military and economic aid. Spain owes the United States nothing for the struggle against a regime which was, nonetheless, close to nazism, or for inclusion in the Marshall Plan. On the contrary, it owes the United States for the 1953 military pact, which served to break the Franco regime's isolation and to strengthen it for decades. That is why we are skeptical when we are offered integration in a military alliance dominated by the United States as a means of strengthening our democracy."

Gonzalez raised the delicate subject of disagreement on this question with some European "fraternal parties," especially the French PS, "or at least some members of the French Government," as he explained. When visiting Madrid, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson twice stated that he supported Spain's membership in the Atlantic alliance. "It is surprising for a Socialist government which is not part of the NATO integrated military organization to support another government's efforts to join it when the Socialists in the country concerned are opposed to it," he pointed out.

"We understand some of the reasons which motivate this attitude," the PSOE secretary general continued. "It is obvious that the French Government needs to extend its room for maneuver with the United States. To do this it must take very clear stances on the East-West problem, stressing the Soviet threat and supporting anything which increases Western military strength, be it in rearmament or in the sphere of NATO expansion. It is this conciliatory strategy which gives it a free hand to implement a different policy toward the Third World."

Are not most of the European parties belonging to the Socialist International (of which Gonzalez is vice chairman) in favor of keeping their countries in NATO? Our interlocutor stated that in the current "cold war" between East and West he is opposed to anything which would tend to disturb the existing balance between the blocs and create a new motive for tension. "That is why we are as much opposed to Spain's joining NATO as we are to Greece's leaving it," he explained.

On the domestic policy level Felipe Gonzalez justified the moderate strategy followed by his party and approved by a large majority of delegates at the 29th PSOE congress in October. "The problems we have to solve are very different from those facing the French Socialists," he said. "For us the priority is democratization of the state apparatus and not the socialist transformation of society. It is true that a progressive bourgeoisie could accomplish this task, but this does not exist in Spain. The right has now exhausted its reform capacity and can go no further. This explains the present serious crisis in the Union of the Democratic Center (government party).

The PSOE secretary general thinks the Spanish situation is paradoxical, since the abrupt increase in tension over recent weeks is due not to a confrontation between left and right but among conservative circles themselves. "The left is doing all it can to ease political tension, while increasingly large sections of the right are trying to whip them up," he stated. "How can you explain the fact that Spanish employers, who have secured a wage moderation agreement from the trade unions which any other European employer would welcome, are now doing everything possible to cast doubt on it and hence possibly to whip up social tension?"

CALVO-SOTELO TRIP -- Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo will pay an official visit to Equatorial Guinea, probably starting 20 December. The trip will entail the final shoring up of the new Spanish policy of aid to Equatorial Guinea. Calvo-Sotelo may also visit Tunis a few days before his trip to Equatorial Guinea to discuss the political situation in North Africa. [Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 3 Dec 81 LD]

PHILIPPINES FOREIGN MINISTER -- Philippines Minister of Foreign Affairs Carlos Romulo -- who is 82 years old and has been foreign minister for 14 years, a period exceeded only by Gromyko of the Soviet Union -- arrived in Madrid this morning on an official visit. As the old Asian minister said, there is no direct dispute between the Philippines and Spain, although Minister Romulo said the Philippines could now try to buy machinery and technology since the balance of payments between the two countries is unfavorable to Spain by more than $40 million. The minister said President Marcos' successor will not be his beautiful and influential wife, as has often been said, but Minister of Finance Cesar Virata. DETAILS OF TRADE AGREEMENTS WITH USSR REPORTED

[Excerpts] New records were achieved today in Finland's foreign trade with the signing by Finnish and Soviet enterprises of import and export deals totaling 6 billion Finnish markkaa. This is the largest export package ever concluded at one time. Under the agreements Finnish enterprises will export to the Soviet Union products worth 4.5 billion Finnish markkaa.

Soviet Minister of Foreign Trade Nikolay Patolichev and Ahti Karjalainen, chairman of the Economic Cooperation Commission, noted that the concluded agreements put into practice in an excellent way the work done by the authorities of the two countries and the commission for the development of economic relations. We have concluded deals worth almost 1 billion rubles, noted Minister Patolichev. He added that agreements still under discussion, would probably be signed tomorrow and perhaps even on 5 December.

Under the concluded agreements Rauma-Repola, Wartsilae and Valmet will deliver a total of 16 ships to the Soviet Union. The total value of the vessels is 1.9 billion Finnish markkaa.

Ekengren Oy and Huurre-Ureta Oy together with the construction company Tervo Oy concluded agreements totaling 1.1 billion markkaa on the delivery of prefabricated housing to Soviet gas fields and gas pipeline construction sites.

Under today's agreements Finland will import vehicles worth over 1 billion markkaa, over 11,000 cars and over 500 other vehicles. Finland will import nonferrous metals and chemical industry products worth 140 million markkaa. The total value of the chemical industry deal is over 600 million markkaa.

PARLIAMENTARIAN CITED ON USSR SUBMARINE PRESENCE

[FINSKA NOTISBYRAN report: "Soviet Submarines Off Iceland"]

[Text] Reykjavik -- Two nuclear-armed Soviet submarines have been discovered off Iceland's east coast inside Iceland's 200 mile territorial waters, the Reykjavik newspaper ALTHYDUBLADID reported on Monday [30 November].

The paper quoted Social Democratic Althing member Eidur Gidnason, who said that he had received the information from absolutely reliable sources. However, Gudnason declined to reveal them.

ALTHYDUBLADID reported that the Soviet Union chiefly uses Echo and Charlie class submarines in Icelandic waters and that both are nuclear-powered and equipped with nuclear weapons. They are better suited to use as attack ships than as spy submarines, the paper wrote.

The Icelandic Foreign Ministry had no comment to make with regard to the allegations.

In the past U.S. military commanders at the Keflavik base have stated that the number of nuclear-powered Soviet submarines in Icelandic waters has doubled since 1976.

COMMERCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED WITH USSR 3 DEC

NC032200 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 3 Dec 81

[Text] Cyprus and the Soviet Union today signed a commercial agreement and a trade protocol at the Ministry of Commerce and Industry. The trade protocal was signed by Erotokritou, secretary general of the Ministry of Commerce and Industry, on behalf of Cyprus and by Simakov, chief of the administration for trade with Western countries of the Ministry of Foreign Trade on behalf of the Soviet Union.

The trade protocol specifies products and quantities to be purchased by the Soviet Union in 1982. The commercial agreement was signed by Cypriot Minister of Commerce Kittis and the Soviet First Deputy Minister of Foreign Trade Zhuravlev.

In a statement Kittis expressed satisfaction with the outcome of negotiations and appreciation for the understanding and support demonstrated by the Soviet Union toward the commercial policy of the Cyprus Government. "We also appreciate," he added, "the support given to our efforts for a long-term handling of our vine products problem through purchase of increased quantities of Cyprus vine products." Kittis also said the signing of the agreement is practical proof of the interest of the governments of the two countries for further expansion and tightening of their commercial relations.

In his statement Zhuravlev emphasized that the Soviet Union was always in favor of expansion of its relations with Cyprus and added that he would work actively toward expansion of the commercial and economic relations of the two countries. The protocol for the renewal of the commercial agreement, the Soviet official said, confirms the desire of the two countries to continue their commercial relations on a firm and long-term basis. He added that contracts in the amount of $15 million were signed during negotiations between Soviet and Cypriot organizations.

The signing ceremony was attended by Soviet Ambassador Astavin and officials from both sides.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON AKEL-LEBANESE CP TALKS

NC021127 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 2 Dec 81 pp 1, 7

[Excerpts] The leaders of the Lebanese Communist Party [LCP] have reaffirmed their party's full solidarity with the struggle being waged by AKEL and the Cypriot people for the restoration of unity, independence, sovereignty of Cyprus and the withdrawal of all foreign troops and abolition of military bases. This solidarity was affirmed during talks held in Beirut by an AKEL Central Committee delegation composed of AKEL Assistant Secretary General A. Fandis and Dh. Khristofinis, Political Bureau alternate member and head of the AKEL international department. The joint communique issued after the talks in part stresses the unity of the struggle by the Cypriot and Arab people against the common enemy. The full text of the joint communique is as follows:

At the inviation of the LCP, an AKEL delegation visited Lebanon 25-28 November 1981. The delegation was headed by Comrade Andreas Fandis, AKEL assistant secretary general, and included Comrade Dhonis Khristofinis, alternate member of the Political Bureau and head of the AKEL Central Committee's international department.

The AKEL delegation was received by LCP Secretary General George Hawi. LCP Chairman Comrade Nicola ash-Shawi gave a dinner in honor of the AKEL delegation which was attended by members of the LCP Political Bureau and Central Committee.

The delegation also visited the central political council of the Lebanese National Movement, where they were received by Comrade Muhsin Ibrahim, executive secretary general of the council and other members of the National Movement. The delegation also met with Comrade Tariq Shihab, deputy chairman of the Lebanese Progressive Socialist Party, and Fu'ad Salian, secretary general of the party.

The delegation met with Abu Iyad [Salah Khalaf], member of the Central Committee of the Palestinian Liberation Movement (Fatah); Nayif Hawatimah, secretary general of the PFLP; and Abu 'Ali Mustafa, assistant secretary general of the PFLP.

During the visit, talks were held between the AKEL delegation and the LCP. The talks were attended by Comrade Nadim 'Abd as-Samad, Political Bureau member and Central Committee secretary; Karim Muruwah, Political Bureau member; Milhim Abu Rizq, Central Committee member, and Fikri Farhud of the Central Committee international relations department. At the talks, which were held in a warm and comradely atmosphere, there was an exchange of views on recent regional and world developments. Particular attention was attached to developments in Cyprus and Lebanon as well as to ways of strengthening and consolidating the comradely relations between AKEL and the LCP.

The Lebanese side highly appreciated AKEL's support for the Lebanese National Movement, the Palestinian revolution and all the other Arab forces of steadfast confrontation. It also reaffirmed the LCP's full solidarity with the struggle being waged by AKEL and the Cypriot people for restoration of the unity, independence and sovereignty of Cyprus, the withdrawal of all foreign troops, abolition of all military bases, implementation of the UN resolutions on Cyprus and the thwarting of all plots being concocted by U.S. imperialism and other NATO circles. These conspiracies are at the same time directed against Cyprus and against the progressive forces and all other national liberation forces in the area.

The two sides denounced the U.S. military maneuvers held in the area with the aim of intimidating and terrorizing the Arab, Cypriot and other people in the area.

The two sides also denounced the adventurous, aggressive course being followed by U.S. imperialism through the policy of the arms race, expansion and intensification of its direct military presence throughout the world, establishment of aggressive military blocs, production of the neutron bomb and propagandizing a limited nuclear war.

The two sides welcomed the Soviet leadership's initiatives, which aim at defending world peace and supporting all peoples' struggles for liberation and which oppose any attempt by U.S. imperialism to impose its hegemony over the whole world.

The AKEL delegation expressed thanks for the warm hospitality and invited an LCP delegation to attend the 15th AKEL congress to be held in May 1982. The invitation was accepted with pleasure. The two sides decided that their parties would exchange delegations every year.

Beirut, 28 November 1981.

Meets Luns, Thorn 3 Dec

NC031852 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1800 GMT 3 Dec 81

[Text] President Karamanlis is returning tonight to Athens from Brussels after concluding his 3-day official visit to Belgium. In the morning Mr Karamanlis met with NATO Secretary General Luns. Present at the meeting were Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos and Ambassador Moliviatis, secretary general of the Presidency. After the meeting, Mr Luns answered questions by ERT correspondent Apostolos Apostolopoulos:

[Begin Luns recording, in English with superimposed Greek translation] Let me say that I have known Mr Karamanlis for 25 years. Although he has remained young, I am now older and I have had very friendly relations with the present president of your country. [Words indistinct] visit was a courtesy call. Since the president of Greece, whom I know very well, is in Brussels, it was natural to request that I be received for a while. This was a friendly talk, and I was asked whether I and the alliance were aware that there are problems between Greece and the alliance -- not direct but indirect problems -- and I answered "yes." And I hope that during the next few days, when the defense ministers, and in fact the new Greek prime minister, Mr Papandreou, and the foreign ministers meet here, we shall be able to be of some assistance behind the scenes. I am not one who can impose a solution; I am an employee of 15 states, but I shall do everything I can, and I am pleased with President Karamanlis' friendly reception. [end recording]

After his meeting with Mr Luns, the president met with Mr Thorn, chairman of the EEC Executive Committee. Present at this meeting were Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos and Ambassador Moliviatis. After the meeting Mr Thorn, answering a question by an ERT correspondent on the situation following the London conference, said:

[Begin Thorn recording, in French with superimposed Greek translation] There have been many developments since our meeting last Friday; that is, the conference was not as successful as we expected, but it did not fail, as we feared it would. We can say this meeting took place so we could become aware of the importance of problems and arrive, I hope, at a solution. [end recording]

Further on, Mr Thorn admitted that there are four points right within the heart of the problems of the community that have been awaiting solutions. He mentioned in this connection the problem of Mediterranean products, which, he said, was raised by the prime minister [word indistinct]. The entire Greek problem, added Mr Thorn, might be easier to settle when it is examined within the framework of the community's regulations. He added: We are at Prime Minister Papandreou's disposal when he has made an analysis of the problem. (?This will be done), he said, among friends, and we shall see to what point we can go to solve the Greek problem within the community. I hope we (?will achieve this).

He said Turkey is taking care to be an element of peace and stability in the region and to follow a policy based on close and mutual interests with its neighbors and that it never deviates from Ataturk's "peace at home, peace in the world" principle. Bayulken continued: While following this policy, we are aware that an economically and militarily strong Turkey is very important for itself and for its allies, from the viewpoint of contributing to the enhancement of peace, cooperation and stability in the region, on the one hand, and in creating a deterrent factor against possible aggressive goals. Turkey will welcome its friends' contribution for an economically and militarily strong Turkey.

ECEVIT SPEAKS TO PRESS ON PRISON SENTENCE

[Text] Ankara, 3 Dec (AFP) -- Former Social Democratic Premier Bulent Ecevit today started a short prison sentence for giving a statement to foreign press critical of Turkey's military ruler General Kenan Evren. Last month the state of siege tribunal here found him guilty of breaking the law which bans all political declarations and activities. He was given a four-month sentence, but is likely to be given a remittance for good conduct and serve only two months and 20 days. Mr Ecevit was the head of the People's Republican Party which has been dissolved together with all other political parties.

In his press statement, he urged General Evren to explain the reason for this party ban. He reported to the prosecutor's office today and went to Ankara's civilian prison accompanied by about 50 supporters. Earlier, Mr Ecevit said at a press conference outside his home on the outskirts of Ankara he felt "no sense of guilt" and he preferred to be "a free prisoner rather than a man at large living like a prisoner."

About 300 sympathisers had gathered outside his home, chanting the "Ecevit-populist" election slogan and offering him flowers. "One always has to pay for freedom," he said, "and I am now paying a very moderate price."

Interviewed by a U.S. television team covering the visit of U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, Mr Ecevit said: "The link between the two nations is democracy. If that link with democracy is broken, our relations will no longer be based on solid foundations."

Mr Ecevit initially asked to serve his term in the prison at the southern coastal resort of Datcai, for health reasons. He then changed his mind so he could appear as defendant at two more trials in Ankara.

ULUSU TO HEAD CYPRUS COUNCIL; SECRETARIAT FORMED

NC040906 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 1 Dec 81 p 3

[Bulent Erandac report]

[Text] Ankara -- It has been decided to set up a new high-level organization to undertake a more effective national and international assessment of the Cyprus issue in the light of the extremely complicated economic, financial and political dimensions it has assumed. On the instructions of the National Security Council, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu will become chairman of the Cyprus Coordinating Council. The number of council members will be increased and a "Cyprus Affairs Secretariat" is to be formed at the prime minister's office.

The decree, which is being drafted in the sense that "Turkey is setting up the largest organization so that it may attach greater importance to Cyprus," has been approved by the Council of Ministers. According to this new decree, Deputy Prime Minister Zeyyat Baykara has been relieved of his chairmanship of the Cyprus Coordinating Council. It has been deemed appropriate that this chairmanship will be taken over by Prime Minister Ulusu.

The other members of the council, which will ensure the early adoption of important decisions concerning Cyprus, are Deputy Prime Ministers Zeyyat Baykara and Turgut Ozal, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken, Finance Minister Kaya Erdem, Commerce Minister Kemal Canturk, Public Works Minister Tahsin Onalp, Industry and Technology Minister Sahap Kocatopcu, Transportation Minister Necmi Ozgur and Energy and Natural Resources Minister Serbulent Bingol.

A secretariat will be set up at the prime minister's office for the first time, to be known as the "Cyprus Affairs Secretariat." This organization will be charged with the task of collecting reports on economic, financial, political and cultural matters, will act as coordinator among the various ministries, will watch international conferences very closely and will perform the duties of a secretary general for the Cyprus Coordinating Council.

A branch of the Cyprus Affairs Secretariat will be the "Turkish Aid Committee" already operating in the Turkish Cypriot sector, where economic and financial aid to be extended to the Turkish Cypriot side will be planned and joint projects will be prepared. The economic and financial strength of the aid committee will be continually increased.

While setting up new high-level organizations in Turkey in connection with Cyprus, Turkey is also increasing economic aid. Six billion liras worth of economic aid is to be extended to the TFSC in 1982.

GOVERNMENT WINS CONFIDENCE VOTE ON EXPENDITURES

AU040843 Rome ANSA in English 0836 GMT 4 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Rome, 4 Dec (ANSA) -- The confidence vote called by the Italian Government to avoid the approval of motions which would have upped expenditures in the 1982 state budget to the tune of two and a half billion dollars in aid for Third World nations resulted in a firm victory for the present coalition in voting which took place in the lower house late last night. The voting tallies were 338 in favor and 233 against.

The vote was called for in the Chamber of Deputies on Thursday after two days of debating over the resolution fixing the Italian contribution to the developing world in 1982 at 1,700 billion lire, equal to 0.17 percent of the gross national product.

This resolution, submitted by the coalition consisting of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals and Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini's Republican Party, was countered by another motion sponsored by the tiny Radical Party calling for a contribution of 0.70 percent of the GNP.

Because that motion threatened to gain wide support within the Parliament, the government called for a confidence vote, which, when successful, enables a resolution it is attached to, to pass automatically without any additional amendments or motions.

SCHMIDT CITED ON GDR VISIT, U.S.-SOVIET TALKS

[Text] Bremerhaven, 5 Dec (DPA) -- In the opinion of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, hope and optimism for the future are quite justified. At the Bremen Land SPD conference in Bremerhaven today, Schmidt said: "The arms race has not been abolished, but talks have begun between East and West." This is reason for hope. The optimistic idea "that we can do something" must be spread throughout the country in order to reduce fear.

Schmidt said the aim for his forthcoming talks with GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker is to overcome the era of setbacks in relations between the two German states. Schmidt said he believes that on the question of peace, the union politicians Helmut Kohl and Franz-Josef Strauss do not have a monopoly on the issue. "Eighty percent of citizens are for the continuation of the policy of detente toward the Soviet Union and other East European states," he said. "This encourages me."

Schmidt described the balance of military forces as the only correct way. He warned of the danger of making light of this balance, as some intellectuals in the SPD do, and said that it is unthinkable that the United States and the Soviet Union would possibly conclude a treaty of imbalance. Admittedly, balance alone has not yet guaranteed peace, but it does bring about the possibility of civilized dealings with each other.

No Treaties To Be Concluded

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 5 Dec (DPA) -- In anticipation of his meeting with GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker next week, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has once again made it clear that no treaties will be concluded at this first summit for over 10 years between the leading politicians in the two parts of Germany. "We are going into the GDR without any preconditions," Schmidt said on Saturday at a party conference of the Bremen SPD in Bremerhaven. In his words, it is a matter of overcoming the phase of setbacks in relations between the two German states. Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher's thesis would thus be confirmed -- German policy is to be seen as a component of the European peace policy.

Urges FRG-GDR Role in Geneva

[Text] Hamburg, 5 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt wants to urge GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker at the forthcoming intra-German summit to agree to a stronger involvement of the two German states in the disarmament dialogue. DER SPIEGEL reports this in its latest edition.

Because of their "special responsibility" for the stabilization of East-West relations, Bonn and East Berlin should, in the view of the chancellor, urge their allies in NATO and the Warsaw Pact to adopt a "code of trust." The goals to be pursued within the framework of this code of principles and to be recognized on an international basis are an approximate balance of and mutual briefings on troop strength and arms and also confidence building measures, such as advance notification of maneuvers.

Kohl Comments

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 5 Dec (DPA) -- In the view of opposition leader Helmut Kohl, in his meeting with GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker, Federal Chancellor Schmidt must "not make the mistake" of seeing this visit as a sort of followup meeting to the Bonn visit of Leonid Brezhnev "and of talking for the most part about missiles." Kohl stressed in an interview with the BERLINER MORGENPOST (Sunday edition) that "one must concentrate above all on intra-German problems." As Kohl went on to say, in the opinion of the CDU/CSU there should "only be" new agreements with the GDR -- including in the "swing" (overdraft facilities in intra-German trade) -- "if the raising of the compulsory exchange sum is to be withdrawn in such a way that the level of visits between the two Germanies can return to what it was before."

Deputies Propose Topics

[Excerpts] Bonn, 5 Dec (DPA) -- In the opinion of Karsten Voigt, foreign policy spokesman of the SPD Bundestag group, chemical weapons stockpiled in the Federal Republic and GDR should be included in the disarmament discussion during the impending meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and GDR Council of State Chairman Erich Honecker. In an interview on Radio Bremen today, Voigt justified his demand by pointing out that although the two German states have no powers of disposition concerning these arms, they would nevertheless be affected by them if used.

Peter Lorenz, the spokesman on the German national question [Deutschlandpolitik] for the CDU/CSU Bundestag group, in an interview with Radio Bremen, asked that humanitarian demands vis-a-vis the GDR be tied to economic questions. Thus, in exchange for an extension of the overdraft facilities in intra-German trade, the so-called "swing," the GDR should be asked to rescind the compulsory currency exchanges. In addition, better arrangements should be made for family reunifications, and working conditions for West German journalists should be realigned in accordance with contractual terms.

WEEKLY REPORTS CURRENCY AGREEMENT WITH GDR

[Excerpts] Hamburg, 5 Dec (DPA) -- According to BILD AM SONNTAG, Bonn and East Berlin have already agreed, prior to the meeting between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker next week, for a reduction in the minimum amount of currency to be exchanged on trips by Western visitors to the GDR.

The paper, quoting Bonn government circles, reports in its latest edition that the compulsory exchange is to be either dropped completely or drastically cut for pensioners, invalids and young people. For all other travelers to the GDR from the Federal Republic and West Berlin the rate is to be reduced from 25 to 20 marks a day. According to BILD AM SONNTAG, this result as the outcome of talks between Schmidt and Honecker will be announced "in the next few weeks and months."

The compulsory minimum exchange for visitors to the GDR from the West was almost doubled on 13 October, 1980.

According to the paper, Bonn and East Berlin have also agreed in advance of the Schmidt-Honecker talks -- due to begin on 11 December -- that in future regular meetings are to take place between representatives of the two German states at the highest level. Honecker intends to visit the Federal Republic next year.

According to BILD AM SONNTAG, the reason for the GDR's willingness to make concessions, as explained by Bonn government circles, is that East Berlin is doing everything possible to prevent Schmidt's visit being called off once again. The paper quotes a source close to the chancellor as saying: "East Berlin is afraid that shortages in Poland might cause unrest during the coming winter and that the visit would then have to be postponed again." It was because of developments in Poland that Schmidt's visit to the GDR planned for last summer was canceled.

The article in BILD AM SONNTAG was prereleased to DPA in the form of a news report.

Federal Minister for Intra-German Affairs Egon Franke has described the report in BILD AM SONNTAG about an agreement with East Berlin on a reduction of the minimum amount of currency to be exchanged by visitors to the GDR as "pure fiction." Franke said in reply to an enquiry that up to now there have been no agreements of any kind with the GDR, "otherwise we wouldn't need to go there."

ITINERARY FOR SCHMIDT VISIT TO GDR ANNOUNCED

[Text] Bonn, 4 Dec (DPA) -- During his visit to the GDR from Friday to Sunday next week, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will meet GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker alone five times for talks. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker announced the itinerary today for this first intra-German summit on German soil between the two politicians. The meeting is to take place on Lake Werbellin in the March of Brandenburg, north of Berlin.

Becker announced the new details that at the conclusion of the chancellor's visit on Sunday afternoon, Honecker will accompany the chancellor on a visit to the Mecklenburg town of Guestrow. Before this visit the chancellor will give a press conference on Lake Werbellin. In Guestrow, where the chancellor will have the opportunity for contacts with the GDR population, Schmidt and Honecker will cross the market square together.

About noon on Friday the chancellor and his delegation will fly from Bonn to the GDR's Schoenefeld airport near East Berlin in a federal air force Boeing 707 and will be welcomed there without military ceremony by Honecker. Afterwards, they will drive together by car to the Hubertusstock hunting lodge, where Schmidt and his delegation are to reside. According to Becker, no military ceremony is planned on their arrival there either.

The major part of the talks will not be held in the Hubertusstock lodge in the GDR State Council's guest residence on Lake Doelln -- about 15 kilometers northwest of Lake Werbellin. The scene of the talks in the Schorfheide region has been strictly sealed off from the outside world so that Schmidt, apart from his visit to Guestrow, will scarcely come into contact with GDR people.

Becker confirmed today following talks in East Berlin and Lake Werbellin yesterday by Minister Gunter Huonker of the chancellor's office that there is no firm agenda for the talks and the main topics for discussion have not been agreed to as yet. The main topics are thought to be intra-German relations, including the question of improving contacts between the people, the international situation with emphasis on the policy of disarmament, and the expansion of economic relations between the two German states.

In reply to questions, Becker stressed that the GDR has handled the bringing together of families very generously since the beginning of this year. Alluding to the GDR's promise to allow about 3,000 people to leave for the Federal Republic following the recent exchange of agents involving Guenter Guillaume, the spy in the chancellor's office, Becker said this practice by the GDR has once again received a new "boost" as a result of this action.

Schmidt will be accompanied by Federal Ministers Egon Franke (intra-German relations) and Otto Graf Lambsdorff (economics), Huonker, as well as State Secretaries Dieter von Wuerzen (economics), Becker, and Klaus Boelling, Bonn's permanent representative in East Berlin. Becker did not announce today who, apart from Honecker, would be in the GDR delegation in the talks with the Federal Government, because the GDR wants to make the announcement.

BREMEN SOCIAL DEMOCRATS OPPOSE CRUISE MISSILES

[Text] Bremerhaven, 5 Dec (DPA) -- The Social Democrats of Bremen have come out against the stationing of nuclear medium-range weapons such as cruise missiles and Pershing II's in West Europe and for an immediate stop to preparations for their introduction. Nor should any new SS-20 missiles be deployed in East Europe and the weapons of this type already installed should be withdrawn, it was resolved by a party conference in Bremerhaven tonight in a resolution on peace and security policy passed at the end of the conference. An additional resolution on the express withdrawal of the counterarming part of the NATO dual decision was rejected however.

BERLIN FDP OPPOSES GOVERNMENT'S SECURITY POLICY

[Excerpt] Berlin, 4 Dec (DPA) -- The Berlin FDP has taken an opposing line in security policy to that of the social-liberal government. A Land party conference passed by a large majority on Friday night a resolution which fundamentally rejects the stationing of American medium-range weapons -- Pershing II, cruise missiles and the neutron bomb. This resolution is included in the draft submitted by the Land Executive at the suggestion of the Young Democrats. The resolution goes on to say that the aim of liberal policy is the abolition of all nuclear weapons in Europe.

YOUNG DEMOCRATS DEMAND HALT TO ARMS DEVELOPMENT

[Text] Bonn/Gummersbach, 5 Dec (DPA) -- A "calculated stop to the development and production of arms systems in which NATO has a technological advance of several years," has been demanded by the German Young Democrats. At an international meeting of liberal youth and student federations held this weekend in Gummersbach, Werner Lutz, chairman of the Young Democrats, said that in this way the will to disarm by one side could be stressed and that of the other side be confirmed. Production and deployment of the Soviet SS-20 medium-range missiles were not the cause but the excuse for the production and deployment of the American medium-range Pershing II and cruise missiles, since both arms systems had been developed before the West learned about the SS-20.

HAMBURG ANTIMISSILE RALLY ATTRACTS 10,000

LD051528 Hamburg DPA in German 1413 GMT 5 Dec 81

[Text] Hamburg, 5 Dec (DPA) -- Thousands demonstrated in Hamburg today against the deployment of new American medium-range missiles in West Europe. The rally was attended by about 10,000 people, police said. The organizers claimed that about 20,000 people took part. The peace march, organized by a "Hamburg Forum", was held under the slogan: "Nuclear death threatens us all! No new nuclear missiles in Europe!" The demonstrators carried slogans such as "Never again war", "No to armament" and "Bonbons instead of bombs."

CDU LEADER APPEALS TO BREZHNEV FOR SAKHAROV

[Text] Bonn/Berlin, 4 Dec (DPA) -- CDU Secretary General Heiner Geissler has sent a letter to Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev in support of Nobel prize winner Andrey Sakharov. Sakharov, who has been sent to exile in Gorki, is on a hunger strike to press for permission for his daughter-in-law to leave the Soviet Union. In the letter, published in Bonn today, Geissler appeals to Brezhnev to issue an exit visa. The politician recalls the Helsinki Final Act in which the Soviet Union undertook to examine wishes for bringing families together in a positive and humanitarian spirit.

In a telegram to the Soviet ambassador in Bonn, nine university lecturers of the Free University Berlin also call for an exit visa to be granted to Sakharov's daughter-in-law. They are extremely concerned that Sakharov's health and life might be endangered by the the hunger strike, said professors Agnoli, Albrecht, Eberhard, Ebert, Flechtheim, Narr, Pross, Vilmar and Wilke, in the message published in Berlin today. They too recalled the commitments the Soviet Government undertook in Helsinki.

DIE WELT: EUROPEANS YIELD TO PEACE MOVEMENT

[August Graf Kegeneck commentary: "Forum for Reasoning"]

Influential men in the new French Government, including the premier and the foreign minister, have urgently called on their neighbors to think about Europe's security. A socialist deputy in Paris advanced concrete proposals concerning the organization of a European defense, without combining this with a call for an end to NATO. Actually these proposals are as old as the North Atlantic alliance. A suitable forum for discussing such thoughts would have been the assembly of parliamentarians of the West European Union which convened in Paris last week.

But this meeting passed without even one inch of progress. For fear of inciting the peace movement even more, the delegates did not even dare discuss the neutron bomb as an essential element of security against superior numbers of Soviet armor. Thus the idea of an autonomous European defense will remain wishful thinking which does not seem to fit into reality.

Marchais Comments

[Text] Paris, 6 Dec (AFP) -- The leader of the French Communist Party (PCF), Georges Marchais, said today that the Soviet Union should allow Soviet dissident Andrey Sakharov's daughter-in-law Lisa Alekseyeva to join her husband in the United States.

If the Soviets have "an important reason for not allowing her to leave they should tell us," Mr Marchais said during an interview on French television. Mr Marchais stressed that the PCF has "always supported the free movement of men and ideas," and that the Helsinki accords must be upheld. He said he regretted the amount of attention being paid to the incident since abuses in El Salvador and Turkey did not elicit the same response. "All this attention is no accident," he added, "it comes just when the U.S., thanks to public pressure, is forced to renew arms talks with the Soviets."

DEFFERRE INTERVIEWED ON TERRORIST THREATS

[Report on Didier Lecat interview with Interior Minister Gaston Defferre on 3 December at the Ministry of the Interior -- recorded]

[Excerpt] According to reports that there have been threats accompanied by bullets through the mail to two Socialist deputies; letters of intimidation addressed to others, it seems, ministers surrounded by extra protection measures, many rumors regarding the security service, particularly around the head of state, such news in the last few days which makes us think there is no smoke without fire. To know more, I went last night to the Ministry of the Interior to ask Minister Gaston Defferre what he knows about all this:

[Begin recording] [Question] Must one take seriously all these threats against politicians and in particular those against the two Socialist deputies, Minister? Are these reports and facts still to be checked out? And where does this all stem from?

[Question] Mr Defferre, one wonders about the origin of all these rumors lately, all the threats. In your view there is no doubt, it is the extreme right and Action Directe, is it not so?

[Answer] [Words indistinct] Action Directe. I said extreme right and extreme left. There is also an extreme left network which has been brought into daylight and which is linked with Italy. One has the feeling that certain media, part of the public opinion, are trying to create a feeling of anxiety. The government officials are calm, are keeping their cool little by little one sees fading into oblivion an attack which seemed considerable and could have had enormous consequences.

[Question] Mr Defferre, you saw these threats as very closely linked with your political action. You think it is a reaction against you. Does this confirm somewhat all the noise and rumors regarding the fear at the Elysee for example, the fear of seeing a situation in France similar to the Chile type?

[Answer] The comparison is totally out of place. In reality, it is not based on any objective fact. I knew Chile and I knew Allende. The situations of the two countries have nothing in common. [passage indistinct] It is not the case in France. On the international level, France is currently playing a greater role than ever. Francois Mitterand has proved to be a president of the republic of a particularly important caliber and who is already not only respected by also admired by all. As to internal policy, the fact of putting into practice everything that was promised, that is for example, the decentralization and the nationalization does not please everybody. Each finds a particular way of expressing himself. The extreme right groups have their methods. This does not bother the security or the solidity of the regime at all.

[Question] Two questions, Minister: First did you or did you not order the reinforcement of security measures surrounding the president of the republic; second, in a more general way, as seen in police reports and according to those who inform you, is there currently an increased feeling of insecurity in France?

[Answer] No, I did not order the reinforcement of security measures surrounding the president of the republic. From the very beginning I have done my best as minister of the interior to ensure his security, but there have been no new facts in this respect. You asked me a second question on the [word indistinct] reports, on the police reports. Well, I can tell you that on the contrary, we are traversing a period which, if we refer to political security, is more safe, more calm and quiet than we have experienced in the past. And what is happening currently at the De Broglie trial reveals the state of things a few months or a few years ago. Make a comparison, [words indistinct] this comparison is entirely to our advantage. [end recording]

MARCHAIS APPRAISES FIRST MONTHS OF SOCIALISTS

[Text] The Central Committee of the French Communist Party [PCF] is meeting at the glass building located at Place du Colonel Fabien in Paris. The PCF leadership, which is actively preparing for the 24th PCF congress today listened to the report of its secretary general, Georges Marchais. Jean-Paul Bonami is looking at the report, which is a voluminous 40 pages.

[Begin Bonami recording] Georges Marchais has drawn up a positive balance sheet of the left-wing team's first months in power. The secretary general of the PCF explained that all of the acts passed so far -- from the wealth tax to the abrogation of the anti-thug law, to mention only two -- were included in the Communist program, in the 101 propositions, and that consequently they could only approve them.

With regard to reforms still to come -- nationalizations, decentralization and tax reform, for example -- Georges Marchais attacked the employers and their economic, financial, political, and ideological pressures that are aimed at stalemating the process. He added that everything is put to use in an attempt to thwart government policy or to deflect it in the direction of a social-democratic orientation for handling the crisis. Adding the words "social-democratic" to "employers" is the way in which the PCF can show their attitude both on the question of the rate at which change is to be made and on the pause in the reforms -- and thus indirectly reply to Jacques Delors.

According to their leader, the Communists still have plenty of work to do and an essential part to play before France can be a true socialist society. Despite the good marks awarded, music is made not only to be printed on music sheets, but to be played. [end recording]

NAR TERRORISTS CLAIM KILLING POLICEMAN SUNDAY

[Text] Rome, 7 Dec (ANSA) -- The neofascist terrorist group Nuclei Armati Revoluzionari (NAR) has claimed responsibility for the Sunday slaying of a Carabinieri policeman in Rome. Twenty-four hours earlier, a twenty-one-year-old NAR terrorist suspect was shot to death during an exchange of fire with three public security police agents on routine patrol on the outskirts of the capital.

The shooting which led to the killing of the Carabinieri military policeman Sunday began when one of two young men, still unidentified, opened fire on two agents walking toward where they were sitting on a bench in a residential area for a routine check of identity documents. The terrorist gunman made a getaway after firing the shots which killed agent Romano Radice, and his companion fled in the opposite direction with the other police agent in hot pursuit. After firing at the escaping terrorist, the [words indistinct] joined by two public security police patrolling the area in an unmarked car.

The Carabinieri agent and the two public security policeman reportedly emptied their weapons firing at the fleeing terrorist who then dropped one of the handguns he was carrying, began shooting with another weapon and made his escape. One of the public security policemen was wounded in this exchange of fire. The terrorist suspect killed Saturday was identified as Alessandro Alibrandi, the son of Rome magistrate Antonio Alibrandi. The NAR activist had been sought by police since September 1980 when arrest warrents were signed for his capture in connection with a series of armed robberies, homicides and the August 1980 Bologna railway station bombing which killed 85 people.

EANES ASSESSES RELATIONS WITH AFRICAN STATES

LD061730 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1300 GMT 6 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Having concluded a trip to three southern African countries, I cannot fail to make a bief assessment of the significance of these visits and of the results achieved. The democratic self-expression of Portugal cannot be dissociated from the process of emancipation which, by giving freedom back to the Portuguese, made the independence of the colonial territories possible. This democratic self-expression is also inseparable from a foreign policy which both in theory and in practice must be strictly guided by the principles of mutual respect between states, noninterference in each other's internal affairs, the peoples' right to self-determination and independence and mutually advantageous cooperation.

This is the political line we have pursued at the international level since 1976, despite a few superfluous arguments caused by domestic political developments. This is the practice which paved the way, only a few years after the independence of the Portuguese-speaking African countries -- a necessarily traumatic process, the effects of which always leave their marks on peoples -- for the establishment of correct relations between Portugal and Cape Verde, Guinea, Sao Tome and Principe, Angola and Mozambique based on a mutual respect for each other's sovereignty. This is also the policy which made possible the normalization of relations between Portugal and the African countries in general and allowed for the establishment with Africa of relations defined by historic ties, determined by our European option and required by the real interests of the Portuguese people. I consider that the objectives of these three visits have been achieved, taking into account the specific nature of each one of them.

We discussed all issues without complexes of restrictions of any kind, seeking a meeting of ideas and opening the doors to sound cooperation which, while necessary to the peoples with which we cooperate, will be no less necessary to the Portuguese people since it constitutes an important factor for the recovery of our economy and the assertion of the Portuguese state abroad. I am convinced that it will now be easier to solve, in the same spirit of mutual understanding, any difficulty that may arise in the development of our relations with those countries.

In Presidents Kaunda and Nyerere, we found the African leaders whose lucidity and experience we have learned to respect. It was possible to reaffirm with them our mutual desire for close cooperation and define the areas where such cooperation can be intensified. We also discussed major international issues and had the opportunity to (?assess) the existence of identical concerns and the convergence of viewpoints with regard to many of the problems discussed. Both of them reiterated the need for closer links between Europe and Africa and the role which our country -- considering the exemplary nature of its relations with the newly-independent African countries, its knowledge and accumulated experience and its economic and technical know-how -- might play in a dialogue and cooperation between two continents, thus enhancing the international standing of each of them.

We also confirmed the correctness of our resolve to contribute, within our possibilities, to the search for just and negotiated solutions to the problems which have prevented the countries in southern Africa from benefiting from the peace and stability indispensable for development and socioeconomic progress.

The Portuguese [words indistinct] me to single out, in this brief assessment, our visit to Mozambique, given its particular significance in the context of relations between states.

We met with a truly friendly welcome on the part of the Mozambique authorities and people and a total openness to frank discussion, without any complexes, of our relationship as independent and sovereign states. We have turned a page in our history, and we did it without any (?reservations), assuming our past without abjuring anything, but also without forgeting the political reality of two distinct sovereignties and of two forms of national self-expression. The Mozambique authorities have shown, and have reiterated, their desire to cooperate with Portugal, and important sectors where this cooperation can develop have already been identified. I believe, therefore, that the way is now paved for close cooperation in the most varied spheres with all the undeniable advantages which this will bring to both peoples.

FRG'S LAMBSDORFF INTERVIEWED ON TRADE RELATIONS

[Unattributed interview with FRG Minister of Economics Otto Lambsdorff: "Greater Portuguese Aggressiveness Necessary To Penetrate FRG Market" -- date and place of interview not given]

[Text] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: You are going to take part in a seminar in Lisbon, with a view to a possible increase in FRG investments in Portugal. Our country already occupies an intermediate position on the list of FRG private investments in Europe. But an FRG publication which appeared at the beginning of this year stated that these investments could be higher if the "compensation problem" had been resolved. Has or has not this problem been solved?

Otto Lambsdorff: I am pleased to be able to take part in the conference on FRG investment in Portugal. The time is indeed favorable for a strengthening of economic cooperation at the private level between our two countries. FRG private investments in Portugal are by no means insignificant. However, they are not in keeping with the FRG's position as a trading partner of Portugal and as the economically most powerful EEC member. Above all, it should be noted that over the last few years virtually no new FRG private investments have occurred in Portugal, and this can be attributed to investors' uncertainty in light of failure to resolve cases concerning the matters still in dispute. In this connection all sides have striven to follow the most correct procedure, and we proceed from the principle that it will be possible to find together the necessary negotiated solutions.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do the special additional guarantees given to your businessmen in accordance with an agreement signed between the two governments satisfy the FRG businessmen or not?

Lambsdorff: The agreement on the encouragement of investment between our two countries will soon be able to enter into force. With it, mutual investments will be protected. The FRG will thus be in a position to encourage FRG investments in Portugal by granting state guarantees, extending credits with reduced interest rates to small and medium enterprises, and also through the participation of the German Foundation for Development [Sociedade Alema Para o Desenvolvimento].

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: About 150 FRG firms have interests in Portugal. However, their investments are centered virtually on half a dozen sectors (oil refining, electrical engineering, tourism and the hotel trade and so forth). In what areas could the boosting of those investments be extended and developed?

Lambsdorff: The decision rests not with the Federal Government but with the investors. Traditionally, there are certain sectors which are particularly active at the level of foreign investments. This also applies to Portugal. However, experience demonstrates that the more advanced the industrialization of a country is and the closer the economic cooperation between two countries is, then the broader the range of sectors likely to receive foreign investments.

Greater Balance in Trade

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In the area of trade, the FRG has become Portugal's foremost supplier and second largest purchaser. The trade has been characterized by a balance of trade extremely disadvantageous for Portugal (the export/import coverage ratio is about 40 percent). How are we to develop trade and at the same time not worsen the unfavorable balance at issue?

Lambsdorff: Clearly, this did not happen overnight. Portugal's balance of trade deficit with the FRG is essentially of a structural nature. In general, the FRG can satisfy the demand for high technology products. The Portuguese economy -- and hence its exports also -- needs to achieve greater diversification. Thus among our exports, machinery and equipment and electronic and chemical products occupy a top position, while in the case of Portugal textiles still constitute the most important export product. And machinery and electronic equipment only come after wood, cork, foodstuffs and beverages.

I have no doubt that Portugal will achieve a greater diversification of its supply as it develops. In that connection direct foreign investments could make an important contribution. I hope that the FRG investment conference will give a new impetus to that end. Portugal's supply of goods is competitive as far as prices are concerned. By this I mean that the Portuguese can strengthen their presence in the FRG market by setting up subsidiaries. Our market is large, but competition is tough. The Portuguese economy should demonstrate its capabilities on the spot, establishing direct contacts with trading partners in the FRG. It could also enhance its ability to penetrate the FRG market through more intensive research. Last, we should not look solely at the trade in goods. Over 50 percent of your trade deficit is normally covered by the net income from tourism and remittances from the emigrants in the FRG. However, I believe that a greater balance should be sought in the trade in goods, and specifically as far as your exports are concerned.

EEC Membership: "Difficult Negotiations"

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: The FRG has consistently supported Portugal's negotiations on joining the EEC. However, other member states are now proving to be reticent about the customs union dossier, especially because of textiles. What is the FRG Government's stance on the matter? How does it believe the obstacle should be surmounted?

Lambsdorff: The results already achieved in the membership negotiations should not be underestimated. This also applies to the customs union dossier, on which considerable progress has already been achieved. However, it is a fact that issues -- such as, for instance, that of textiles -- of extreme importance for Portugal persist in that dossier. I believe that the FRG Government has displayed understanding as regards Portuguese apprehensions concerning that sensitive industrial sector inasmuch as it very early declared itself in favor of a greater opening of the EEC market to Portuguese textile products. It was not easy for us to make that decision -- if for no other reason, because of the considerable increase which has occurred in exports of Portuguese textiles and clothing to the FRG during the period of validity of the textile agreement between Portugal and the EEC. As for what the outcome of the negotiations will be, it seems to me still too early to make conjectures. The negotiations will remain difficult for both sides.

CALVO-SOTELO DEFENDS POLICY, CABINET RESHUFFLE

[Speech given by Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, at the beginning of a news conference held 4 December in Madrid -- live]

[Text] Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. This morning I presided over the first cabinet meeting since the appointments I submitted to his majesty the king last Tuesday. The change which took place is normal, normal in any parliamentary regime. It does not represent any discontinuity in the government's task, since last February the government over which I presided has decisively and efficiently tackled the country's main problems. It has fully upheld the freedoms enshrined in the constitution. It has made headway in the difficult struggle against terrorism. It has notably improved civilian security. It has concluded agreements with the opposition in order to definitively regulate the state of the autonomies. It has reached agreements with the social and economic forces to resolve the crisis. It has obtained promising results in saving on imports energy. It has clearly determined the main lines of our foreign policy by taking the necessary steps to incorporate Spain in the Atlantic alliance. No one can say that it has not governed with energy and decisiveness during the last 9 months.

The crisis within the Union of the Democratic Center party has been resolved and the repeated statements by the opposition on the allegedly provisional nature of the government have prevented the government from efficiently fulfilling its responsibilities. I should like to convey to all those who are listening to me at this moment the certainty that we are working in normality and security. We are working within the normality of a framework with parties and freedom of expression and a framework in which all of the conflicts -- real or possible -- and all of the opinions -- correct or incorrect -- reach the public and provoke the corresponding debate.

It seems that we have not yet accustomed ourselves to this proper noise of democracy, which is normal in any democracy and is a noise which must not be confused with disorder or weakness. The framework of political and social coexistence which our constitution outlines has already demonstrated its effectiveness and has allowed the parliament and the government to work fruitfully. The results of this work should give all of us security and hope. The government will continue with this task until the end of the legislature in 1983.

The changes made this week are small and keep responsibility for foreign policy, economic policy, defense and public order in the same hands. It is not my intention to introduce changes of direction in the government's basic lines of action.

I should also say a few words about the changes that have occurred in the UCD, in the party which supports the government. The changes have solved old disagreements, and have solved them by the democratic and normal method of elections. I think that what happens in the first political party of the nation is of interest to everyone and it is therefore exaggerated and dramatised. I also want to convey to everyone the certainty that within the UCD there is a sense of responsibility and fidelity to the electorate. I also want to convey to everyone the certainty that at no time, at no time have the internal questions of the party interfered with the government's activity.

The government and its prime minister know that we are living through difficult times, but we are certain that we have tackled the problems with adequate measures and policies during the last few months.

We are also secure in the belief that we have affirmed our freedoms and our democracy. Between all of us -- government, parties and the media -- we must free public opinion from the obsessive shadow of 23 February [coup attempt]. We can do it responsibly. I have just said that we are going through difficult times, but our difficulties are normal difficulties for which appropriate solutions are being found. Therefore -- and without excluding possible parliamentary agreements to which a party which does not have an absolute majority must always be open -- therefore, I do not think that the situation, the normal situation that we are in, demands nor even makes advisable resorting to special measures such as forming a government coalition.

The UCD government has effectively carried out its program and in the past few months and has reached agreement with the opposition on necessary issues. We will continue to develop our program in the coming months and we will continue to strictly respect our agreements.

We are about to celebrate the first 3 years of our Constitution. The anniversary will be celebrated throughtout Spain with ceremonies initiated jointly by the political parties, with adorned balconies and with windows decorated with the colors of the flag. I wish to add my voice to this homage to the constitution, ffirming once again my full confidence in the efficacy of the political system we have given ourselves, affirming my belief in its consolidation and in its capacity to satisfactorily resolve our problems in peace and in freedom.

After these words, which I wanted to serve as an introduction to your questions, I am at your disposal.

MILITARY OFFICERS UNHAPPY, ISSUE COMMUNIQUE

After a detailed account of this, the signatories make seven points. They call on the political powers to respect the armed forces' autonomy and they emphasize that there is no need for professionalization, democratization or purging of the armed forces. The note ends with the following statement, which we quote: "We make these points although they are a reflection of broad opinion [in the armed forces] in our own names and in accordance with the provisions in article 178 of the royal ordinance of the armed forces."

That as we said, is the gist of the communique which was signed with names and national identity document numbers by 100 military men -- 25 captains, 21 lieutenants, 38 sergeants, 15 warrant officers and 1 second lieutenant, most of them belonging to the artillery and the infantry. Very shortly after the communique was released, the joint chiefs of staff issued the following note:

Once in possession of the document passed to the EUROPA PRESS AGENCY which bore what appears to be the signatures of about 100 officers and noncommissioned officers of the armed forces, the captain-general of the 1st Military Region has ordered that procedures be instituted to check and clarify the facts. The note is signed by Lt Gen Ignacio Alfaro Arregui, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff.

According to the Madrid newspaper EL PAIS, the signatories have been summoned to appear at 0900 before their commanding officers at their respective units to confirm that the signatures are indeed theirs.

Ministers Called to Offices

NC061227 Paris AFP in English 1217 GMT 6 Dec 81

[Text] Madrid, 6 Dec (AFP) -- In swift response to an inflammatory right-wing manifesto issued last night by 100 Spanish officers and non-commissioned officers, Spanish Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo at 1 am today ordered cabinet members to go to their ministeries and stand by for instructions.

The manifesto delcared the 100 signatories' support for the civil guard conspirators who in a failed coup d'etat last February 23 held the assembled deputies and cabinet hostage in the lower house here. The statement, released 48 hours before with the third anniversary of the December 7 referendum which massively endorsed Spain's democratic constitution, also accused the press of scornful treatment of the attempted putsch, described as a "feat of arms." As the government hurried to their posts, Defense Minister Alberto Oliart returned to the capital by military transport jet from the provinces. Meanwhile the Spanish high command announced it had opened an inquiry.

The manifesto, signed by captains, lieutenants, and sergeants in the Madrid district command, claimed to voice "the general feeling" in the armed forces. The manifesto hit out at "attacks, insults, affronts, and widespread slanders against members of the armed forces with a glowing past -- glorious heros in a feat of arms whose courage and integrity may not be put in doubt." It protested against "the demolition of monuments to those who shed their last drop of blood for Spain and the disappearance of street names from our towns commemorating soldiers who exercised the highest responsibility in recent Spanish history" -- an allusion to the renaming of streets named in honour of Spain's late dictator, Francisco Franco, and their Phalangist dignitaries. The 100 signatories accused the press of having "twisted the image of the armed forces, their present situation and their aspirations in recent years, particularly these last months." The armed forces are in no need of being democratized or purged, byt must simply be respected," the manifesto continued, accusing also political parties of "seeking the destruction of the Spanish armed forces in order to put in their place others of their own obedience."

The signatories renewed their "solemn promise to defend the honour, independence, and unity of the nation" and pledged to "assume with honour the history of Spain." The manifesto concluded: "Finally we consider that the insults and attacks on our comrades are directed at the people as a whole, with all the consequences involved." Among the names on the manifesto were those of Col Jose Ignacio San Martin, a defendant in the forthcoming trial of the February 23 conspirators, and the son of Blas Pinar, leader of the neo-fascist party Fuerza Nueva.

Military Men Under Arrest

[Text] EFE has learned from reliable military sources that the 100 military officers and noncommissioned officers who signed the document on the media's treatment of the armed forces have been put under house arrest for 14 days. The sources say that the detention is preventive in nature and has been decided upon regardless of whatever responsibilities may ultimately be determined in connection with the facts.

The captain-general of the 1st Military Region, Lt Gen Guillermo Quintana Lacaci, as the highest judicial authority in that military region, has appointed Col Balbino Teijeiro Pinon as judge in the matter, and he has already begun taking statements from those who signed the document.

The officers and NCOs concerned were summoned early this morning to their units where at 0900 their identities were checked against the signatures. The sources say that those detained began making their statements to the judge this afternoon.

Defense Ministry Confirms

[Text] The Ministry of Defense has officially confirmed that the men who signed the document concerning the way the media treat the armed forces have been placed under house arrest for 14 days. A note says that in connection with the document signed by 100 army officers and noncommissioned officers on 5 December and passed to the EUROPA PRESS AGENCY, the Ministry of Defense information and public relations office makes the following statement:

First, appropriate orders were given by the captain-general of the 1st Military Region for all signatories to present themselves at their posts at 0900 today. Second, they have been informed of the imposition of 14 days of preventive arrest, without prejudice to liability which might ultimately be determined. Third, the captain-general of the 1st Military Region has designated Col Balbino Teijeiro Pinon as judge in the matter. Fourth, the judge began taking statements at 1630 today.

Joint Chiefs Issue Statement

[Text] The joint chiefs of staff, after a meeting with Defense Minister Alberto Oliart, have drafted a note in connection with the document issued by 100 military men dealing with the way the media treat the armed forces, and have given instructions that this note be read at all armed forces establishments and centers. The text of the note is as follows:

In connection with the document signed by 100 army officers and noncommissioned officers on 5 December and passed to the EUROPA PRESS AGENCY, the joint chiefs of staff make the following statement:

1. The procedures used both for drafting the text and for collecting signatures and also for communicating it subsequently to the media, represent, apart from a repetition of what has been stated in regular samplings of opinion, a wholesale disregard for the regulation procedures established for the channelling of anxieties, proposals or suggestions. The latter must in all cases follow the normal pattern and must never take the form of collective demands or petitions, which are totally prohibited by article 203 of the royal ordinances. All of this represents an act of indiscipline and also affects the trust and loyalty due to superiors.

3. What has occured also affects the unity and cohesion which is necessary for members of the armed forces since such wrongs, whether hypothetical or real, must not become an excuse for behavior which could lead to a separation from the rest of society. The facts have therefore been put in the hands of the competent judicial authority so that an investigation may be carried out, liabilities ascertained and sanctions imposed according to the appropriate laws.

4. The joint chiefs of staff appeal to all generals, commanding officers, officers, NCO's and troops to shun all insinuations which could affect their pledge of loyalty to the government, adherence to the constitution and loyalty to his majesty the king, which the armed forces have so far complied with in such an examplary fashion.

KOIVISTO APPEARS CLEAR FAVORITE FOR PRESIDENCY

PAPER SPECULATES ON USSR AMBASSADOR'S TRIP

[Text] On Wednesday [25 November] Soviet Ambassador Vladimir Sobolev and Embassy Counsellor Viktor Vladimirov traveled to Moscow for what were described as trade policy consultations. Their return came as something of a surprise and gave rise in political circles to speculation about possible connnections with the presidential election.

However, the Foreign Ministry saw nothing remarkable in the two Soviet diplomats' trip. It was described as more or less routine. Both Ambassador Sobolev and Counselor Vladimirov said that the reason for their trip was to prepare for Foreign Trade Minister Nikolay Patolichev's visit to Finland next week. Patolichev will be arriving in Helsinki Monday [30 November], and Tuesday he will sign the 1982 Finnish-Soviet trade agreement. The two diplomats will return to Finland with Patolichev. Ambassador Sobolev himself said that he was going home to discuss relations between Finland and the Soviet Union and trade relations. When asked if one of the reasons for his trip is the Center Party's nomination of Johannes Virolainen as its presidential candidate, Sobolev declared that Virolainen is not the reason for my trip." Sobolev stressed that the Center Party's decision is an internal matter for the Center party and for Finland. "We are not interfering in it!" he said.

Yesterday political circles were looking for possible connections with the presidential election, but the matter remained at the level of pure speculation. The explanation that the Soviet Embassy chiefs were to "escort" Foreign Trade Minister Patolichev was, however, not thought to be completely satisfactory. In the past Patolichev has paid visits to Finland alone. However, the Soviet diplomats' trip is not thought to be a significant demonstration. But it can perhaps been taken as a "small signal" that the Soviet Union is following the presidential election with particular interest.

ULLSTEN, STRAY DISCUSS ARMS TALKS, N-FREE ZONE

PM041105 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 27 Nov 81 p 6

[Aake Ekdahl report: "'No' to Soviet Agreement"]

[Text] The change of government in Oslo has not changed Norway's view of the possibility of creating a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries. The Norwegian Conservative government's Foreign Minister Svenn Stray made this statement after talks at Haga Palace with Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten Thursday evening [26 November].

It was the first time the two ministers had met. Their talks covered disarmament, the Schmidt-Brezhnev meeting in Bonn and the forthcoming disarmament conference. Both foreign ministers took a hopeful view of the Bonn meeting after they had received an updated report from there.

"The fact is that both sides have declared their willingness to go for concrete steps in the field of disarmament," Ullsten noted. Stray dismissed the idea of direct agreements between the Soviet Union and Norway for a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries. Agreements of this sort were primarily a question for the two nuclear powers, he said.

It is the Norwegian Government's view that a break in the work toward creating a Nordic nuclear-free zone is likely to create greater realism in peace work. We must first await the results of the current peace talks and evaluate them. Stray said that he had not received any criticism from the other Nordic countries because the government had shelved the affair. The disarmament conference next week will be the first test of whether the superpowers are prepared to move from general slogans to practical actions with regard to disarmament and the use of nuclear arms and the gradual removal of nuclear arms, Ullsten said.

Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen has recently criticized the peace movement of running the Soviet Union's errands. Similarly, former Swedish Defense Minister Eric Kroenmark said that it is easy "to recognize the rats by their walk" when hinting that the peace movement is led by communists. Stray had no direct knowledge of communist elements in the peace movement but agreed that parts of the movement's practical work were too one-sided in its criticism of the Western powers.

KIPRIANOU MEETS WALDHEIM, REITERATES POSITIONS

NC051928 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 5 Dec 81

President Kiprianou reiterated our known positions on the UN secretary general's evaluation, which does not constitute a basis for negotiations since the basis for such negotiations consists of the UN resolutions and the two summit agreements. The president strongly supported the view that there must be neither delay in the process of dialogue nor should any delay in the tempo of negotiations be permitted, but that, on the contrary, dialogue should be speeded up so that an evaluation can be made within a logical period of time on whether progress on the Cyprus issue can be achieved.

Kiprianou reiterated to Waldheim that it is Cyprus' intention to reintroduce the Cyprus issue to the current General Assembly which will be convened, or during a special General Assembly session, if there is no progress in the intercommunal talks. It is this very subject which will be discussed by President Kiprianou on Monday evening during his meeting with the president of the UN General Assembly.

It was reported Secretary General Waldheim agreed with President Kiprianou that it is truly the UN resolutions and the summit agreements which constitute the basis for negotiations. In his latest report Waldheim stated that his evaluation is an aid for the continuation of dialogue. The missing persons question was also discussed during the meeting in the light of the resolution of the General Assembly's Third Political Committee. Waldheim undertook to proceed with all necessary actions to promote implementation of the political committee's resolutions.

On the Cyprus economy, the resolution mentions it is being lead to calamity and adds that minor interventions cannot yield solutions to the problems facing the people and that changes are essential in the socioeconomic structure of the economy which will set it on its correct course.

The spokesman concluded: These activities definitely fail to contribute to the peaceful solution of the problem or to show disposition for negotiations based on goodwill.

PAPAIOANNOU CHARGES U.S. PLOT IN CYPRUS, GREECE

NC061302 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 6 Dec 81 pp 1, 11

[Speech by AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou 5 December to party gathering in Limassol]

[Excerpts] The problem of war and peace is a problem of life and death today that concerns all mankind. The fate of all their problems is interconnected and related to this problem. This is not a new problem. It has always existed. Today, however, as a result of the terrible mass extermination weapons, as a result of existing tension in international relations and as a result of imperialist aggressiveness, this problem has been turned into an urgent problem which, I would say, concerns mankind every minute, every hour of every day.

U.S. imperialism has not abandoned its gunboat and big stick policy. It has not abandoned its devilish, undermining and subversive activities in various countries of the world. In the case of Cyprus, U.S. imperialism has not abandoned its criminal efforts to dissolve the independent state of Cyprus and to turn the island into a nuclear missile base and a base for the Rapid Deployment Force. This is why the UN resolutions on Cyprus are not being implemented. This is why the NATO-supported Turkish junta is being encouraged not only to gag the Turkish people under oppressive and fascist measures but also to occupy 40 percent of Cyprus territory. This is why there is a continuation of Turkish intransigence, which is now accompanied by new threats about the proclamation of an independent Turkish Cypriot state.

The satanic and criminal hand of U.S. imperialism lurks behind all these things. Recently there has also been much talk about strengthening the Turkish military occupation forces in Cyprus, not only in personnel but also in new heavy weapons. There is also talk that soon they will undertake a new offensive under the excuse that the Cyprus Government "is importing arms." There is talk about the proclamation of an independent Turkish Cypriot state next February, on the anniversary of the proclamation of the "Turkish Cypriot Federation"

All this can only be related to some more general imperialist plans. It is also related to the rise of the mainland Greek progressive democratic forces to authority. No matter how hard U.S. imperialism is trying to hide it, there is no doubt that it is gravely concerned by the turn of events in Greece. It is also greatly concerned because there is talk about the withdrawal of Greece from NATO and the EEC. U.S. imperialism is concerned about the huge movement of the progressive democratic forces of the Greek people and about the influence this movement has on the development of Greek policy. Most certainly the U.S. imperialist element wants to strike against this movement. It wants to overthrow the Papandreou government so it can safeguard its bases in Greece and prevent the withdrawal of Greece from NATO. The methods it will use toward this end will be subversive, undermining and criminal methods.

This is why it is quite likely that NATO-supported Attila may once again be used in Cyprus to bring the Papandreou government to a difficult position for the purpose of bringing about its overthrow. U.S. imperialism cannot stomach the existence of these progressive democratic forces in Greece nor, naturally, can it stomach the existence of these same forces in Cyprus. These are the forces that pursue a conscientious nonaligned anti-imperialist policy. Consequently, we should not exclude the possibility of the existence of a new criminal imperialist plan directed against these two forces through use of some new act of piracy in Cyprus.

Life has proved that it is with such criminal plots that imperialism tries to react against political situations which are undesirable to it.

This is why the progressive democratic forces in both Cyprus and Greece must be vigilant and, most important, must unite their forces to defend themselves successfully against such criminal plots and plans.

We consider it our duty to warn the progressive democratic forces in both Cyprus and Greece of the possible existence of a satanic imperialist criminal plan directed against both Cyprus and Greece. Our warning is aimed at increasing patriotic vigilance by the people, at total unification of the people's forces to prevent and avert any criminal imperialist plans of imperialism and its agents.

[Text] Because an effort is being made to involve the name of the president of the republic in the domestic affairs of New Democracy, the press bureau of the presidency has released the following communique:

The president of the republic does not wish to have any involvement during the earlier election [of leaders] in 1980. But what he recommends is the securing of the party's unity, and this is so because he believes that if the country is to acquire democratic traditions and to ensure a smooth political life, it is necessary that it should have stable and long-term political forms.

KKE-INTERIOR OPPOSES PARTY CONTROL OF ARMY

NC061620 Athens I AVYI in Greek 5 Dec 81 p 3

[Article by KKE-Interior Secretary Bambis Dhkrakopoulos: "The Democratization of the Armed Forces"]

[Excerpts] Our position toward the PASOK government's policy statement stems from a different vision of socialism and from a different view about the course that leads to it. Thus we consider it natural that the government's policy statement does not coincide with the positions of the KKE-Interior for which we fight.

This does not prevent us from stating that this policy statement opens up a positive new trend, inspired by a novel democratic, independent and progressive spirit and that it also includes positive general goals for the basic sectors of economic and social policy -- the democratization of the country and foreign policy, which remain to be achieved. At the same time, however, we note that over and above the general characteristic of the policy statement -- which comprises numerous general declarations and few specific and binding goals -- it contains critical omissions and gaps which make up a policy that could lead the entire attempt at change to low levels, stagnation and failure.

One of the sectors we believe to be critical for the course and fate of change is the sector of the democratization of the state, particularly of the state apparatus, the institutions and the legislature. Within the framework of this very broad sector we consider that particular priority and decisive importance must be given to the democratization of the armed forces and security forces. At the same time, importance must be given to the democratization of labor and trade union legislation together with the institutional adoption of the participation and control of workers in the businesses in which they are employed and, generally, in economic and social policy.

I present the first problem: All of those who fight for change, irrespective of their differences on context, extent, depth and prospects that they may have, declare that they want a national army, not a party army, which will be faithful to the republic, the constitution and the nation, free of the regime which prevailed within the armed forces and which permitted a bunch of perjured colonels to turn the army into a tool for the enforcement of a stark dictatorship in the service of foreign and antipeoples interests and which was condemned forever, particularly after the betrayal of Cyprus. We would also like to believe that apart from the base of the armed forces, the junta influence has also been greatly limited within the majority of the officer corps, who were influenced by the junta because they understood the junta's role, which was treasonous toward national interests and calamitous for the prestige of the armed forces among the people.

After the fall of the dictatorship, the victory of the democratic forces and the advent of PASOK to authority, a new wind is now blowing in the country. Within the area of the armed forces, despite the fact that there is a stronger wind of democracy and the democratic officers are able to express themselves more freely, there is lack of action. We do not support any hasty action and changes which would tend to place the armed forces under the control of the ruling party. This would be a fatal mistake. We oppose any party control over the armed forces and support those measures which strengthen the national character of the armed forces. In addition, we are against persecution within the armed forces in the name of superficial and party-controlled "dejuntification." We do support measures that would alter the current status quo and would tend to overcome the militarist, antiprogressive, anticommunist spirit, which still remains strong in critical areas of the armed forces.

The radical national-liberation-democratic spirit that prevails in the country today following the victory of the forces of change must reach beyond the armed forces with specific measures and changes in the relevant laws, decrees, provisions and regulations.

The military academies must be opened to all citizens, regardless of their political position, the leftists and the communists, without distinction. At the same time, the dossiers on political affiliations maintained by the armed forces must be destroyed; otherwise the destruction of these dossiers by the police and the gendarmerie alone would be a meaningless measure. Only in this way will the national character of the country's armed forces be protected. How could this character be considered to be protected when a section of the people, considerable both numerically and qualitatively, such as the leftist and communist citizens, are considered suspicious by the armed forces and cannot, therefore, serve?

In parallel with these changes in laws, decrees and regulations, it is imperative to relate the patriotic traditions of the armed forces to the epic of the national resistance movement which to date has been so maligned. Recognition and restoration of the EAM-ELAS, the National Liberation Front-National Peoples Liberation Army, and the other resistance organizations must also be undertaken within the armed forces, where it is an illegal organization, and it must enter the daily life of the various units through courses and talks at the academies.

Measures must also be adopted for democratization and establishing a democratic trend in internal regulations which will guarantee respect for the personality of the private soldier (infantryman, sailor etc.), humane conditions of life, the possibility of professional training, and spiritual and political activity after completion of official duties, etc.

We believe that after PASOK's advent to authority there will be an intensification of the class struggle between the social and political forces of progress, both domestic and foreign, and the forces of reaction over the question of frustrating the attempted changes. The state apparatus will be one of the primary fields for waging this struggle. The outcome of this struggle within the state apparatus will determine whether in the end the PASOK government, as the legal government of the country, will be able to control this state apparatus or whether it will allow the perpetuation of control over a considerable section of this apparatus by the forces of conservatism and the rightwing, with all the consequences this may have on the fate of change.

Evaluation and proper handling of the problem by the PASOK government will have a decisive effect on the country's course. Let us remember that the weak point of Yeoryios Papandreou in 1964 lay in his acceptance of the situation prevailing within the armed forces, and acceptance which facilitate the ability of the reactionary forces to proceed with his overthrow. We believe that the PASOK government must proceed now, not later, now that the people's mandate is still fresh and the reactionary forces have not yet had time to regroup. It must proceed now with the necessary changes within the armed forces, always within the framework of the constitution, with the necessary planning and implementation but also with the required firmness and courage. In such an effort, it will have the greatest proportion of the people and the armed forces on its own side.

WEINBERGER ENDS VISIT; JOINT STATEMENT ISSUED

Meets Ulusu, Turkmen

TA041542 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1520 GMT 4 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, 4 Dec -- U.S. Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger had "constructive and substantive" talks with key Turkish Government officials Friday in Ankara on issues of mutual concern and Turkey's specific problems -- problems which the U.S. administration have always been sympathetic to.

Mr Weinberger made these remarks as he was received by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu at the Prime Ministry Friday afternoon. He said what was more important was to get to know, on a personal basis the people who were formulating and implementing Turkey's policies. He said Turkey and the United States always maintained warm and friendly relations and he believed his visit would help advance these relations. The defense secretary earlier had a 45-minute talk with Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen.

Talks between Turkey and the U.S. delegation continued well into the evening after the courtesy visit. A brief Turkish statement said the U.S. delegation was briefed on regional developments and was explained in detail the defense needs of Turkey. Mr Weinberger will be received by head of state General Kenan Evren Saturday morning. He leaves for Naples the same day.

The importance Turkey attaches to its relations with the United States was underlined by Premier Ulusu, who said the Ankara government was determined to further develop its ties with its NATO partner. Mr Ulusu said a militarily and economically strong Turkey would also mean a stronger alliance.

Ulusu Dinner

[Text] Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu has said that it is very important for the stability of the region for Turkey to be strong economically and militarily. He was speaking at a dinner he gave this evening in honor of U.S. Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger, who is in Ankara on an official visit. Ulusu pointed out that the visit would be beneficial for the understanding of Turkey's problems. Noting that Turkey aimed at continuing to have balanced and sincere relations with its neighbors and allies, Ulusu stated that Turkey was against unjust activities in international relations.

Referring to international terrorism aimed against Turkey, Ulusu stressed that the countries that supported such destructive activities were sowing seeds of hatred and vengeance and that they would also suffer from this in the end.

Weinberger expressed his appreciation of Turkey's efforts to establish a democracy on stable foundations. He also said that Turkey was an important factor for NATO's defense.

The U.S. secretary of defense met Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken this morning and later he called on Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu. He will be received by head of state Gen Kenan Evren tomorrow. The visiting secretary will leave Turkey tomorrow afternoon.

Meets Evren

[Text] Head of state General Evren received today at 1100 U.S. Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger, who is in Ankara on an official visit.

In a statement during the meeting General Evren said that a long historic friendship has existed between Turkey and the United States, as well as an alliance. Noting that they would exchange with the U.S. secretary of defense ideas on the needs of the Turkish armed forces, Evren said: The strengthening of the Turkish armed forces is a defensive move -- as is the NATO alliance. The stronger we are in our defensive capabilities, the more effective our role in our region and the world at large becomes.

In his statement, U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger said that during his contacts in Ankara he once more witnessed the warm friendship existing between the two countries. Weinberger expressed his appreciation of Turkey's efforts to restore order and to draft a new constitution.

General Evren received Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken prior to U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger's visit. The minister briefed General Evren on contacts held with the visiting defense secretary.

News Conference

In reply to a question, Weinberger said the administration in Turkey is doing successful work in establishing a democratic government and drawing up the new constitution. Weinberger expressed the belief that military and economic aid to Turkey must be continued. Replying to a question on whether the United States will give Greece a border guarantee, Weinberger said an official proposal has not been submitted on this matter.

Bayulken said a request by two countries of the same alliance for guarantees against each other is not compatible with the spirit of alliance. In reply to another question, Bayulken said the Turkish Government is in contact with friendly countries concerning the financing of an aircraft industry to be established in Turkey and that he discussed this subject with Weinberger as well.

Weinberger said the United States may extend financial help for an aircraft industry to be established in Turkey. He noted that the amount of the military and economic aid to be extended to Turkey was not discussed during the talks in Ankara and that only the Turkish armed forces' needs for their modernization and strengthening were dealt with.

ANATOLIA Text of Statement

[Text] Ankara, 5 Dec (AA) -- Here is the full text of the joint statement made by Mr Haluk Bayulken, Turkish defence minister, and Mr Caspar Weinberger, defense secretary of the United States, Saturday in Ankara:

The secretary of defence of the United States of America, Caspar W. Weinberger, paid an official visit to Ankara from the 3rd to the 5th of December, 1981, returning the visit by the Turkish minister of defence, Umut Haluk Bayulken, to Washington in July, this year. Mr Weinberger was especially pleased to be able to visit Turkey during this year which marks the 100th anniversary of Kemal Ataturk.

The secretary of defense was received by head of state General Kenan Evren, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu and he visited Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen. This visit gave the two ministers of defense the opportunity to continue the dialogue begun in their earlier meetings both in Washington and at the official NATO sessions involving defense ministers. The two ministers exchanged views on defense matters concerning both countries.

In this connection Mr Bayulken presented to Mr Weinberger his evaluation of the events taking place in the world -- particularly in NATO's southeastern flank and the regional situation of Turkey -- as well as bilateral and multilateral relations. Mr Weinberger was very pleased and impressed with this evaluation and noted both countries had the same appreciation of the threat facing NATO and the free world.

Mr Bayulken explained to Mr Weinberger the state of the Turkish armed forces within the framework of NATO goals and plans. It was noted that while Turkey's contribution to NATO is very impressive, the present state of the arms and equipment of the Turkish armed forces is below that of other NATO members. It was agreed that both countries would continue to work together to improve this situation and to improve the (defense) posture on NATO's southeastern flank. The two ministers reviewed projects being implemented within the context of the defense and economic cooperation agreement signed on 29 March 1980 between Turkey and the United States.

The ministers decided to establish a high level joint defense group, in addition to those already existing within the framework of the defense and economic cooperation agreement, to carry out consultations with a view to determining measures to be taken to enlarge and improve defense cooperation between them in the context of their common membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and to expedite the resolution of such problems that may from time to time arise in implementing their efforts on behalf of the common defense. The ministers noted with great satisfaction that both sides have [word indistinct] will to proceed rapidly in this regard.

The ministers agreed that an economically and militarily strong Turkey is vital to the deterrent capabilities of NATO and will constitute an important element of stability in the region that is of utmost importance for her neighbors and the community of peace loving nations. In this respect the secretary of defence reaffirmed his country's determination to assist Turkey economically and militarily. The Turkish minister reemphasized that Turkey, which desires to live in peace and tranquility, is irrevocably attached to the principle of Kemal Ataturk and is determined, under all circumstances to maintain the strength and stability that alone can guarantee peace and tranquility.

ULUSU INTERVIEWED BY SOVIET BROADCASTERS

[Text] Ankara, 4 Dec (AA) -- Interviewed by a correspondent of Soviet radio TV company, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu said Turkey welcomed the U.S.-Soviet talks aimed at arms control in Europe in the field of medium range nuclear missiles, since she supports all efforts aimed at evading a nuclear disaster. In reply to questions, Ulusu said, in brief:

--"The greatest responsibility belongs to the nuclear powers. The steps they will take towards nuclear disarmament will be humanity's gain.

--"To further security for all nations, arms race must be halted and international checks must be introduced.

--"Military balance between blocks must be at the minimum level possible so that the threat of war can be evaded. Arms limitation concerning conventional and nuclear arms, is not enough and efforts are necessary to eliminate international tensions.

TURKMEN: GREECE NOW INCREASINGLY INTRANSIGENT

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said Greece is displaying increasing intransigence on the solution of problems between Turkey and Greece. Replying to questions by West German journalists who are in Ankara, Turkmen pointed out that if this Greek attitude continues and if Greece resorts to unilateral action, very serious difficulties might arise in the relations between the two countries.

Turkmen said he did not believe the United States would give any guarantees to Greece against Turkey. He added that it is against the principles of an alliance for members of the same alliance to ask for guarantees against one another.

The president of the Consultative Assembly, Sadi Irmak, also conferred with the visiting FRG journalists. He said the work on the new constitution would be completed as soon as possible. He added that the new constitution would be based on Ataturkist principles and that it would be liberal and democratic. Irmak also said a parliament elected by the people would definitely be set up as soon as possible.

In a speech at the signing ceremony, Heral said the protocol would further develop the commercial and economic relations between the two countries. Torok said the commercial relations between the two countries were developing successfully.

The protocol changes the principles under which Turkey and Hungary make their commercial payments to each other. The protocol also envisages cooperation between Turkish and Hungarian establishments in the field of agriculture, and especially agricultural research.

TERCUMAN SEES NEW ORIENTATION IN FOREIGN POLICY

NC051206 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 2 Dec 81 p 4

[Article by Prof Fahir Armaoglu: "New Developments in our Foreign Policy"]

[Text] After 15 months of silence, Turkish foreign policy has recently acquired a sudden liveliness. Apart from routine activities, the main characteristic of our foreign policy during the past 15 months was that our attention was concentrated entirely on Western Europe because of the attitude of the Council of Europe and the European Parliament. In the meantime, efforts have been exerted, particularly by the United States, toward further improving and maturing our mutual relations. The visit which our honorable head of state paid to Pakistan last week indicates that a new era is beginning in Turkish foreign policy. In fact, when we study all the evidence that has emerged during this visit, we must conclude that a new direction is looming ahead in Turkey's foreign policy.

It would be wrong to assess the visit to Pakistan by our honorable head of state and the situation which has emerged in the relations between both countries as a result of this visit within the narrow framework of the traditional Turkish-Pakistani friendship. It should not be forgotten that Pakistan is one of the newest members of the nonaligned group. Second, General Evren's address to the Afghani refugees provided an opportunity for an evaluation of Turkish-Soviet relations. Finally, another point that is noticeable is the fact that India has begun to be a factor in our foreign policy.

Toward the middle of this month, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen will be visiting the People's Republic of China, and the Chinese prime minister will be returning this visit to Ankara, probably next year. When China's relations with the Soviet Union and its attitude toward the Afghani problem are taken into consideration, we see that a new factor is entering our new foreign policy and is beginning to take shape.

In the middle of January our head of state will be visiting Bulgaria, Romania and Yugoslavia. Visits to these three Balkan states should not be evaluated merely from the Turkish-Greek point of view. We must not forget that these three countries are socialist states and that Turkey has not acquired a firm place in Western policy. Particularly Romania and Yugoslavia are very far from the Soviet Union, while Bulgaria, which has strong ties with the Soviet Union, has already begun to show a softer attitude for General Evren's visit.

In parallel with these developments, it would be useful to draw attention to two events: These are the visits which U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger and Secretary of State Haig are paying to Ankara tomorrow and on 13 December, respectively. The truth is that Turkish-American relations have improved tremendously in the past 15 months. Both countries appear to be pleased with this improvement. In fact, the United States wishes to go a bit further in the improvement of these relations. But certain issues from Turkey's point of view restrain to some extent the speed of the progress the United States desires to achieve in these relations. The indications are, however, that Turkey attaches exclusive importance to its relations with the United States.

Another development is that the desire of the 21 parliamentarians of the Council of Europe to visit Turkey this month has been put off at Turkey's request. In fact this is a cancellation and not a postponement. Turkey is reshaping its relations with the European institutions. It appears that the Turkish Government has patiently waited for 15 months for the Council of Europe and Western Europe to show an understanding for the problems it is confronting. As this understanding has not been shown and as, on the contrary, pressure on Turkey has increased to the extent of freezing the credits, the Turkish Government is compelled to adopt a new attitude, particularly toward the Council of Europe. It is clear that, inspired by this new attitude, Turkish foreign policy is making new efforts, as we have explained above. As a result of this new development, Turkey may freeze its relations with Western Europe in the same way that Western Europe has frozen its credits to Turkey.

Time will show whether these new developments in Turkish foreign policy, particularly with respect to relations with Western Europe, are mere experiments or whether they have come to stay. But if a change of content is intended, this may have some effect on internal developments in Turkey as well.

VISAS FOR POLES REINTRODUCED FOR 6 MONTHS

[Special DIE PRESSE report by Andreas Unterberger]

[Text] Vienna -- As of today, Monday, at midnight, visas will again be required from all Polish citizens wanting to enter Austria. The Polish Government will be informed by Austria through diplomatic channels that Austria is temporarily invalidating the bilateral agreement of 1972 on the abolition of visas. The temporary reintroduction of visas is effected for reasons of maintaining internal security -- a clause of the agreement that was originally introduced upon Poland's request.

For the time being, the reintroduction of visas by Austria will only apply to a limited period ending on 30 June 1982. According to an official source, visas for Poles will continue to be issued even during this period for Polish citizens in all cases meeting the requirements for political asylum.

Austrians can continue to visit Poland without visas as long as Warsaw does not issue a similar statement as Vienna. The Austrian decision will be published today, Monday, in the official gazette. The reasons for the Austrian step have already been reported in the past few days: the tremendous influx of Poles to Austria and the reluctance of those countries to which most Poles want to proceed to let them immigrate, so that they remain in Austria. The Austrian Embassy in Warsaw, which will have to cope wtih a large number of visa requests, is fully staffed but its staff has not been increased.

Officials Comment

AU071245 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1158 GMT 7 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Austria -- The Austrian Government has decided to reintroduce visas for Polish citizens. This regulation will be valid from tomorrow until 30 June 1982. In a joint statement the Foreign and Interior Ministries stress that persons who are persecuted for political, racial, religious or national reasons or because they belong to any specific social group will continue to be granted political asylum. Interior Minister Lanc pointed out that the facilities for housing refugees are almost completely exhausted. Moreover, it had become obvious that before the winter no major number of refugees seeking asylum would be admitted to other countries.

Chancellor Kreisky declared in Bahrain that other countries, unlike Austria, had never abolished the visas. Had the influx of refugees in Austria continued undiminished, Kreisky added, Austria would soon have had to spend 1 billion schillings on care for Polish emigrees, who are not actually refugees.

VIENNA PAPER REVIEWS 291ST MBFR MEETING

AU041111 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 4 Dec 81 p 2

[Text] At yesterday's 291st plenary session of the Vienna conference on force reductions in central Europe, the East has again asked the NATO countries to accept the early conclusion of an agreement on the basis of the figures submitted by both sides, and the already largely coordinated two-phase plan. CSSR chief delegate Emil Keblusek stressed that the tabled figures indicate an "approximate balance of forces" between NATO and the Warsaw Pact in central Europe, a balance that must be preserved at a reduced level. Next Thursday, the 25th round of the force reduction talks will end. The conference is expected to be resumed at the end of January.

KOHL URGES CLOSER EUROPEAN-U.S. PARTNERSHIP

[Text] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA) -- Leading European Christian Democrats have come out in favor of intensifying the partnership between Europe and the United States. The opposition leader Helmut Kohl said on Monday at a specialists conference in Konrad Adenauer House in Bonn that without working together as partners the North Atlantic alliance is not capable of existing in the long-term. Kohl emphasized that he favors a transatlantic dialogue in which a "partnership of equals" can find expression. The CDU/CSU support a Europe which also in the future will see itself as an integral part of the Western world and will preserve peace and secure freedom in close political and military partnership with the United States.

At the 2-day conference, which is being put on by the CDU/CSU parliamentary group and the parliamentary group of the European People's Party [EVP] in the European Parliament, the general secretary of the Italian Christian Democrats, Flaminio Piccoli, put in a plea for an improvement in the relations between Europe and the United States. Alone, or as a third power between the two world powers, Europe will not make progress.

In spite of a tendency to a lack of commitment and neutralism in the countries of the community, which has been set off by fear of a nuclear conflict and by propaganda from outside, the unity of the European Community has been maintained, Piccoli said. Through "its representatives' own initiatives" the European Community has been able to play a role even in the setting up of the necessary talks between the superpowers, a role which could be "of use for a return to detente."

Kohl made it clear that fulfillment of the partnership in the relationship with the United States requires greater efforts from the Europeans. At the same time, he made a plea for a Europe of social partnership, of social balance and of a social market economy. In Kohl's view, the European Community should take on all the tasks which can be handled better on a community level, such as regional policy, the fight against hunger in the world and the North-South dialogue, and also technological projects such as large-scale research and air and space research.

Kohl demanded a strengthening of the European Parliament, which is emerging more and more as the community body which is most consistent in representing the idea of a united Europe. Kohl sharply criticized the Federal Government. For long periods it has not taken European policy seriously enough, often relating to it as a burden, and has invested its energies for more than a decade primarily in the ostpolitik. For years the Federal Government has taken part in the practice of passing the Council of Ministers' unsolved problems to the summit conferences, which then sent them back to the Council of Ministers without a decision having been made. The European Council is threatening to become a symbol of collective inefficacy and irresponsibility for the citizens of Europe.

GENSCHER, EAGLEBURGER PREPARE FOR HAIG VISIT

[Text] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher met the U.S. under secretary of state for European affairs, Lawrence Eagleburger, on Monday in Bonn for German-American consultations. The joint working breakfast in the Foreign Office served to prepare for a meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig, whom Genscher will meet for a private talk on Thursday morning before the start of the NATO foreign ministers conference in Brussels. Eagleburger brief Genscher on the bases for American opinion on the international situation. The most important subjects in the discussion were the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles, the CSCE review conference in Madrid, East-West issues and the current developments in Africa and Central America.

The meeting originally planned with Deputy U.S. Secretary of State William Clark had to be canceled due to changes in the American politician's schedule.

EAGLEBURGER SPEECH ON NATO RELATIONS REPORTED

There was agreement between Eagleburger, Friedrich Zimmermann [CSU group chairman], opposition leader Helmut Kohl and the general secretary of the Italian Christian Democrats, Flaminio Piccoli, on the need to develop European-U.S. partnership based on similar concepts. Eagleburger underlined the U.S. readiness to have constructive relations with the Soviet Union. Washington was not prone to illusions in this respect, however. The United States was not seeking merely agreement with the Soviets in order to sign some documents or other. Neither did they propose summit talks, for example, in order to improve the atmosphere if there was no basis for reaching an understanding. The United States was aware that agreements with the Soviet Union had to be based on Western unity, strength and determination.

Eagleburger stressed that the United States wanted to reach genuine results in the disarmament talks with the Soviets. After U.S. President Ronald Reagan had submitted his proposals, it was now up to Moscow to respond to them constructively. Eagleburger, who had a meeting during the day with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, was substituting for Deputy Secretary of State William Clark, who originally had planned to attend the meeting.

SPD, FDP EXECUTIVES WELCOME SCHMIDT VISIT TO GDR

[Text] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA) -- The party Executives of the SPD and FDP have unanimously welcomed the forthcoming meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SED General Secretary Erich Honecker in the GDR as well as the start of U.S.-Soviet disarmament talks in Geneva. The SPD and FDP hope that the intra-German summit will help to further normalize relations between the two German states and bring about progress for East-West German coexistence. At the same time, the two leading organs of the coalition warned against burdening the meeting in the GDR with preconditions. The FDP expects more regular meetings between the two sides' leading politicians in future.

The SPD and FDP strongly support the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles. In the SPD's view, despite differences of opinion still existing between the United States and the USSR, a good initial basis exists for the two nuclear world powers to move closer together and, provided there is sufficient readiness to compromise, to make the West's rearmament unnecessary.

It is of the utmost importance for the preservation of peace in the world that the dialogue between the two superpowers should once more gain in intensity and substance after a long phase in which there was no dialogue. Although the Federal Government is not a negotiating partner in Geneva, it can still play an active role in continuing the policy of normalization and reducing tensions between East and West, the SPD Executive stated.

REACTION TO ARMY OFFICERS' MANIFESTO CONTINUES

Calvo-Sotelo, Oliart Meet

LD072010 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 7 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo today held a meeting with Defense Minister Alberto Oliart to examine the situation created after the so-called "manifesto of the 100" on the coverage given by the media to the armed forces. The defense minister briefed the prime minister in detail about the measures taken against the signatories of the document and about the situation now existing both in military units and in civilian society. The 100 signatories have been put under house arrest for 2 weeks while the judge, Col Balbino Teijeiro, takes statements from them to ascertain liability in the matter. The note from the joint chiefs of staff in connection with the document issued on Saturday by 100 officers and noncommissioned officers garrisoned in Madrid was read out today at all army units and barracks.

Army Officers Recalled to Posts

[Text] We have just received an urgent dispatch from EFE, which reads as follows:

The joint chiefs of staff have sent instructions to all captains-general ordering that all commanding officers, officers and noncommissioned officers be summoned immediately to their posts to be told that, in the view of the joint chiefs of staff, the so-called "manifesto of the 100" is a grave act of indiscipline; and to be warned of the grave consequences which would follow for anyone supporting it. The order from the joint chiefs of staff says that this instruction must be complied with today, 7 December.

The text of the note from the joint chiefs of staff, which EFE obtained from authorized sources, reads as follows:

In a general order dated 7 December 1981, the joint chiefs of staff describes as an act of indiscipline the manifesto supplied to the press by 100 or more army officers and NCOs; therefore, any initiative for giving support to that document, whether individual or collective, will rank at least as serious as the original action.

Your excellencies [captains-general] will therefore order all officers commanding units, centers or other establishments within the area of your captaincy-general to assemble today, and issue a severe warning about the seriousness of this matter and inform them of the total prohibition on any similar actions of support or protest. Actions of this kind constitute an extremely serious violation of discipline and involve a break in the chain of command. Therefore, any transgression of this order will be immediately sanctioned with disciplinary proceedings and judicial proceedings may then be instituted.

Recalled Officers Return Home

[Text] A Defense Ministry spokesman has stressed that no unit in any military region was confined to barracks today. The spokesman explained that the order given this evening for commanding officers, officers and noncommissioned officers to report to their barracks was issued solely to acquaint them with the document drawn up by the joint chiefs of staff on the subject of the document issued over the weekend by a hundred or so army officers and NCO's. It was also confirmed that over the last few hours the order from the joint chiefs of staff has been complied with and that the officers called to their posts this evening have now returned to their homes.

[Excerpts] Defense Minister Alberto Oliart, after holding a meeting this morning with Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo, early this evening met the joint chiefs of staff. A short time ago he spoke to EFE: These latest events, said the minister, must not be blown up out of proportion. It is my duty to say that discipline is the essential virtue of the armed forces. I have to say also that what has happened is important and serious. It must not be underrated, but neither must it be exaggerated. Those in direct command of the three branches of the armed forces are dealing with the matter and action is being taken in accordance with the law. A statement was also made today by Deputy Prime Minister Martin Villa in Vitoria. Meanwhile the government is preparing a statement on military matters.

PAPER COMMENTS ON SCHMIDT'S ROLE IN ARMS TALKS

[Editorial: "Compromise Necessary"]

[Text] Leonid Brezhnev's stay in Bonn provided confirmation of the increasingly important role West Germany plays in European politics. This is a position which the country has won under Social Democratic leaders Willy Brandt and Helmut Schmidt. Their political line -- independent but clearly anchored in the Western alliance -- has also won the respect of the Soviet Union.

Helmut Schmidt's intention prior to Brezhnev's visit was to play the role of mediator. His objective was to explain U.S. and NATO views to the Soviet leader on the eve of the important disarmament negotiations in Geneva. Schmidt wanted to create confidence and trust and, consequently, an improved climate for negotiations.

However, Helmut Schmidt was only partially successful. The Soviet Union's skepticism toward the United States and the Reagan administration is all too ingrown for it to be changed in the course of a few short discussions during an official visit. But it does nonetheless seem that Schmidt did achieve something, and optimism prior to the Geneva negotiations is now a little greater now than it was a week ago.

Leonid Brezhnev's statement that the Soviet Union is willing to reduce the number of medium-range missiles by "several hundred" cannot simply be dismissed by saying that it "old news," as some people have tried to do. It does amount, when all is said and done, to more than simply freezing the numbers in existence today -- that is, cementing a Soviet superiority in this field. When Brezhnev now talks about reductions, willingness to negotiate is being shown.

We assume that there is also a willingness to negotiate in the U.S. Geneva delegation. When Ronald Reagan also includes the old SS-4 and SS-5 missiles in his "zero option" as as well the SS-20's we assume that bargaining flexibility is also present. We can hardly expect the Soviet Union to agree to remove all its so-called Eurostrategic missiles unless France and Britain also withdraw their nuclear missiles.

But we do not see the exact calculation of the number of missiles and warheads as the most important factor in Geneva. The Eurostrategic medium-range missiles are still only a small part of the total nuclear potential.

Submarine-based and intercontinental missiles can also be targeted on the cities which are the medium-range missiles' objectives.

As long as both sides have enough nuclear arms to prevent the other side from winning a war -- a nuclear war can only be lost -- then detailed calculations of strength are really of secondary importance. However, we do think it extremely important that a disarmament agreement which also includes the medium-range missiles is now reached.

Helmut Schmidt wanted these missiles to be included in the negotiations for the SALT II treaty. This did not happen. This meant that there was no agreement to regulate developments in this sphere. And the Soviet Union has exploited this via a massive investment in this area. The 250 SS-20 missiles are a clear reinforcement of the Soviet armed forces. Nevertheless they have still not changed the balance of power decisively in the Soviet Union's favor.

But if the arms race is to be halted, efforts must be made to prevent its acceleration in the eighties, and it is of crucial importance that an agreement is now reached, an agreement which would set the number of missiles at the lowest possible level, and ideally would reduce their total numbers in comparison with today. To achieve this the two sides will have to show willingness to compromise during the negotiations in Geneva.

DEFENSE MINISTRY COMPLETES REPORT ON SOVIET SUB

[Text] The Swedish Defense Ministry has completed a report on the grounding of the Soviet submarine off the Swedish coast. The Swedish Foreign Ministry has declared the report confidential, but most of its contents have leaked out. It is thought that the submarine incident will be discussed unofficially at the meeting of the Nordic prime ministers beginning in Helsinki tomorrow. Only Denmark is represented at the foreign minister level at the meeting. Here is a report by Juha Tainio from Stockholm:

[Begin recording] The general headquarters of the Swedish Armed Forces started an investigation into the causes of the stranding of the Soviet submarine immediately after it received notification of the incident. The log book of the submarine, U-137, was studied, the crew and the captain of the submarine were questioned, and the route marked in the submarine's log book was reconstructed. During these investigations it was found that the markings in the log book could not possibly correspond to the actual route of the vessel. By observing the log book markings the submarine would have ended up far inside southern Sweden.

According to the Swedish investigations, a compass fault or other navigational errors are completely ruled out. The investigations have shown that the submarine arrived in the Blekinge Archipelago by sailing normally on the surface of the water at 1800 on the evening of 27 October. It managed to cruise in the Swedish restricted military area for about 4 hours before going aground, and it was only the next morning that a fisherman, who heard a suspicious noise from the bay, discovered the stranded submarine.

According to the report of the Swedish general headquarters, thick fog and temporarily defective radar control prevented an earlier discovery of the submarine. In normal conditions the submarine would not have been able to cross the Swedish costal surveillance limits into a restricted military area. Apart from the political commissar, the crew of the U-137 consisted of young recruits. The submarine did not leave behind any marker buoys, which would have made it easier for submarines to navigate in Swedish territorial waters. This was ascertained from the extensive search of the seabed in the Blekinge Archipelago.

The grounding of the submarine aroused great attention around the world. The Swedish Foreign Ministry received a record number of diplomatic requests for investigations from the Stockholm embassies of various countries. The inviolability of Swedish territory was also questioned, and most representatives of foreign embassies who called at the Swedish Foreign Ministry wondered at the decision of the Swedish Government not to force the crew of the submarine to land. This emerges from the Swedish Foreign Ministry notes on the matter.

Although the matter will not come up officially at the Nordic prime ministers meeting, opening in Helsinki tomorrow, the submarine incident will be discussed because the Nordic countries have asked for information on the matter. [end recording]

Leif Leifland, permanent under secretary of state at the Swedish Foreign Ministry, says that the Foreign Ministry did not ask for the Defense Ministry report to be marked "confidential," and that SVENSKA DAGBLADET reports to this effect were very erroneous. We have had nothing to do with the report, because we have not yet recieved it from the armed forces, Leifland tells the Swedish news agency.

Swedish Chief of Defense Staff Bengt Schuback says for his part that the report has not yet gone to the Foreign Ministry. When the report is sent there, it will be marked "confidential," Schuback says.

USSR Had Infantry Units Ready

PM070939 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 2 Dec 81 pp 1, 6

[Ingmar Lindmarker report: "Submarine Affair -- Soviet Infantry Were in Readiness"]

[Text] Soviet infantry units prepared for landing were on board some of the ships waiting outside Swedish territorial waters during the submarine affair. Swedish Armed Forces Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung gave confirmation of this to SVENSKA DAGBLADET. He said that a limited number of Soviet marine infantry were aboard the squadron. However, the commander in chief denied a report from another source claiming that it was the presence of the marine troops which led to the concentration of Swedish commandos in the Blekinge Archipelago.

"It was not necessary to see the presence of marines as an indication of an imminent rescue attempt," the commander in chief said. The Soviet Union holds regular landing exercises along the coasts of the Baltic. According to the commander in chief, it is not unusual for Soviet ships to have infantry troops on board. Soviet marines were transferred to the ships lying outside Swedish territorial waters on a couple of occasions while submarine U-137 was in Swedish territorial waters.

SVENSKA DAGBLADET has been unable to ascertain how the Swedish Armed Forces were able to acquire this information. Nor has it been able to discover the size of the forces involved.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS VOTE NO CONFIDENCE IN CAGATAY

TA071316 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1300 GMT 7 Dec 81

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly today passed the motion of nonconfidence against the Cagatay government. The motion was submitted by the Communal Liberal Party, the Republican Turkish Party and the Democratic People's Party [DPP]. The motion was passed by a vote of 21 to 17. The Turkish Unity Party deputy from Girne [Kyrenia] Mustafa Haciahmetoglu, who was abroad, did not participate in the voting.

In a statement following the toppling of his government, Mustafa Cagatay said he would submit his resignation to President Rauf Denktas after the assembly session ended. Commenting on the voting, DPP leader Nejat Konuk said he hoped the new situation emerging as a result of the resignation of the prime minister would be auspicious for the Turkish Cypriot community.

Cagatay Submits Resignation

In a statement to the press after his meeting with Cagatay, Denktas said: Within our democratic order, the opposition parties joined and toppled the government. They toppled it by means of a no-confidence vote. Now it is my duty to discuss the situation with the party leaders, to act in an appropriate way -- a way that suits the community's interests most -- and to give the duty to form a new government to a person I consider most appropriate. Naturally it is not yet clear what is to be done. I will get in touch with the party leaders immediately. I will begin my contacts tomorrow.

In his statement Cagatay said his government had to resign because a no-confidence motion was approved by a vote of 21 - 17. He said that in accordance with the constitution he submitted his resignation to the president, who asked him to remain in power until a new government is formed. Cagatay said he agreed. He added: In line with this request, our government -- working closely with the NUP -- will continue to carry out its duties for the interests of the community until a new government is established. We will continue to carry out our duties with pleasure, as always, until a new government is established. It is impossible to know what sort of situation will arise in the near future or what sort of realities we will be faced with. We will carry out duties until a new government is established. Replying to a question, Cagatay said he would willingly accept an offer to form a new government.

USSR DELEGATION CONCLUDES VISIT, DEPARTS

[Text] The members of the Supreme Soviet delegation, headed by Mr Gilashvili, deputy chairman of the Supreme Soviet Presidium, have concluded their visit to Cyprus and left for Moscow this afternoon. The delegation was seen off at Larnaca airport by Galanos, chairman of the House of Representatives foreign affairs committee, Soviet Ambassador Astavin and Khatzioannou, director general of the House of Representatives.

In a statement prior to his departure, Gilashvili said that during the Soviet delegation's talks in Nicosia, including meetings with Acting President Ladhas and party leaders, an identity of views was established on very basic questions, including the Cyprus issue. The Soviet official expressed the conviction that the delegation's visit will assist in the further strengthening of relations between the parliaments and people of the two countries.

Seeing the Soviet delegation off on behalf of the House of Representatives, Galanos said an identity of views was established on almost all matters which were discussed, and the Soviet Union's first and consistent support was reaffirmed for the Cypriot people's struggle for the full restoration of their sovereign rights. Mr Galanos also said that following an invitation from the Supreme Soviet, a parliamentary interparty delegation will visit the Soviet Union next year.

ULUSU CERTAIN COUNTRY WILL RETURN TO DEMOCRACY

[Text] Ankara, 7 Dec (AA) -- "Turkey will return to the democratic system, not because of external pressures but because it is the system the Turks deserve," Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu told a group of visiting Federal German journalists.

Turkey always took into account positive criticism leveled by her friends, Ulusu noted, complaining that there had been criticism neither positive nor based on realities. "Kemalism is a contemporary and living philosophy for Turks," Ulusu said, having summed up the (?aims) of the 12 September 1980 operation by the Turkish armed forces. "Our aim is reestablishing democracy in such a way that no new interventions will be required. The Turkish army has proven many times that it is the preserver of the Turkish democracy and Ataturk's principles. I am sure that it will keep its promise this time too, as in the case of 1960 and 1971," he said.

Referring to alleged human rights violations in Turkey, the prime minister said such rumours were fabricated by circles of terrorism installed abroad wishing to incite violence in Turkey but "the Turkish Government is determined to safeguard liberties and fundamental rights." He went on to say, in brief, in reply to a question: "Turkey would withdraw from European organizations at her own will in case she was faced with the threat of expulsion. Turkey wants to cooperate with European countries and is already an integral part of Europe, but if they try to expel her, she would be prepared to leave those organizations herself."

"Turkey and the United States are independent countries. Therefore, they will decide freely on this point. We will discuss this problem within the context of NATO. We will permit them if we deem it necessary, [but] we will not permit them otherwise," Ulusu said, when asked whether the government would allow new military bases on Turkish soil.

Referring to the imprisonment of the president of the now-defunct Republican People's Party, Bulent Ecevit, the prime minister said Ecevit acted against a National Security Council communique and the legal decision against him was a judicial one which had nothing to do with the administration.

CAUTION URGED TOWARD ROLE IN U.S. STRATEGY AIMS

NC041213 Istanbul MILLIYET In Turkish 1 Dec 81 pp 2, 14

["Viewpoint" column by Prof Mumtaz Soysal: "Breakwater"]

[Text] Addressing his U.S. audience [in Washington], Metin Toker [journalist and former senator] is reported to have said: "Turkey is a breakwater between the Persian Gulf and the Soviet Union."

This statement sounds true when we look at the map. But when we think that every state has a duty to be a breakwater for its own people first, this may entail different and more serious interpretations than those which may readily come to one's mind. Toker may have added this comment to what was said to those looking at the map.

Everyone has heard and knows that Turkey is under intense pressure originating from Washington. The United States, which wishes to create a pro-American chain of interlinked alliances, stretching from the oil sources to the Indian Ocean, is pursuing a system that will embody Egypt, Sudan, Somalia and Aden on the one hand, and a line of defense stretching from Israel, across Jordan and Iraq, to China, and including Pakistan and even southeast Asian countries.

Within the context of these efforts, the role Turkey would play may look very attractive to those who make decisions by studying maps in Washington. And Turkey could naturally be hard pressed as a result of decisions made this way.

But when the long-term interests of Turkey are taken into consideration, this pressure should be studied from closer quarters, and the attitude to be adopted should be determined very wisely.

The separate visits to be paid to Ankara by U.S. Defense Secretary Weinberger and Secretary of State Haig, one right after another, could be suitable starting points for such a close study. That the pressure exerted on Turkey in connection with the Gulf is accentuated differently by the Pentagon -- that is, the soldiers -- than the State Department -- that is, the diplomats -- has not escaped anyone's attention. The soldiers are impatient to turn Turkey into one of the links in the chain of alliances. They will try to persuade NATO, but if they fail they will then even push NATO aside and place Turkey in another framework. They deem this a very urgent matter. The diplomats have to evaluate Turkey's new role in the light of the internal and external developments and within an entity embarcing the Federal Republic of Germany, the EEC and Western Europe in addition to NATO. For a Turkey torn away from this entity is an unbearable burden for them.

The fact that General Haig, a former Pentagon man, is now secretary of state helps at times to overshadow this difference in emphasis, but at other times this difference manifests itself quite clearly. And Turkey is under complex pressure that is capable of affecting its relations with Western Europe.

This is not only a "West Side story." Apart from relations with Western Europe, there is the question of healthy relations with the Islamic countries and the Third World states -- which are not very friendly toward the United States -- which Turkey has been painfully trying for years to establish. If we add to this the good relations which Turkey has managed to establish with great patience, with the "North Side story" -- that is, with the socialist countries, it becomes clear that in trying "to build a breakwater," Turkey could be hurled into terrible storms.

If you happen to chat with seamen from the Black Sea or the Aegean Sea they will tell you the story about the various breakwaters heedless engineers have built and which have been exposed to winds. Many are breakwaters which, in an effort to counter the northwest winds, are exposed to north or northeast winds. And in trying to offset southwest winds they are exposed to west or southeast winds.

Turkey may not have much experience in engineering, but it is not so unwise as to become a victim of those map lovers of diplomacy, nor should it be.

MORE MEMBERS OF ILLEGAL GROUPS ROUNDED UP

Ankara Arrests

The statement says the members of the former organization carried out various organizational and other activities with the aim of toppling the constitutional order and replacing it with a communist system. It is said that the members of the latter organization held a meeting in Fethiye in order to prepare a congress they would hold outside the country. They also collected 143,000 Turkish liras in Ankara to help their high-ranking leaders.

In searches conducted in the hideouts of the captured militants, security forces found four pistols, programs and regulations, directives sent by their central organizations, congress booklets of the communist party of a foreign country, banned publications and organizational documents.

GREEK, TURKISH MINISTERS ADDRESS BRUSSELS MEETING

PAPANDREOU MEETS NEWSMEN AFTER BRUSSELS MEETING

[Excerpt] For the first time the Greek issue was clearly raised with NATO, the alliance's responsibilities toward our country were stressed and even the Greek positions were outlined against the NATO position. This was stated tonight by Prime Minister Papandreou in an interview with Greek political editors in Brussels. Earlier, speaking to foreign correspondents and television teams, Prime Minister Papandreou had expressed his wonder at the dispatches by foreign news agencies concerning the Greek positions and attributed these dispatches to apparently wrong information.

The prime minister said: The Greek people have elected the new government to guarantee our country's independence, national sovereignty and territorial integrity. Both I personally and my associates are determined to carry this out in full. Referring to the first meeting today of the NATO Defense Planning Group at the defense ministers level, Mr Papandreou said the Greek side outlined the problems of our country concerning its defense and security. More specifically, it has been demanded that Cyprus be completely demilitarized. It was stressed that the Greek Government will not accept any arrangement which would deprive our armed forces of the right and obligation to defend Greek territory, and it was emphasized that there is evidence proving that Turkey's long-term goals are a condominium or partition of the Aegean.

Addresses Greek Officers

[Text] Prime Minister Papandreou spoke last night to Greek officers serving with NATO about the problems Greece is facing in the international field. This took place during a reception given by Greece's delegate to NATO. The prime minister referred to the major issue of Cyprus and stressed that the new Greek Government will not retreat one iota from its positions on Greek waters, airspace and territory.

TURKISH, CANADIAN MINISTERS AGREE ON COOPERATION

[Text] National Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken, who is in Brussels for the NATO defense planning meetings, held talks with Canadian National Defense Minister Gilles Lamontagne. During the meeting, held at NATO Headquarters, the two agreed to set up a working group to hold preliminary contacts on technological and military cooperation between the two countries. The two also agreed to step up efforts to meet certain requirements of the Turkish air force.

The working group, which will be composed of experts from both countries, will meet in the capitals of the two countries to prepare a report that will be discussed at ministerial level.

LUNS: PEACE MOVEMENT NOT AFFECTING FRG STANCE

LD081158 Hamburg DPA in German 0022 GMT 8 Dec 81

[Text] Brussels, 8 Dec (DPA) -- The peace movement and the efforts for unilateral disarmament, in the view of NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns, have no effect on FRG policy within NATO. In an interview with DPA, Luns said in Brussels on Monday: "We have admiration and respect for the chancellor's loyalty to the alliance, and also for the loyalty of the foreign minister and defense minister."

In contrast with others, the Federal Government reacted wisely, Luns said. The Bundestag debate on the Bonn talks between the chancellor and Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev confirmed that there was a "great consensus" in the FRG about the policy of the last 10 years.

Luns accounted for Brezhnev's conciliatory attitude in Bonn primarily with reference to the fact that the recent proposals on disarmament from U.S. President Ronald Reagan was a surprise for Moscow. The NATO secretary general is counting on results from the Geneva by 1983, for otherwise the new U.S. weapons will be stationed in Europe. "The Russians know that, and Schmidt told Brezhnev this very clearly and very astutely."

Luns said that the Soviets would "occasionally like to hear" from Schmidt on "what motivates the U.S. Government." They could not assess President Reagan exactly. "Thus I believe that the chancellor can do quite useful work."

On the question of the present attitude of the Soviet Government, Luns thought that the military had too great a say. With the exception of arms all the major plans in the social sphere and in the area of living standards had failed. The people there were -- in contrast with the West -- proud of this weaponry. The Soviet Union recognizes much better than Europe the weight of power in world politics. The new U.S. President also knows what it means to be weak.

In his interview with DPA, Luns spoke of an improvement in the relations between the United States and Europe. "They (the Americans) realize that one cannot go around making all kinds of statements which cannot be understood." Reagan's most recent suggestions made a good impression on Europe, and the Europeans and convinced that the United States wants to have serious negotiations with Moscow. It is also a fact that the United States comprehensively consults the Europeans.

Luns took the view that the alliance would have to overcome the peace movements. These movements remain "only a minority." They are beginning to criticize the Soviets as well: "The demonstration in Bucharest was certainly not only against NATO; the Russians will not appreciate that," Luns said.

On the situation in Turkey, Luns said that a deep hatred between former prime minister Bulent Ecevit and Suleman Demirel made democratic government impossible. He also believes that Ecevit will be "comfortably sent" to prison, and that it would be useful for him to be seen as a martyr. The regime would have been wiser not to imprison him. Luns asked people to wait and see whether, after the passing of the new constitution, there would be real democracy in Turkey.

Luns welcomed Spain's entry into NATO. He replied no to the question of whether there were signs of political countermeasures from Moscow. He expressed his conviction that the Soviet Union would not intervene in Poland: "We cannot very well see what the Russians would gain by sending in 200,000 men there." The banning of the independent trade union Solidarity or the imprisonment of its leaders would mean the unleashing of an "immensely grave crisis" in Poland.

INFLUX OF POLES SLOWED BY NEW VISA REGULATIONS

[Text] After the reintroduction of visas for Polish citizens, a total of 510 Poles were denied entry at Austrian border checkpoints yesterday. In about 300 cases, Austrian authorities issued the required visas.

A telephone inquiry by the Austrian Radio and Television Service at several border customs offices in Lower Austria, Upper Austria and Burgenland found that the reintroduction of visas has almost completely stopped the influx of Poles. The Drasenhofen checkpoint reports that not a single Polish citizen entered Austria today, while yesterday 136 were still able to enter. At the Neunagelberg checkpoint the last entry by a Polish citizen was registered on Monday. In Nickelsdorf 150 Poles have been denied entry since the reintroduction of visas.

Meanwhile, the Warsaw government has in turn introduced travel restrictions for Austrians; as of 21 December, Austrian citizens wanting to travel to Poland have to apply for visas again.

KREISKY ANNOUNCES MAJOR ARAB LOANS FOR COUNTRY

AU091125 Vienna KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 9 Dec 81 p 2

[Kurt Seinitz report: "Oil Billions To Flow Into Our Economy"]

Kreisky: "The Arabs are very friendly toward us. Our name has a reputation here. No sooner do we say what we urgently need than we are already getting it generously on the most favorable conditions. They are not narrowminded here toward us. Here we do not need any long-winded negotiations on complicated repayment conditions because they know we will pay them back properly for everything."

The chancellor presents a glum picture of Austria's serious situation: "We must somehow get over the next 7 months. Unless we succeed in getting our economy out of the doldrums in the coming months, things will look very black indeed, in my opinion. That is why a massive business promotion program will be launched in January. We will, so to speak, as a last-minute firefighting action, invest billions. If we succeed in this maneuver, then I see chances of an economic recovery by the end of 1982."

WOERNER URGES STRONGER EUROPEAN TIES WITH U.S.

The union politician said that the United States had learned the lesson of history and would not fall back into isolationism. The Europeans should, however, take seriously the warning by Lawrence Eagleburger, the head of the European department of the U.S. State Department. The previous evening he had said in a discussion that the attitude of the United States would only change when "daily it was said in Europe that the real problem lay in the presence of American troops and weapons." Woerner called it absurd to say of America that it is planning to wage a nuclear or conventional war confined to Europe. NATO stategy is aimed at the prevention of war.

Woerner said that the goal of the relationship between Europe and the United States remains equal partnership. Europe cannot be confined to a merely regional role. Yet a precondition of this is that Europe takes on a greater share of the burdens of the alliance. "At the same time the responsibility of the alliance does not end at NATO's borders." This is made clear by the European contribution to safeguarding peace in Sinai. Woerner demanded a joint European-American strategy in East-West relations, particularly for East-West trade. Policies toward states of the Third World should also be better coordinated.

Egon Klepsch (CDU), chairman of the parliamentary group of the Christian Democrats in the European Parliament, also gave an assurance that there is no doubt about the positive view of the Western alliance in its function as a force for securing peace and freedom. Klepsch expressed concern about the present European situation. Summit politics were bringing hardly any results, the principle of unanimity favored the veto tactics of individual countries and led to self-paralysis. None of the central problems of the community are really being tackled. Klepsch said that there is no lack of fine words in Europe. What is lacking is the turning of perspectives into practical policies.

HONECKER TO VISIT IN 1982; FURTHER ON SUMMIT

[Excerpt] Bonn, 8 Dec (DPA) -- In return for the chancellor's forthcoming visit to Lake Werbellin, SED General Secretary Erich Honecker will visit the FRG next year. It was said in Bonn today that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt intends to invite the SED chief. The chancellor wishes to suggest that the political leaders of the two German states should meet regularly. The next summit meeting should also have the character of a working visit. This would be reflected in the fact that it is not Federal President Karl Carstens who is inviting Honecker for a state visit.

Today, however, there was no official confirmation of hints that Honecker's visit to the FRG is being planned for March. According to what is being said, similar to the chancellor's trip this week to the GDR city of Guestrow, Honecker is to visit his birthplace in Wiebelskirchen in the Saarland.

Federal Minister for Intra-German Affairs Egon Franke, who will accompany Schmidt to Lake Werbellin on Friday, today again warned against exaggerated expectations of concrete results from the summit meeting.

In an article in the Social Democrat weekly VORWAERTS he listed as topics for discussion -- following from the Brezhnev visit to Bonn -- international security and disarmament and the special German responsibility for the preservation of peace in Europe. He said it was a "distorting lens" when the CDU/CSU opposition, on the other hand, called for the discussion of practical intra-German problems with corresponding results. No one should force the Federal Government into a policy toward the GDR of seeking only easier conditions for the people.

Opposition leader Helmut Kohl basically welcomed the Schmidt-Honecker meeting while speaking to the CDU/CSU parliamentary group today but he said it is wrong to see it as a result of the Brezhnev visit to Bonn, and wrong above all to talk about missiles. Schmidt and Honecker should concentrate on intra-German topics and on an improvement of human relations with balanced concessions and reciprocal concessions.

In Bonn today, the chancellor discussed the topics for the summit meeting with his delegation and Berlin's governing Mayor Richard von Weizsaecker (CDU). Together with Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff and Egon Franke, who are accompanying him to Lake Werbellin, the meeting was also attended by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Federal Justice Minister Juergen Schmude and top representatives of other ministries. [Federal Government Spokesman] Kurt Becker did not give any details of the discussion.

In order to have more time for the chancellor's visit to Guestrow, the program for Sunday has been tightened somewhat. The chancellor's press conference after a breakfast with Honecker and the final meeting of the delegations has been brought forward from 1100 to 1015. According to the program, Schmidt will leave the press center at 1130 and wishes to leave the Hubertusstock lodge at 1200 with Honecker for their drive together to Guestrow. The two politicians' arrival there is planned for 1430 and Schmidt's departure for Hamburg for 1745.

BRANDT EXPECTS IMPROVED RELATIONS WITH GDR

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt expects the forthcoming intra-German summit to lead to a higher quality of relations between the two German states and an expansion of contacts between the political leaders. In an interview for the DEUTSCHES ALLGEMEINES SONNTAGSBLATT published today, Brandt states that if the meeting takes a "reasonable" course, there will be a number of tasks for the two governments on individual issues of intra-German relations. "A new result might be, however, that an increase in frequency of political contacts will arise from the fact of being neighbors, something which so far has been lacking."

The quality of political relations and exchange of views with the GDR leadership should not lag behind that which the Federal Republic has developed during the past years in its relations with other partners of the Warsaw Pact. Brandt mentioned as an example the fact that the European governments in the West and East repeatedly emphasized during the Afghan crisis last year that their relations should not be harmed as a result of the deterioration in relations between the two superpowers. For the first time, this also applies to the governments in Bonn and East Berlin.

Brandt endorsed the view, frequently expressed by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and SED General Secretary Erich Honecker in recent times regarding the two German states' special responsibility with respect to East-West relations and the preservation of peace in Europe. This special responsibility could, not only for geopolitical but also for historical reasons, be a starting point for developing intra-German relations, the SPD leader said, "also as far as those responsible in the other German state are concerned, by the way."

FRG-U.S. RELATIONS REFLECT 'CONFIDENCE CRISIS'

[Guenther Gillessen editorial: "The Deteriorated Image of America"]

[Text] At a highway truck stop deep in Tennessee, a Danish jounalist and two American truck drivers sat together at midnight a few days ago. The Dane told them about Europe and regretted that the Europeans contribute too little to the West's common security. The truck drivers, two strong men, comforted him: "Don't worry; we will come and get you out of it." But it is not as simple as the two imagined. If for no other reason this discussion is worth noting because it shows something of the generosity of the American nation as reflected among the common people. The Germans experienced this humanity in many ways in 1945 when the Americans moved in.

America is a nation that is not held together by ethnic origins as the European people are, but by political values. What makes the descendants of so many European, African and Asian peoples a new nation of Americans is the common political belief. It is the belief that the state, its constitution and all its institutions are destined to protect freedom and that all citizens must help each other do this.

If you read the speech of U.S. Ambassador Burns given to the German Foreign Policy Society, and if you compare what has been said in the past months in Washington, from political rostrums in the Federal Republic and in protests during Secretary of State Haig's visit to Berlin about America's role played in Europe, you understand better that German-American relations do not merely reflect differences of opinion on the advisability of a certain security policy or on which method better promotes disarmament policy; these relations reflect some sort of confidence crisis.

What is now causing difficulties in U.S.-German relations is not "differences of interests" in the classic doctrine about the great interests of states, what has happened here has nothing to do with foreign policy but with a domestic political crisis in the awareness of European nations, particuarly the Germans. What Burns said hits the heart of the matter: The Europeans, and particularly the Germans, do not quite see what values their state should serve and to what end they should use the freedom which the year 1945 has given them. They do not even consider this freedom to be a value worth being protected.

A generation of people has grown up some of whom can do longer differentiate between political systems -- and this generation is making the highest moral claim with regard to policy, namely that of nonviolence, but it disregards just that in dealing with its fellow beings; it instead advocates keeping nature clean -- a good and serious cause -- but it betrays this with the dirt of scatological language with the slander of those who think differently and with disregard for democratic institutions and procedures. These are young people who consider everybody else as spiritually corrupt and who trust nobody, young people who believe they must consider institution and the regular, tested procedures of understanding, debate and decisionmaking as "structural violence."

The deteriorated image young Germans have of the United States has little to do with reality. It seems rather to be a reflection of the Federal Republic as a state considered worthless and treated accordingly by many politicians. Is the students' anti-Americanism a form of self-hatred in the Federal Republic?

It is no comfort to know that this phenomenon currently applies only to some the young people, particularly among students. The phenomenon is alarming because it can gain ground. It has spread to the adults who are not convinced themselves by the basic values contained in the basic rights and the constitution. The doubts of the adults can be seen in their permissive child raising and in their own way of life.

These young people, who are opting out of the democratic state and its institutions, consider the Social Democratic Federal Government to be as unworthy of confidence as a "bourgeois" government. It did not pay for the SPD leadership to pay lip service to the youth of 1968 and the seventies instead of first protecting the institutions and the valid law before entering a "dialogue."

The domestic political crisis and the loss of confidence by young people has in the meantime affected how the Federal Republic's foreign policy stands are determined. The toying of one segment of Social Democratic politicians with this mood -- Willy Brandt must be named first of all -- causes a tendency toward foreign policy neutrality and "equidistance" regarding the East and West by doubting the American desire for peace and by trying to create the necessity of German mediation "between the big powers." There is also a moral aspect to this in that both big powers appear to be equally evil. In reality, however, this reflects their own unfounded philosophical standpoint and their own nihilism which fails to see the difference between a liberal constitutional state and totalitarian dictatorship, and which disregards the difference of political aims in the Soviet Union and in the United States.

EUROPEAN SECURITY MAY DEPEND ON BONN'S POLICY

[Commentary signed RM: "In Geneva -- or in Bonn?"]

[Text] It is a great opportunity and simultaneously a serious danger that is inherent in the Geneva missile disarmament negotiations which the United States and the Soviet Union will open on this Monday. The opportunity is that the Soviet Union will reduce its advance armament in medium-range missiles because otherwise it would have to fear that NATO will go through with its counterarming decision. The Soviet Union could agree to such a reduction without running any risk. Even thereafter it would be quite comfortably off militarily: In the field of long-range missiles as well as in the case of the short-range missiles it is equal to the West, and in conventional forces it is so superior over the West that a balance seems to be beyond the realm of possibility. This ought to satisfy even a Soviet security requirement that has been hiked quite far.

But things may well turn out differently. What if the West, with a view to the Geneva negotiations, keeps postponing its counterarmament so that ultimately the postponement turns into abandonment? This would be devastating for Europe's security, for the existence of the alliance. The Soviets will do everything conceivable to get to this point, and they have a means for doing it, too: tedious negotiations. The time thus gained works for the Soviet Union, provided the "peace movement" with its campaign against Western counterarmament makes any headway, if it constantly gains a greater following among the people and if it can increase its pressure on the governments. Moscow will support the peace movement to the best of its abilities -- it is already in the process of doing so, for instance, in Denmark. There, the Soviet Embassy picked up part of the bill for the "peace propaganda" of naive democrats which it deemed useful. With regard to the Bonn peace demonstration of 10 October, the DKP had its finger in the pie, silently but all the more effectively.

It all boils down to the question of what the will for defense of the West Europeans will be like in 1983, whether the Federal Republic, above all, will be prepared to accept the U.S. medium-range weapons system 2 years from now if no accord is reached in Geneva by then. The chancellor, the foreign minister, the opposition propose to handle it that way. But the counterforces in the two coalition parties are growing. Hence, will West Europe's security against Soviet extortive superiority ultimately depend more on West German internal policy than on the Geneva negotiations?

NATO CAN SURVIVE WITHOUT PAPANDREOU'S GREECE

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "NATO Stumbles On"]

[Text] It has been said many times that NATO is dead. Similar to the Regensburg Reichstag, which once dragged on from one decade to the other, the alliance was panting but always able to catch up with the future. The NATO conferences were oases along the way through the desert of Atlantic imperfection. In retrospect they have been stations permitting survival. Whenever the defense ministers met in the Defense Planning Committee (DPC) -- in this body the politicians and generals work out the military and strategic programs -- agreement was achieved. It was frequently weak, but the alliance could at least stumble toward the next conference. The complementing foreign ministers' meeting temporarily bound the various sovereign states more firmly. It is, therefore, not so bold to predict that the winter meeting coming to an end this week, will give the Atlantic caravan the strength to stumble on to the next phase, the spring conference.

The main issue will be NATO's dual decision. But there are also sideline issues full of political dynamite. NATO will have to point out that one of the prerequisites for the continuation of the pact is the action of its members in conformity to the alliance. The Greeks must be told that they cannot always play the role of the insulted and the one who makes constant demands without offering credible action in return. If Papandreou acts simultaneously as prime minister, and defense minister, presuming the position of some sort of superior with regard to the other ministers, he must be told that his country is just a part, and not even the most important one, of a comprehensive pact system.

Greece's geostrategic situation is significant, but Turkey's is more so. In our technical age the territory of the Greeks can be left out. The Turks, however, are a bastion going beyond Europe. They have an army that can establish a balance with regard to the Russian concentration at the northern border of Iran. So one could do without Athens if need be, but not without Ankara. If this realization prevails, the claim of the new Greek Government to voice a willful opinion on the membership of Spain and on American bases will lose much of its blackmailing strength.

It will also be important for the Atlantic climate to improve in Brussels. What is meant is the relationship between America and Europe. The partners are lucky to find a friend of the old continent in the person of the U.S. secretary of state. As the former NATO commander in chief, Haig knows the alliance. One will always find understanding on his part. But the Reagan government has several faces. It is more difficult to get along with Caspar Weinberger. The secretary of defense also feels he is the administrator of the strongest military force of the alliance. He is right in demanding that the alliance should respect the performance of the Americans.

The Atlantic meeting will also offer an opportunity to inform the Western public more comprehensively about American strategic conceptions. The misunderstanding must be eliminated that the United States wants a limited war in Europe to permit the American continent to evade a strategic nuclear clash. Nothing in the American strategic conception points to such planning. Granted, the American security policy has always followed a zigzag course. First it was "massive retaliation," then "satisfied destruction" and now the strategy of a balance which is supposed to demonstrate in a placardized way American security policy in the nuclear age.

Many Europeans have not realized that despite the American vacillation with regard to detailed nuclear issues, American analysts followed the line of trying to avoid and not wage war. Along with technical perfection of arms systems, concern was growing that the refined modern combat means could overcome human common sense and political reason.

Parallel to the system of deterrence a system has come about that figures out, combines and predicts what would happen if deterrence did not work. The suggestion of the specialists: limitation of zones and means of war, if one considers what would happen if the unthinkable took place. The respective strategic conceptions do not indicate, however, that America pursues the aim of abrogating the nuclear responsibility of the entire alliance. Haig and Weinberger should make this clear once again to the Europeans.

IMBALANCES IN NATO DEFENSE BURDENS VIEWED

[Thomas Kielinger commentary: "A Signal From the Senate"]

[Text] It becomes more evident each day that the Atlantic alliance not only finds itself in an imbalance of forces vis-a-vis the Warsaw Pact but that there also exists a gross imbalance in the sharing of defense burdens within the alliance proper. How long will this work?

Here is an example: In Turkey, the most important partner country at NATO's southeastern flank, it is left to the U.S. defense secretary these days to confer a certain degree of respectability and importance on the current military government, which the Europeans threaten to destroy. In times of utmost international anxiety people in Europe fancy themselves in the role of moralizers, leaving the efforts toward power-political cohesion to the United States and perhaps even sneer at such efforts, calling them "Reagan's coming to terms with the colonels."

Another example is that the consensus for sharing additional defense burdens is further decreasing in the individual alliance countries. Here, too, the gap between Europe and the United States is growing. Notwithstanding the huge additional expenditures, President Reagan's defense budget succeeded in taking the hurdles in Congress. In an urgent letter to the Senate the President recalled once again that what matters now, above all with a view to the Geneva negotiations, is to set the right signals, for successes in negotiations can be achieved only "if the Soviets realize that we are determined to restore the military balances." The Senate's approval for the construction of the B-1 superbomber is such a signal.

One might have thought that the burden of such reasoning would be incumbent on all the alliance partners, but instead it is being left to Washington, and on top of this, criticism is voiced that "Reagan is dismantling the social state." Does one actually believe the defense sacrifices are easy for the Americans?

PRESS VIEWS SITUATION AT BRUSSELS NATO SESSION

DW091149 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German 0605 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Excerpts] MANNHEIMER MORGEN discusses the Brussels NATO meeting: NATO faces not only external but also internal problems. It became apparent at the final annual session of the NATO ministers what a difficult partner Greece will be in the future under its new Socialist government. Prime Minister Papandreou is trying to sell his good conduct as dearly as possible with regard to such issues as Spain's NATO membership in return for financial, trade-political and military benefits from the United States and other NATO countries to the advantage of his own country. He is following a similar strategy in the European Community, where Athens is blocking important decisions to gain greater advantages for Greece.

BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG carries the following comment: Greece was playing a risky poker game at the Brussels NATO conference, but has now given in for the time being.

First there was even talk of quitting the military alliance. Now Greece wants to be loyal to integration, but is making certain demands for guarantees regarding Turkey. The second point was Spain's request to join NATO. With its rejection, Socialist Greece wanted to help the fraternal Socialist Party of Spain, but now a joint decision of the Eurogroup has come about welcoming Spain's request to join NATO. This in no way means that the final word has been said, but it is the first step toward further parliamentary consideration in individual states.

RHEINPFALZ of Ludwigshafen points out: Like Mitterrand, Papandreou had to overcome his ideological restraints prior to turning away from his election promises. It is a fact, however, that the Greek Socialist, as well as his French counterpart, have achieved the opposite for the alliance of what had been feared prior to their election victories. With their clear statements -- and in the case of the French this came despite military disintegration -- they have rendered a great service to the stability of the alliance. The demonstrative cohesion shown yesterday in Brussels was probably of great value for the Western position at the Geneva disarmament negotiations.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH LAOS TO RESUME

BK080330 Hong Kong AFP in English 0236 GMT 8 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Bangkok, 8 Dec (AFP) -- France and Laos have agreed to reopen their embassies in Vientiane and Paris effective today, their embassies here announced. A brief communique said the decision followed "conversations between their representatives." This was understood to have been at the United Nations in New York. France and Laos broke off relations in August, 1978, after Vientiane accused France and the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) of trying to spark a coup against the pro-Soviet Pathet Lao government that took power, with Vietnamese support, on Dec 2, 1975.

It was not immediately clear what had paved the way for the resumption of relations, nor the level at which they were back.

Last Feb 9, then French Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet had said, "Diplomatic relations between Paris and Vientiane could be resumed only if the Laotian Government renounced the slanderous accusations that caused the rupture." As recently as last May, France was also reported to be demanding the simultaneous reopening of cultural centers closed since relations were cut. The process of rapproachement apparently picked up steam after the May 10 election of Franch President Francois Mitterrand, a Socialist. Mr Mitterrand, replying to a warm congratulatory message from Laotian head of state Souphanouvong, had expressed the hope that "a new dialogue between France and Laos could be established through the intermediary, for example, of permanent representatives to the United Nations."

DE ROSE SLAMS GRADUATED RESPONSE STRATEGY

I -- 'Serious Crisis'

PM081605 Paris LE MONDE in French 21 Nov 81 p 5

[Part I of article by Francois de Rose, former permament representative to the Atlantic Council: "Updating Deterrence"]

[Text] The will to defend is undergoing a serious crisis. Although deterrence seemed to guarantee the old continent's security effectively for more than 30 years, we are witnessing a deterioration in confidence in the ability of a strategy based on the threat of the use of nuclear weapons in the framework of the "graduated response" to prevent a conflict. The result is that the NATO nuclear capability is striking large sections of opinion in several countries as containing a threat of war in itself.

Since fear is a bad counselor, the reactions it is producing run counter to what could remove the cause. An objective analysis of the situation shows that deterrence is not dead and that, with an appropriate doctrine and means, there is no reason why the hypothesis of a conflict should be less dangerous for the enemy than for us.

The following does not mean that we should regard as more probable a Soviet attack, conventional or nuclear, at a time chosen by the Kremlin. The best strategy will always be one which brings the fruits of victory without fighting. But international relations are governed by what each knows of his own and the enemy's capabilities and vulnerabilities. It is this assessment, wrongly considered as unfavorable in Europe, which is grist to the mill of Soviet propaganda and of neutralism.

Therefore it is important to know the real strengths and weaknesses in order to move a little more confidently in this dangerous world.

Two Doctrines

In 32 years the Atlantic alliance has been given two defense doctrines: "massive retaliation" from 1949 through the early sixties, "graduated response" since then.

The change from the former to the latter took place when the USSR acquired its first ICBMs. Today the balance of forces in Europe has been changed from what it was when the graduated response was adopted. It is, therefore, legitimate to ask whether this second concept is and will always remain valid.

While the Western countries enjoyed superiority in theater nuclear weapons they were able to threaten to use them if a conventional battle turned to their disadvantage. The response would have been adapted to the level of force chosen by the aggressor, who would be forced to raise the stakes at all levels to obtain a decision.

This is like a heavyweight and a lighweight boxer. The first would be able to adjust his pressure to the latter's strength. But the reverse could not be done.

This situation has changed. There is scarcely any doubt that the Red Army could "control the escalation" just as well as NATO. It is, at least in theory, capable of launching a first strike at some time in the future which would be capable of eliminating a large section of the conventional and nuclear defenses in Europe.

Since the graduated response is also with the Soviets' capabilities, the danger of escalation is at least as great for the victim as for the aggressor. Since an alliance's superiority in one sphere is no longer compensated by the other's advantage in another sphere, the doctrine which is based on the balance of imbalances ceases to exist.

We are now in the uncomfortable situation in which the balance of forces at different levels gives the enemy and not us the choice of weapons and hence of the concept that he would apply in case of attack.

When the United States had superiority in the tactical nuclear arms sphere, the Soviet doctrine as expressed in particular by Marshal Sokolovskiy was that the destruction of the enemy's nuclear arms would be "vital to the victorious course of the military operations." Today we are told that the Red Army will never resort to using nuclear arms first. But at the same time Marshal Ustinov is warning the countries which accept the Euromissiles on their territory that they are exposing themselves to being a target for nuclear attacks.

The Soviet Union can choose between conventional or nuclear war. It is very possible that Marshal Sokolovskiy's views are still valid. It is also plausible that the Red Army might use its conventional superiority to move toward the West, leaving the Western countries to make the "agonizing" decision to use nuclear weapons knowing that, as soon as this first use has been made, even at a limited level in keeping with the "graduated response," the Soviet arsenal could destroy the entire old continent, with industrial and demographic as well as military targets.

In other words, the flexible response which claimed to present the enemy with a more difficult problem no longer fulfills that requirement. It is the West which would be exposed to the greater risk by taking the nuclear initiative in keeping with the present concepts: that of the destruction of Europe without involving Soviet territory.

Defenses Which Are Increasingly Difficult To Penetrate

The Europeans' mistake was to regard the threat posed by the SS-20 missiles as the most important change in the balance of forces on their continent.

The change has taken place at all levels, and the most important change stems from the NATO air forces' growing difficulty in penetrating the rapidly developing Soviet defenses. Hence the need to deploy the Pershing and cruise missiles, which is justified not so much by the need to counter the SS-20 as by the need to restore the possibility of hitting the main enemy, the only one with nuclear weapons, at home. In other words, even if the Soviets had not modernized their arsenal it would have been just as necessary for the Western countries to modernize theirs. This is because the real changes which have occurred are in the sphere of vulnerability. Europe's vulnerability increased whereas the Soviet Union's vulnerability was diminishing.

It is this imbalance which the USSR would like to "freeze" by negotiations or, if it succeeded in preventing the deployment of the new U.S. missiles in Europe, by a major thrust toward "decoupling," thus creating a gap between the European theater and the U.S. strategic forces. If, however, purely military targets in the USSR were hit, the Kremlin would be forced to choose between reprisals against U.S. territory, which would force it to take a major step on the ladder to all-out war, or refraining, which would amount to accepting the unilateral strike by the United States. The two options are equally unattractive. This dilemma largely explains its bitter opposition to the modernization of NATO's theater nuclear forces, not to mention the vast political consequences of the Europeans' acceptance of a precedent establishing that they could not have weapons on their territory for their defense which were not tolerated by Moscow!

The same mistake led those European countries, and now the United States, to accept and moreover to demand negotiations on the SS-20 missiles and Backfire bombers against the Pershing II and cruise missiles. The fact that this was inevitable for political reasons should not make us forget that such negotiations would relate to virtually all U.S. arms in Europe capable of reaching Russia, leaving out 90 percent of the Soviet weapons which can destroy us.

There is something wrong in a series of arguments leading opinions in many countries to be more worried by the deployment of weapons systems intended to defend them than by the existence of thousands of Soviet missiles, aircraft and guns which constantly threaten them.

If deterrence is to work in Europe, the outbreak of hostilities must lead to an attack on military targets on its territory by U.S. missiles, thus forcing the Soviet leaders into the choice explained above. We must now turn what is still just a simple eventuality into a concept, instead of the interpretation unfortunately given to some of President Reagan's statements.

To put it bluntly, this means that NATO, instead of being based on a graduated response, must adopt the principle that, whatever the level of a nuclear attack on Europe, it would immediately lead to an attack on Soviet military targets, with large-scale destruction, to counter the continuation of Warsaw Pact operations. Since Moscow is trying to separate Europe from the United States, the Western powers' military response must be to unite the territories of Europe and the USSR [as published] in an inseparable way for the purpose of their defense operations.

While the ocean creates an enormous gulf between the main Atlantic power and its allies, there is continuity between the Russian land mass and Europe. This situation is to our disadvantage in all spheres: lines of communication, reinforcements, deployment of forces... not to mention the fairly psychological consequences in all spheres...aside from one: the probability that, once military operations have been launched toward the West on this continent, they could be extended to the East without a continuity problem. The proposal that any nuclear attack in Europe would being a response on the USSR's territory thus seems to be the only one which could put geography on our side. For is, as Bismarck said, geography is the only constant element in international relations, it has not lost its importance for strategy, despite the missiles.

If you want to make a nuclear attack less probable, it is important not to be in an inferior position in the conventional sphere such that NATO would be forced to use its tactical nuclear arms immediately or capitulate. The weaker conventional forces are, the earlier it will be necessary to resort to nuclear weapons.

Middle Course

The question of the level of conventional means which NATO should have is inevitably raised by the evolution of forces. A reasonable middle course should be sought between the United States, which wants to be able to contain the Warsaw Pact forces for months, and the Europeans, who are prepared to put up resistance for a few days only.

At this stage it is necessary to restate that hostilities in Europe would not, this time, be decided by the industrial potential of the warring sides but by what they would be able to deploy right from the start. As far as the old continent is concerned, the strategy of giving way in order to gain time will no longer be a response to superior ground strength.

When trying to evaluate the time factor, it is appropriate to take into account some factors which are not all to our disadvantage.

1 -- It is rather unlikely that the Soviet military hierarchy underestimates the Western forces in a rivalry in which technology plays a large part. If this is the case, a possible attack would only be launched with means far greater than those they would immediately encounter. These means must, therefore, constantly be such that no attack could be launched without previous troop and equipment buildups which would announce an imminent invasion.

2 -- If hostilities were limited to Europe, the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force would be able to intervene following the scenarios so frequently rehearsed in the annual NATO maneuvers. But if the conflict started outside the zone covered by the Washington treaty, in the Gulf for instance, it could be that, for considerations of speed, the first U.S. forces in that theater would have to be taken from Germany.

Despite this the Europeans should be in a position not to "panic" and to fill the gaps. But the United States should also not delay in restoring their combat positions, and should not neglect the psychological importance, for both camps, of reinforcements arriving from the other side of the Atlantic. Since the rapidity of their arrival counts even more than their numbers in the initial phases of a conflict, reinforcements, however powerful, would be of no use if the forces on the spot were incapable of holding their position until their arrival.

The events in Poland are important in this discussion. Moscow's obvious embarrassment bears witness to the Soviet system's fundamental political fragility in the satellite countries. It is difficult to imagine that, if hostilities were not victoriously completed in a few days, vast subversive movements would not break out in those countries. The Red Army's lines of communication would be threatened, and not only in Poland. Each day which showed the Russians' inability to crush their adversaries in the Free World would raise the hopes and courage of their "allies-cum-enemies."

Consequently the question of how the Atlantic powers could put forward a set of forces capable of resisting for several weeks without abandoning the greater part of Europe, is central to our problem. It is a much bigger question than the one raised by the United States of the percentage increase in a particular country's defense budget. It would be less difficult to solve if there were an overall strategic concept restoring deterrence, of which it is the first and vital element, and in which the neutron bomb would be included.

II -- 'Necessary Catalyst'

[Text] The campaign launched in Europe against the introduction of the neutron bomb into the NATO arsenal is based essentially on two arguments.

1 -- It would have the effect of lowering the nuclear threshold. This is forgetting that Europe's defense doctrine is based on the use of nuclear weapons as soon as the Atlantic alliance's forces are no longer able to cope. By rejecting the neutron bomb the Europeans would simply force the allied command to use, in friendly territories, arms which have a much more devastating effect on the demographic, economic and cultural environment.

The nuclear threshold does not depend on the characteristics of a particular nuclear weapon but on the ability or inability to stop the enemy with conventional weapons. If the neutron bomb and the effort in the conventional sphere are simultaneously rejected, the result will be to have the choice between using nuclear weapons which will cause more extensive damage and accepting defeat.

2 -- The United States is urging the adoption of this weapon because it would mean abandoning the deterrence concept and accepting battle with the idea -- or illusion -- that it would be possible to win it. This battle would obviously take place on the old continent and exclude the two superpowers' territories.

Unless you are convinced that humanitarian considerations are behind the Soviet campaign against this "cannibalistic" weapon, this campaign probably reveals above all how complicated its introduction would make the Red Army's task if it were to attack us. The aim is not to aspire to win a possible war in Europe but to make the prospects of immediate victory for the enemy more difficult. In this connection Moscow's threat to produce the enhanced radiation weapon too should not frighten anybody. It would not be to our disadvantage for the invasion forces to use weapons 10 or 100 times less powerful than the ones we know they possess. Moreover the idea that the neutron bomb is part of a plan intended to ensure that operations are not extended to the superpowers' territories disregards the parallel decision to deploy the Euromissiles, whose function, as we have rightly seen, is to pose the threat of this extension.

In any case President Reagan's decision on the enhanced radiation weapon is the reasonable consequence of the Western countries' inferiority in the conventional sphere. Nobody in either Europe or America, be he for or against this decision, should use it as an excuse not to develop his conventional forces. In short, we can say that the Western allies, who originally drew up a concept which was in keeping with their superiority in some sectors, have maintained that concept in spite of alterations in the parameters of that original superiority. Although it is not possible to go back, this concept must be updated. To do this it is appropriate to take account of the enemy's weak points. He is showing them to us himself by the efforts he is making to prevent our taking advantage of them.

To place these factors at the service of deterrence in Europe and boost the Europeans' confidence in that deterrence, the Western powers must:

1 -- Have a conventional force capable of preventing a surprise operation and of forcing the aggressor to make an all-out effort, which knows that any conflict of some length involves the risk of domestic troubles in the satellite countries; and 2 -- Clearly announce that the graduated response doctrine will be modified in such a way that: The neutron bomb will be used as soon as necessary to counter the enemy's tank superiority. Nuclear attacks will be made on military targets in the USSR as soon as the Red Army has made such attacks on West Europe.

As soon as it was established that vulnerability is not the exclusive lot of the Western countries, that there are ways of exploiting the enemy's weak points and that, if the structure of forces and the doctrine governing their use takes account of them, any attack, nuclear or conventional, would face the aggressor with "agonizing" decisions. The people would again be able to understand that the defense efforts asked of them were being asked with the prospect not of a conflict "lost in advance" but of preventing that conflict.

A Role for France

France would obviously have a role to play in this context.

Mr Giscard d'Estaing stated several times that France's security was closely linked with that of its neighbors. Mr Mitterrand and his government have demonstrated the prime importance which is attached to this security by taking a stance in favor of the deployment of the Pershing and cruise missiles. Raymond Barre spoke of "extended deterrence." Pierre Mauroy, his successor, in his first general policy statement devoted to defense questions, did not merely categorically reject any idea of "neutralism" or "isolationism." He specified that "an attack on France does not begin when an enemy penetrates national territory."

To be more precise, we can examine France's contributions to the overall defense in the nuclear, conventional and logistical spheres.

1 -- Back in 1974 the Ottawa declaration recognized the contribution made by the French and British strategic forces to the total deterrence. There is scarcely any doubt that the mere existence in Europe of two independent decision making centers capable of using nuclear weapons must seriously complicate the plans of a possible aggressor. Of course, if a strategic exchange were to take place between France, or Britain and the USSR, these two Western nations could be wiped off the map. But the damage caused to the Soviet Union's urban and economic infrastructure would be considerable. Thus it would have to assess this in relation to its position toward the United States and China. With such a prospect, the destruction of one or two medium-sized powers in West Europe could seem pointlessly costly.

2 -- France's geographical position would give it a vital role in the logistics of any conflict. It is not possible to defend the continent on the narrow strip of territory which separates the Oder-Neisse line from the Western borders of Germany and Belgium against an empire having unlimited space. Only France can offer the access to the Atlantic, the airport facilities, the lines of communication, oil pipelines and so forth without which it would be impossible to control a conflict even for a few days. Detailed preparations for this eventuality constitute one of the main elements of its contribution to strengthening deterrence in Europe.

3 -- If there was an agreement recognizing that the allies should be capable of fighting at the conventional level for some time, it would be necessary for the French 1st Army, scheduled to intervene in the capacity of general reserves, to correspond to the same norms. Otherwise the country would not be able to play its role in the continent's common defense. That would run counter to its interests, its European policy and its commitments.

France's security is based on an assurance: the assurance supplied by the alliance to which it belongs, and a secondary assurance conferred by its strategic armaments. It could not sacrifice either, or one to the other. But it can strengthen the former without making any change in its position toward the integrated system as defined by General De Gaulle in 1966.

The president and the competent government members have repeatedly stated that France would join them if the clauses of the Washington and Brussels treaties were brought into play. In the speech already mentioned Mr Mauroy made specific reference to the treaties which created the WEU and which contain a much more specific promise of help than the NATO treaty in the event of an attack on one of the signatories.

Some people think that, by demanding an independent defense policy, France is trying to shirk its responsibilities within the Free World in case of crisis or conflict. It seems that the reverse is true.

Owing to its political influence, its geographical position and the size and variety of its forces, it has advantages which may be decisive both for defense and deterrence. Its decision to intervene or keep out would be bound to alter the elements of a confrontation radically for both camps.

It is well known that Paris did not agree to the graduated response doctrine. Is there reason to hope, if some of the ideas put forward here were deemed useful, that this quarrel is a thing of the past and that there could be greater convergence between France and its allies on the doctrine needed to safeguard their common security?

In the present disturbing situation, such a rapprochement may be the vital catalyst for a reduction in Europe's military vulnerability to reduce the political vulnerability of opinion.

GENEVA TALKS MAY THREATEN FRENCH DETERRENT

PM071511 Paris LE FIGARO in French 30 Nov 81 p 2

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "Washington and Moscow Tempted by All-Embracing Negotiations"]

[Text] The conference starting in Geneva on medium-range (over 1,000 km) theater nuclear weapons may justifiably arouse feelings of skepticism and weariness. Skepticism because SALT I and II, which related to strategic weapons (those which hit and destroy the very heart of the enemy), did not stop the arms race. Weariness because the SALT II negotiations, for instances, lasted 7 years and the agreement finally reached has still not been ratified.... Nonetheless it is important to assess what is at stake, which is the balance of forces and the strategic situation in Europe and possibly even, as will be seen, the French defense system's independence and development.

The proposals which will be put forward during the discussions will naturally have, as in the past, a political, tactical and psychological significance and will sometimes even have a propaganda purpose. There have already been many examples of this. When the Soviets proposed a moratorium on the deployment of the SS-20 missiles via the abandonment of the NATO plans for the Pershing II and cruise missiles they knew that that was not acceptable to the West since it amounted to consolidating their advantage. When Mr Reagan proposed, the other day, the dismantling of the SS-20 missiles in exchange for the non-deployment of the U.S. Euromissiles, that was not credible either and he knew it, since it would have amounted to exchanging something which one side already has against something which the other side does not yet have. In fact all this is perfectly normal and predictable: Each side is trying to win over public opinion and to use it against the other, in short to obtain some political advantage.

The Addition of Opposing Forces

The listings of forces used in any discussion on disarmament must be distrusted. For instance, countercity and counterforce weapons are lumped together, whereas the former are used as a deterrent and the latter would be used to wage a "nuclear war." Similarly, the most accurate medium-range nuclear missiles -- SS-20 or cruise missiles -- are only fully effective if they are fired first. So their strategic importance is entirely different from the various systems with which they are listed. Of course, the negotiators will take account of this. The quantitative balances are, therefore, artificial. But they are essential to any arms negotiations because they form the vital reference point, the only conceivable basis for agreement.

In any case it is precisely these numerical facts which will be discussed at the Geneva conference. But how can they be assessed? This will largely be the subject of the discussions.

To show this, let us take the example of the listing which [Soviet president] Brezhnev presented to [FRG chancellor] Schmidt during their Bonn talks. On the Soviet side this document lists 975 medium-range delivery vehicles or missiles: 496 SS-20 (around 200 of these), SS-4 and SS-5 surface-to-surface missiles, 18 submarine-launched SSN-8 and SSN-9 missiles and 461 aircraft, including 50 to 60 Backfire bombers. On the Western side Brezhnev's document lists 986, including 170 U.S. F-111 aircraft based in Britain, 80 to 90 carrier-based A-6 or A-7 aircraft (at a rate of 4 squadrons per aircraft carrier and 2 aircraft carriers which can be used against the Soviet Union), 50 British Vulcan bombers and 40 French Mirage IV, 18 intermediate-range ballistic missiles [IRBM] on the Albion Plateau and 144 IRBM's on board French and British submarines.

A False Balance

This listing is obviously intended to show that there is a degree of balance which the West must not break by introducing new weapons systems, but it prompts three remarks:

-- It mixes theater nuclear weapons with strategic weapons such as the French nuclear submarines and the Albion missiles and, at least for the time being, the Mirage IV.

-- It includes very different kinds of aircraft in the same category. Of the 461 Soviet aircraft taken into account, around 400 are the old-fashioned and virtually obsolete Badgers or Blinders, and of the 824 Western aircraft listed here the F-4 and F-104, owing to their limitations and their age, cannot be classed as "Eurostrategic" weapons.

-- It only takes account of the number of delivery vehicles and not the number of nuclear warheads.

But whatever the count, it is clear that there cannot be any agreement at the Geneva conference, after however long, if the negotiations are restricted to medium-range surface-to-surface missiles. The Soviets would have no reason to abandon the strategic advantage which the SS-20 missiles give them merely in exchange for the nondeployment of the U.S. Euromissiles because, as has often been explained in these columns, the Pershing II and cruise missiles will not be really mobile and will consequently be vulnerable to a preemptive strike by the SS-20. The Americans for their part would have no reason to settle for the dismantling of the SS-4 and SS-5 missiles, which are not real counterforce systems owing to their great inaccuracy.

The chances of agreement, but also very serious risks, lie in expanding the framework of negotiations. For instance it is possible to imagine an arrangement which would involve considerable reductions in airborne delivery vehicles, many of which, as has been seen, are obsolete.

It is possible to envisage the discussion being extended not just to medium-range missiles but to tactical nuclear weapons. In Europe there are 7,000 of these on the American side and 4,000 or 4,500 on the Soviet side. The United States planned to withdraw 1,000 of them after deployment of the Pershing II and cruise missiles, which clearly shows that, in their view, there is a link between the number of medium-range weapons and the number of tactical weapons. The Soviets, for their part, have expressly stated that the negotiations might relate to all nuclear weapons.

But there would clearly be a danger in this for the European countries which have their own nuclear arms. As was seen in the Brezhnev document, the Soviets take the French and British systems into account in assessing the balance of forces. There is reason to fear that, when the time comes, considerable pressure may be exerted to persuade Britain and France -- which want to maintain the freedom to develop their own forces -- not to hinder an agreement.

First Strike

The root of the matter is that the Soviets are torn between the importance for them of the complete or partial denuclearization of Europe and their concern to maintain the advantage which the possible efficacy of a first counterforce strike using the SS-20 gives them. If, as seems likely, they want to keep this advantage at any cost, it is partly because for them it compensates for their major lag in a crucial area: They have not mastered the technology of cruise missiles with terminal guidance. At sea these missiles are invulnerable to a preemptive strike. Their extraordinary accuracy -- within around 30 meters -- gives them incomparable first strike effectiveness. This is guaranteed by their "terminal guidance" by which, in the last stage of their trajectory, they are able to home in on their target. If you remember that President Reagan, when explaining his administration's military plans, announced that the Poseidon submarines and, especially, the new Trident submarines will be equipped with "thousands" of sea-to-ground cruise missiles, you can assess the formidable strategic and political consequences that would have.

But these submarines, like the others, are not being discussed at the Geneva conference. They will only be affected by a possible resumption of SALT or, as it is now called, START. That is why it is possible that the negotiations starting today may one day depend on the revival of discussions on strategic arms: in other words, basically, on the overall development of relations between the USSR and the United States. The Soviets' need to reduce the burden on their economy and President Reagan's need to implement his budgetary program, which would be impossible without affecting military funds, is probably the only thing which can push them toward agreement. For states, as for individuals, fear of bankruptcy is probably the beginning of wisdom.

TATU VIEWS PROSPECTS FOR GENEVA ARMS TALKS

[Michel Tatu article: "SS-20's in Exchange for French and British Missiles?"]

[Text] An initial step forward must be pointed out right from the start of these negotiations: 12 years ago, when the first major nuclear arms negotiations, which were to lead to the 1972 SALT I treaty, opened in Helsinki, all the Soviets to whom the SS-9 was mentioned (their intercontinental supermissile which was causing a great stir among all the Western experts) invariably replied: "Chto takoye?" (What's that?). Any Soviet armaments were a taboo subject then to such an extent that, for years, the Moscow military representatives at the SALT negotiations begged their American interlocutors not to say too much to their civilian counterparts who "should not know" the details of the USSR's arsenal....

Today this secrecy has been partly but very considerably lifted. The United States is probably still way ahead as regards the extent of the information supplied, but the Soviets are also showing their cards. The excessively famous SS-20 is no longer an obscenity, an object of the Western countries' unhealthy curiosity: Even PRAVDA discusses it. [Soviet president] Brezhnev going as far as to specify that it has three nuclear warheads, thus giving the lie to some German pacifists who disputed the American information on that subject.

As soon as each side agrees to give information on the other's arsenal and on its own, they commit themselves to more serious negotiations and, to begin with, to not cheating too much on numbers. The initial impression which emerges from the recent figures published is that the assessments within the same category of armaments are not far out: The Soviets cannot conceal their massive advantage in land-based missiles, and the calculations made for aircraft are not excessively different. Curiously enough, the USSR even credits itself with a higher number of medium-range bombers (461) than Washington attributes to it in this category (395)....

The whole difference -- and it is considerable -- stems from the fact that Mr Reagan includes in Soviet Medium-range weapons 2,700 other aircraft with a shorter range than that of the bombers. The Soviets reject that while insisting on including their partner's F-4 aircraft although, according to Washington, that aircraft has a similar performance.

If any case the two superpowers seem to be virtually in agreement on principles on the eve of the negotiations. Moscow following a doctrine consistently applied during the SALT negotiations wants to discuss all nuclear weapons which can reach its territory. As far as arms deployed in Europe are concerned, and taking account of the protective zone provided by the satellite states, that means weapons with a range of 1,000 km or more. The Americans, apparently in agreement with that limitation, also line up everything in the Soviet arsenal which roughly has that range and has not already been counted in the SALT agreements.

But this is where flaws appear between the way in which the superpowers argue and their allies' concerns.

First, it does not make much difference to a European, especially a West German, whether he is hit by a weapon with a range of more or less than 1,000 km. The FRG is also a target for the short-range Soviet aircraft and missiles like the SS-12 or SS-22 which, although usually deployed in the USSR, could very easily be brought up to the front lines, to the GDR or Czechoslovakia, in time of war. (So much so that some Germans say they do not care about the SS-20 quarrel since that missile is, according to them, intended more for Britain, France or even Spain.) That is, therefore, an argument which supports the Soviet idea of including all this in the negotiations and hence the American "forward-based systems" too.

Second, the French and British forces come into play at this stage. In the Soviet's view, those armaments have a range of over 1,000 km, are directly aimed at them and were not included in the SALT agreements. Just as they now agree to disregard the two Poseidon submarines loaned by the United States to the American command in Europe because their missiles have an intercontinental range and have already been taken into account in the SALT negotiations, so, according to them, everything that was left out then should be taken into account now: on their side their old submarine missiles based in the Baltic (18 according to them, 30 according to Washington), and on the Western side the three components of the French-British deterrent, in other words a total of 263 missiles.

What Should Be discussed?

These factors should be borne in mind when trying to assess the outcome of the two great battles which are going to be fought around the Geneva conference table:

1 -- The first will relate to the sphere of negotiations. The United States has drafted a proposal which is relatively clear both in substance (agreement on a "zero option," meaning the liquidation of the SS-20, SS-4 and SS-5 missiles and abandonment of the Pershing and cruise missiles planned by NATO) and in form: settling the problem of the land-based missiles alone first, after which it will be possible to discuss other medium-range missiles and even tactical weapons. Now the Soviets, while energetically rejecting the "zero option" as put forward by Reagan, seem less categorical as regards procedure. Moreover even they have to admit that the more you go into "inferior"-type weapon categories the thicker the file becomes owing to the large number of missiles involved and the complexity of their technical characteristics. Discussing "forward-based systems" will immediately mean launching into endless arguments on the range of the F-4 and Fencer, of the SS-22 and Pershing I (already deployed in the FRG with a range of 700 km) and ultimately on the U.S. Lance (around 100 km) and the French Pluton.

Thus it is possible that an agreement will eventually be reached on limiting the sphere of negotiations in a way which is close to the U.S. ideas.

One important point is that that will be a Soviet concession and will have to be reciprocated.

2 -- The substance will be determined by the outcome of this first battle because the range of options will be limited in keeping with the upper restriction on the sphere of negotiation. An interresting variation seems to be emerging from some Soviet remarks. Supposing agreement is reached on discussing missiles and leaving out aircraft. The Kremlin could assert that it is entitled to a number of missiles -- obviously SS-20's -- to counter the French and British missiles: not only the 18 French launchers on the Albion Plateau but also the submarine-based devices, which do not yet feature in any listing, have several warheads like the SS-20 missiles and are clearly targeted at Soviet territory -- in other words a total of 162 launchers.

Inevitable Wrangling

Now this number corresponds almost exactly to the number of SS-20 missiles now deployed in the European part of the USSR: 170 according to the United States. Hence it is easy to imagine selling the moratorium requested by Mr Brezhnev (no U.S. missiles in Europe, maintenance of the SS-20 missiles with some reductions and the liquidation, which is however already planned, of the old SS-4 and SS-5 missiles)....

Of course, such a variation would be strongly opposed by the West: It is dubious to class much more reliable and accurate land-based missiles with submarine missiles. Moreover such an approach would completely disregard protection of the FRG, Italy and Belgium, the desired "linkage" between European defense and the U.S. central arsenal -- in short, all the problems which the 1979 NATO decision sought to settle. But what counts will be at least as much the impact which the two sides' proposals will have on public opinion and the aid they give to the pacifist and neutralist movement, because it is on this ground that the battle will take place.

If you add to this the inevitable wrangling which the negotiations will produce among the allied governments, and the fact that the United States will negotiate alone on the Western side, but under vigilant surveillance -- [FRG] Chancellor Schmidt has just announced that he will keep a "channel" with Moscow open on this subject -- the Kremlin is, to say the least, not going in unprepared.

NORDIC PRIME MINISTERS DISCUSS SECURITY ISSUES

LD082202 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 2000 GMT 8 Dec 81

[Text] Security-political issues have become a central subject at the Nordic prime ministers' meeting held in Helsinki today. The prime ministers discussed Norway's recent decision to store arms for Canadian troops in northern Norway. Norwegian Prime Minister Kaare Willoch assured them that the agreement does not mean any change in Norway's security policy. According to Willoch it is only a matter of continuing a previous agreement which Norway concluded with the United States. During the meeting the Nordic prime ministers also discussed economic matters, such as cooperation in overseas projects. Norway announced that at least for the time being it is not willing to join the planned joint Nordic overseas projects.

RULING PARTY LOSES 9 SEATS; JORGENSEN RESIGNS

[Text] Copenhagen, 9 Dec (AFP) -- Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen will submit his government's resignation at 1000 GMT, the State Ministry announced today. The announcement followed yesterday's general election, which left Mr Jorgensen's leading Social Democratic Party with nine fewer seats than the 68 it had in the outgoing parliament, and with little chance of forming a majority alliance with other socialist parties. The Social Democrats, however, retained a wide edge over other parties in the number of seats in Parliament.

Queen Margrethe II was to receive the formal resignation letter. Political observers said she would ask Mr Jorgensen's government to remain pending formation of a ruling coalition. The queen was to meet later today with heads of the nine parties represented in parliament. She was later to designate a political leader -- political sources said that it was highly likely that it would be Mr Jorgensen -- to try to form a government coalition.

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS TREATMENT OF SAKHAROV

PM071347 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 3 Dec 81 p 6

[Text] The government has protested the Soviet Union's treatment of hunger-striking Nobel Prize winner Andrey Sakharov. The protest was delivered in a conversation between Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten and Soviet Ambassador Mikhail Yakovlev.

Sakharov is on hunger strike so that Liza Alekseyeva can be reunited with Sakharov's stepson in the United States. Ullsten pointed out that Sakharov's demands are reasonable in human rights terms and with reference to the Helsinki treaty. At the same time Ullsten expressed concern over the persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union. Ullsten also protested that former Liberal party leader Per Ahlmark had been refused an entry visa to the Soviet Union, where he had intended to meet Jews.

SESSION OF INTERCOMMUNAL NEGOTIATIONS HELD 8 DEC

[Text] Another meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace hotel at noon today. In a statement prior to the meeting, Mr Gobbi, special envoy of the UN secretary general in Cyprus, said that at today's meeting an effort is to be made to arrive at an agreement on procedural questions. He said: I believe that now there is quite enough ground to reach such an agreement.

Answering a question, Mr Gobbi said that first of all agreement must be reached on procedural questions in order to face questions of substance at a later stage. Asked whether the Waldheim evaluation brought about the expected results, Mr Gobbi said that if the evaluation proves to be a very good method, we shall make surprising progress in the talks. Mr Gobbi also stated that he will leave tomorrow for New York, where he will meet with UN Secretary General Waldheim the following day and attend the Security Council meeting on the question of the extension of the UN peace force's mandate.

The Greek Cypriot representative at the talks, Ioannidhis, said that at today's meeting he expected that an exchange of views would take place in connection with ways and means that could possibly be put into practice so that a constructive dialogue can be held. Mr Ioannidhis recalled that at the previous meeting both sides agreed that the Waldheim evaluation will be a method for discussion. Answering a question, Mr Ioannidhis said the Greek Cypriot side's position is that there should be flexibility. He added: Each side should feel free to discuss both the constitutional and the territorial aspects, as well as the other two questions on the agenda. He also said that we must not follow a concrete formula.

The Turkish Cypriot representative at the talks, Mr Onan, said that conclusion of an agreement on procedural questions is not a major issue. He said: The Waldheim ideas have led to a situation in which these ideas can serve as a basis for negotiations. He added: The gaps and vacuums that can be found in the Waldheim ideas can be supplemented by the ideas and proposals of the two sides. Asked how would it be possible to reach an agreement when the Turkish Cypriot side considers the Waldheim evaluation as a "basis" for negotiations while the Greek Cypriot side and the United Nations see it as an "aid" to the negotiations, Mr Onan said: We will be in a position to find a way out, and if this does not happen at today's meeting, it will happen at the next one.

DENKTAS BEGINS CONTACTS WITH PARTY LEADERS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has begun contacts with the leaders of the political parties in connection with the establishment of a new government. He received Turkish Unity Party leader Ismail Sezer at 1430, Democratic People's Party leader Nejat Konuk at 1500, Republican Turkish Party leader Ozker Ozgur at 1600 and Communal Liberation Party leader Alpay Durduran at 1700. Denktas will meet National Unity Party leader and Prime Minister Cagatay at 1100 tomorrow. Denktas met the deputy speaker of the legislative assembly, Ekrem Ural, this morning.

Talks With Ural

[Text] President Rauf Denktas today received Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly deputy speaker Ekrem Ural for talks on the latest developments. In a statement following the meeting, Denktas said they reviewed the interparty situation and formation of the new government. Denktas added that he expressed his views on difficulties he expects to appear in this connection.

Ural said it was the president's principal task to find a solution to the situation now that the government has been toppled in a nonconfidence vote. After noting that they had made a general review of the latest developments, Ural said the solution would emerge after the president completed his consultations with the political party leaders. Ural continued: I am convinced the president will succeed in identifying the common views among the political parties. In this way he may lay the groundwork for rapprochement among the various party leaders which could result in a coalition government. Ural concluded by saying that such an understanding among the political parties would necessitate concessions on their views and that this would emerge only after the president concluded his consultations with the party leaders.

KIPRIANOU URGES MORE WORLD PRESSURE ON TURKEY

PM081523 Paris LE MONDE in French 4 Dec 81 p 6

[Bernard Brigouleix interview with President Kiprianou in Paris: "We Expect the International Community To Make Turkey Listen to Reason" -- date not given]

[Text] [Question] Since the last parliamentary elections in Cyprus you have had to face opposition from two big parties which are divided on many issues: the communist party and the extreme right. Can Cyprus still have a coherent foreign policy?

[Answer] Yes, because it is the policy of nonalignment, which Cyprus has followed constantly since its independence. Aside from partisan preferences and different stances, there is a very broad consensus on this line of conduct among public opinion and the political class.

[Question] Do you think the Socialists' victory in Greece could favor a settlement of the Cyprus question?

[Answer] I think Mr Papandreou, who received me in Athens as soon as he took office and who I am to see again soon, is in a better position than his predecessors to work toward a solution to the problem. Moreover we are in constant contact on this subject.

[Question] Did the return to power of the military in Turkey complicate the search for a solution?

[Answer] At first we were tempted to think that in a way the military might be more inclined toward dialogue than the civilians because they were not afraid of being accused of making concessions. Unfortunately we soon noticed that nothing had changed on the Turkish side. It is still a policy of fait accompli. What we hope in particular is that the countries that are both friends of Cyprus and friends or allies of Turkey might exert pressure on Ankara to bring it to greater flexibility and understanding, or at the very least not encourage its occupation policy. This is one of the things I will say to President Reagan next week.

[Question] What do you think of the recent proposals made by UN Secretary General Waldheim in an attempt to break the deadlock in the Nicosia negotiations between your government and the representatives of Rauf Denktas' Turkish federated state?

[Answer] Mr Waldheim proposed an "evaluation" of the state of the Cyprus intercommunal preliminary negotiations. To the extent that this approach could contribute to the continuation of this very difficult dialogue, and with some reservations, we are in favor of it. However, it is important to see that for the time being it is just a question of methods. However, noting this and submitting it to negotiations between the two camps can obviously be a good approach. These procedural questions must not conceal the essence of the problem, on which we are making very slow progress owing to Turkish obstinacy. I repeat that it is primarily from the international community and its efforts to make Ankara listen to reason that we hope to receive a decisive contribution.

[Question] What are you expecting from your visit to Paris?

[Answer] First, the opportunity to explain in detail to the French president, who I know feels sympathy for and interest in Cyprus, the facts of the tragic situation in which we have been living since the northern part of our country was occupied 7 years ago. We are relying a great deal on France's aid. In addition we would like to extend our cooperation with Paris and the EEC in the cultural, technical and also economic spheres. We need France, in particular, to help us improve our association agreements with the EC.

TURKISH MAINLAND TROOPS SAID REINFORCED BY 8,000

[Excerpt] The Turkish occupation troops have been reinforced considerably with both men and armament recently. According to reports received by the authorities, last month the Turkish occupation troops were reinforced with 8,000 men and with modern equipment and tanks. The fresh Turkish troops arrived at Famagusta and Kyrenia harbors in Turkish naval vessels. The fresh forces were deployed in various parts of the occupied area, mainly on the confrontation lines.

The reinforcement of the Turkish troops with men and materiel was confirmed by the government spokesman as well. In a recent statement he said the government is watching the situation closely and will make representations to both the Western powers and the United Nations.

Authoritative political observers stressed that the new Turkish provocation is proof of the true intentions and goals of the Turks, that is, the consolidation of faits accomplis and the exercise of psychological pressure on the Greek Cypriots.

Other reports say the arrival of fresh Turkish troops is connected with the situation in the occupied areas, where Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas is continuously losing ground, the result being the fall of his pseudogovernment 2 days ago.

PAPANDREOU TERMS TALKS WITH WEINBERGER 'POSITIVE'

NC072112 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 7 Dec 81

[Text] Prime Minister Papandreou arrived in Brussels at 1745 Greek time today to participate, in his capacity as defense minister, in the winter conference of the NATO defense ministers. Our special correspondent Yiannis Papadhimitropoulos reports:

[Begin recording] Prime Minister Papandreou has described his meeting in Brussels this evening with U.S. Defense Secretary Weinberger as useful, positive and encouraging. After the meeting Mr Papandreou stressed to Greek and foreign correspondents that he was able to learn the U.S. Government's reaction concerning NATO and Greece.

The Papandreou-Weinberger meeting lasted 1 hour and was held in the prime minister's room at the Brussels Hilton. After the meeting the prime minister talked to newsmen, stressing that the Turkish occupation of Cyprus, the Aegean issue, and the threat against our borders with Turkey were the burning issues he raised in the strongest manner with the U.S. secretary of defense. Mr Papandreou added that the Greek positions found some response from his opposite number, and for this reason he is fully satisfied. Moreover, he said that now the cornerstone has been laid for the entire defense issue of the country.

Speaking after the meeting with Mr Papandreou, the U.S. secretary of defense said: We wanted to hold this meeting because we would like to know what each of us is thinking. We thought it would be right to have a personal meeting in order to learn our mutual reaction. In any event, it was a very useful and encouraging meeting. We made a full review of the problems of defense and NATO and we look forward to more meetings in the future.

Speaking after the U.S. secretary of defense, Mr Papandreou said: Really our talk was very positive because for the first time we were given the opportunity to raise the Greek defense problem with the United States and, in a wider sense, with NATO. Our talk was truly encouraging for the future, and we agreed to continue these contacts until there is full clarification of the issues that are critical for our country.

Tomorrow morning the prime minister will participate in the NATO defense minister's conference. [end recording]

Speaking about the French delegation's presence in our country, Mr Petsos stressed that views will be exchanged on various matters of joint interest. In his brief address, the French general said the visit aims at further strengthening Greek-French relations, which have been promoted greatly through the recent visit by Prime Minister Papandreou to Paris.

The subject of the talks was to examine questions related to the manner in which both countries can cooperate in the field of armaments and particularly in establishing high technology in Greece so that products of the local military industry may gradually become competitive in the international market.

OZAL: NO NEED FOR AID FROM EUROPE BY 1984

TA081609 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 8 Dec 81

[Statement in Paris 8 December by Deputy Prime Minister and State Minister Turgut Ozal to MEDITERRANEAN NEWS AGENCY -- recorded]

[Text] The meeting of the [OECD] second working group in Paris has involved the exchange of the OECD member countries' views and our views on a report drawn up by the OECD Secretariat and entitled "The Mid-term Development of the Turkish Economy." Following an opening speech by OECD Secretary General van Lennep, I delivered a speech. I summarized the developments of our economy during the past 2 years. Then I listened to the views of two or three delegates and left the meeting. Our colleagues continued to attend the meeting at the technical level.

I can say the following: The progress made by the Turkish economy during the past 2 years, especially during the past year, is, to quote the report, remarkable. In fact, OECD delegates told us at various times that it was amazing that Turkey's economy was improving despite great economic difficulties in the world.

I believe that if the present trend continues, if we can continue to pursue the same policies, Turkey will need almost no official aid, that is, no aid from other states, in 2 years, that is, at the beginning of 1984. That does not mean we will not need military aid or economic aid for military purposes. We will continue to receive that from the concerned members. However, I must point this out immediately: There will be no need for a special OECD group.

There will be an economic development review committee meeting before the pledge [word in English] meeting. At the first meeting, which will be held to review the situation in the member countries, the situation in Turkey will be discussed. I believe this will be held at the end of February or in March. Immediately after that, the aid to Turkey consortium will convene. I believe that at that meeting they will determine the date of the pledge [word in English] meeting. I guess it will be in May, as it was last year.

There is no need to deny the fact that the political atmosphere in Europe is a little negative regarding the latest developments in Turkey. However, Turkey's economic development is being received with great admiration and understanding. An important reason for this is that the European countries are pleased because an improved Turkish economy means they will have to reduce the aid they have been extending to Turkey during these difficult times. Naturally we want to stand on our own two feet, with our own efforts, as soon as possible.

Another important point is -- and this has been pointed out several times before -- many countries are in great economic difficulties. On one hand they cannot reduce the rate of inflation, and on the other hand they have problems with their balance of payments. So it is extremely noteworthy that Turkey is successful both in reducing the rate of inflation and in increasing exports to an unprecedented level. We have been told that several times. Let me add one more thing: There is some jealousy involved too!

Exports To Reach $4.5 Billion

TA081826 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 8 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Trade Minister Kemal Canturk has said that Turkish exports, which at the beginning of the year were estimated at $3.5 billion, will stand at $4.5 billion by the end of the year. Speaking at a meeting of the Istanbul Exporters Union, Canturk said Turkey is now at a stage in which the rate of inflation is greatly reduced. He added that the damage done by the high inflation must be eliminated. That is why, he stressed, efforts must be made to increase production and investments.

TURKMEN CALLS RELATIONS WITH U.S. 'PERFECT'

NC081324 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 5 Dec 81 p 1

[Text] Ankara, (ANKA) -- Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said: "We are observing a gradually increasing tendency to intransigence on the part of Greece. If this tendency continues, extremely serious difficulties in our relations will crop up."

At a press conference held for foreign journalists, Foreign Minister Turkmen said that though no timetable has been specified regarding the resotration of democracy in Turkey, there will be new indications at the beginning of 1982. He added that he had also expressed these views at the ministerial conference of the Council of Europe.

Turkmen also stated that relations with the United States were "perfect," and added that these relations were being maintained not only within a bilateral framework but also within NATO. Turkmen said that in the course of talks in Ankara with U.S. Defense Secretary Weinberger, the situation in southwest Asia and the needs of the Turkish armed forces were evaluated.

Responding to a journalist who wanted to know what Turkey's attitude would be after the United States gives Greece special assurances, the foreign minister said: "I do not believe the United States will provide such assurances. Such an act would run counter to the spirit of the alliance."

Replying to a question on Turkey's relations with the Islamic countries, Turkmen said: "We do not view our relations with the Islamic countries as conflicting with our relations with the West. We do not believe these relations will damage our relations with the West." Stating that Turkish foreign policy is "multilateral." Turkmen maintained that the policy being pursued envisaged loyalty to NATO, membership in the Council of Europe and links with the Islamic countries. It has been announced that Foreign Minister Turkmen will be visiting the People's Republic of China 18-23 December.

WEINBERGER DRAGGING COUNTRY INTO U.S. STRATEGY

TA090925 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Station commentary: "In the Wake of a Trip"]

[Text] U.S. war minister Weinberger has come to Turkey and gone. Numerous meetings were held behind closed doors. To date, no official statement has been issued on these meetings. What did the Washington administration demand from the junta? What did it attempt to impose on it? What attitude did the junta adopt in the face of these pressures? All answers to these questions are being concealed from the people. The pro-U.S. press is making much ado about us not participating in the Rapid Deployment Force [RDF].

There is so far no definite decision regarding the RDF. However, this doesn't mean the dangerous plan has been renounced. As a matter of fact, the RDF is one of the main subjects being discussed at the NATO meetings currently being held in Brussels. The plan consists of expanding NATO's sphere of influence into the Middle East and dragging Turkey into the RDF within this framework. It is now becoming more evident that, through their statements that Turkey will not shoulder any responsibilities outside the NATO borders, the junta heads were actually making concessions to the NATO chiefs and leaving the doors open for the Turkey to be dragged into the RDF.

It was announced during Weinberger's visit that a joint defense council was established between Turkey and the United States. Let us remind you that at the beginning of this year four imperialist institutes based in London, New York, Bonn and Paris published a report concerning world imperialist policy.

The report proposes the establishment of bilateral or multilateral organs for crisis management among states, particularly in the Middle East, which the United States has declared an area of interest. The joint defense council established during Weinberger's visit is one of the important levers in imperialist strategy. It is clear that this body has a function outside NATO and even beyond it.

Under a military dictatorship and at a time when the most reactionary and pro-U.S. elements within the army and the junta are clearly resorting to every means in a bid to (?increase their activity), the establishment of such body further increases the threats directed against our country. The joint defense council will constitute another lever to include Turkey in the RDF.

It is therefore, very dangerous to be deceived by the various press articles published following Weinberger's visit to the effect that we once again escaped being dragged into the RDF. This body, which is devoid of any legal basis and which is not subject to any supervision, is an extension of the U.S. policy of establishing reactionary alliances in the Middle East. The United States previously set up similar organs in countries like Israel, Egypt and Pakistan. In other words, the joint defense council aims to enfold our country further into the adventurist U.S. policy in the Middle East.

This body, which is an extension of the defense cooperation agreement with the United States, offers the Reagan administration new opportunities to interfere deeper in the internal affairs of Turkey. The joint defense council which reflects the hegomonistic interests of the U.S. imperialists regarding our region and Turkey, contradicts our people's interests. It threatens peace and security inthe region. By bowing down to the establishment of such body, the junta is further inviting our country to be dragged into the Reagan administration's Middle East adventures.

UNITED KINGDOM

THATCHER CONDEMNS SOVIET TREATMENT OF SAKHAROVS

LD081654 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1616 GMT 8 Dec 81

[Text] The prime minister today condemned the Soviet Government's treatment of Nobel Peace Prize winner Dr Andrey Sakharov and his wife, and urged it to stop harassing them. Mrs Thatcher accused the Russians of "blatant disregard" of their commitment under the Helsinki agreement on human rights, and she called on the Soviet authorities to allow Mrs Liza Alekseyeva, the wife of Dr Sakharov's stepson, to join her husband in the United States. Dr and Mrs Sakharov, who have been on hunger strike in a bid to force the authorities to let Mrs Alexeyeva join her husband, were taken into enforced medical care at the weekend.

Mrs Thatcher said during Commons question time: "This government has frequently made representations with regard to the blatant disregard of the Soviet Union of its commitments under the Helsinki Final Act." "We have also frequently raised individual cases with the Soviet Union. We deplore the circumstances which led Dr and Mrs Sakharov to go on hunger strike. We hope very much that the Soviet authorities will let the wife of Dr Sakharov's stepson join her husband in the United States, and that they will desist from harassing Dr and Mrs Sakharov further."

CARRINGTON DISCUSSES AGRICULTURE, DEFENSE

PM091633 Paris LE MATIN in French 7 Dec 81 p 6

[Jean-Louis Arnoud interview with Foreign Secretary Carrington in London; date not given]

[Excerpt] Lord Carrington: In fact, if you press me, I must say that I never imagined we could reach agreement on everything... As far as European affairs are concerned, you know the pie was not cooked and we know that the community tends to wait until the very last minute when it comes to making unpleasant decisions or reaching reasonable compromises.

LE MATIN: So you were not surprised?

Carrington: Well.... I would say I was disappointed rather than suprised. But I do not think that the meeting went all badly. Many problems were clarified. Indeed, there was no disagreement on the first issue and we shed more light on agricultural problems but scarcely discussed budgetary problems. The attempt to clarify matters related principally to Mediterranean products and milk, and then, on the one hand, there are those who want spending to continue and, on the other hand, those who want the agriculture budget to be affected less than the other budgets and then there is the matter of the reduction -- if not elimination -- of agricultural surpluses.... These are difficult problems for Europe because there is clearly a clash of interests between farmers in the north and the south on the amounts of money given. There are also problems between big and small farmers, with the social problems involved in the incomes of small farmers in some countries.

LE MATIN: Do you mean French farmers?

Carrington: Some German farmers too.

LE MATIN: The chancellor does not seem particularly concerned about them.

Carrington: If he is not giving it much thought, others are.... And, of course, the agricultural problem is having an effect on the budgetary problem because unless the balance between the amount of money spent on agriculture and the amount spent on other questions is changed, the British and German problems will be combined. This agricultural issue is really central to everything.

LE MATIN: So what are you going to do? Are you going to call a meeting for your counterparts, the foreign ministers, before Christmas to try to settle the matter?

Carrington: We are going to discuss this in Brussels, where we are discussing our normal business this week -- exciting things like the multifiber agreement or similar matters.... I think we are lunching together Tuesday. We will see if we can set a date and I will sound out my colleagues about the way they wish to proceed, whether we should wait a little longer or whether we want to move quickly....

LE MATIN: As far as I know, Claude Cheysson is prepared to go anywhere any time before Christmas.

Carrington: That's one person who wants a meeting before Christmas... I also think people will want to meet before Christmas. We are perfectly willing to meet any time.

LE MATIN: There has been talk of a conclave which nobody could leave before everything had been completed.

Carrington: Well, the choice rests with my colleagues....but what we have to decide is so extraordinarily complicated....I cannot imagine it being possible to cut them off completely. Can you imagine them being deprived of telephones!

LE MATIN: Lord Carrington, would you personally be happy if agreement was reached under your chairmanship?

Carrington: Happier than words could say! I think the sooner we put an end to this kind of uncertainty and irritation, the more smoothly the community will run. But I do not think it is reasonable not to admit that there are very difficult problems to be solved in the agricultural sphere, and that is affecting the rest.

LE MATIN: Does that mean you are going to pass the buck to the Belgians?

Carrington: Unless we reach a solution by the end of December, it will be the Belgians' baby.

LE MATIN: You are sometimes suspected of being in no hurry, not as chairman but because you are British. The suggestion being that, tactically speaking, it is in Britain's interest to wait until next spring when the agricultural prices are fixed to exert all the pressure it can in the general haggling.

Carrington: That is not our viewpoint. It is not true...I mean...look at the situation in this country. It is obvious that a section of opinion still does not accept Britain's community membership. As it happens, I think those people are wrong, that they are obstinate, misguided and blind, but they exist and the Labor Party knows it.... That is why it is not to our advantage to prolong the dispute. We would like to settle it all as quickly as possible. Of course, like everybody we want a settlement with which we could live and we think it must be fair and just. But there is no question of us trying to delay this settlement. If you had been at the European Council meeting the other weekend you would have seen how ardently my country's prime minister was working for an agreement.

LE MATIN: With regard to anti-European feelings, would you say they have decreased or increased since the Conservatives have been in government?

Carrington: The general feeling in this country before 30 May 1980 was that our partners did not understand that we had a budgetary problem. It really took us a year, from May 1979, when we formed the government, to May 1980, to convince them....

LE MATIN: But how much success have you had?

Carrington: Not enough.... During the disagreements we have had, the disenchantment in this country increased, and you can imagine the effect that had on the way people regarded the community. Hence our anxiety to avoid another quarrel over the budget in order to prevent the same effect being produced again.

LE MATIN: You convinced your partners that you had a problem. But have your partners convinced you that Britain's case could not be permanent and that it must remain an exception?

Carrington: That has nothing to do with the decision made on 30 May. What we decided then was to restructure the budget in such a way that the unacceptable situation which was recognized in...1975, I think, could not recur. Unless the restructuring of the budget changes the budgetary situation, spending and everything else, another unacceptable situation could arise, in which case we expect the community to take it into account.

LE MATIN: Has the job of chairman altered your view of Europe?

Carrington: First it made me examine in detail a large number of things with which I would never have expected a foreign secretary to be concerned.... For instance, the multifiber agreement, cocoa and goodness knows what else!

But above all I have been impressed over the past 6 months by the very real readiness I found in everybody to work toward compromise.... That is really fundamental and it is that which makes me expect that we will solve our problems successfully....

LE MATIN: Will you do so at your next meeting?

Carrington: Or some other time....

LE MATIN: With regard to joint defense, a revival of the West European Union [WEU] has been suggested in France.

Carrington: I think that some of the pressure being exerted to suggest that the community should deal with defense is unwise. European defense should be based essentially on our system of relations within the North Atlantic treaty and I think that anything which tends to disengage the United States from Europe or tends to exclude some NATO countries from discussions on European defense, on the pretext of a more restricted club, is rather dangerous. However, why not examine the idea....

LE MATIN: Antinuclear feeling is gaining ground in your country, Lord Carrington. This morning I again heard a Labor Party spokesman call for Britain to abandon its nuclear arms.

Carrington: One aspect of my country's political situation which strikes me as encouraging is that it is becoming increasingly improbable that the Labor Party will return to power.... Have you seen the opinion poll on unilateral disarmament, which I think is very interesting, in which three-fourths of the people questioned said they think that Britain should keep its independent nuclear deterrent? This whole situation shows a real anxiety about the lack of progress on disarmament and the lack of dialogue between the superpowers until very recently. That is why the speech which President Reagan made some 10 days ago is so important and why the start of the Geneva talks is important.... The French proposal at the Madrid CSCE Conference is also important because it is another step forward toward confidence building measures.... This is what was lacking, which caused certain feelings to spread throughout Europe.

LE MATIN: What role do you think the Europeans have while the Russians and Americans are negotiating in Geneva?

Carrington: Well, the United States has said that it would consult us and keep us informed about everything. There is a set procedure within NATO.

LE MATIN: So there will be no European passiveness?

Carrington: No, no passive attitude, but it must be admitted that the French and British are determined that their independent nuclear arms should be excluded from the talks.

LE MATIN: You are not prepared to include them in bargaining?

Carrington: We have said so. And so have the French. This is because they are strategic weapons.

LE MATIN: Would you be prepared to agree to postpone the 1983 deadline for deploying the new U.S. missiles in Europe?

Carrington: Certainly not. We must negotiate with this deadline, on pain of perpetuating Soviet superiority.

COMMITTEE ADJOURNS FOLLOWING TURKISH-GREEK SPLIT

TA092042 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Text] The NATO Defense Planning Committee meeting in Brussels has been adjourned following Greece's requests concerning the joint communique and the subsequent failure to reach an agreement. Turkish Radio and Television [TRT] correspondent Saadettin Tiryakioglu reports that the Greek delegation insisted that a paragraph stipulating that NATO give Greece guarantees on the defense of its territory be included in the joint communique [words indistinct] whereas Turkey stated that only a paragraph saying that allies within an alliance can coexist in peace and that existing problems can be solved through bilateral negotiations can be included.

As a result, a compromise group composed of the ambassadors of Italy, Norway and Britain and Secretary General Jospeh Luns was charged with preparing a new text. However, this text was not accepted by the Greek delegation, and the meeting was adjourned because of the disagreement. Luns, National Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken and Greek Prime Minister and Defense Minister Andreas Papandreou met later to prepare a draft text on which agreement could be reached. A text accepted by Turkey and supporting the Turkish view was prepared during this meeting.

However, Papandreou left the meeting, saying he had a meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Haig and that he would express his views on the text later. Papandreou later sent a message to Bayulken saying he could not accept the text. With this development, the NATO Defense Planning Committee was called to another meeting. It has been announced that a joint communique will be issued if agreement is reached at the meeting, expected to begin after midnight. The NATO Ministerial Council will begin its work tomorrow as planned.

Papandreou Statement

[Text] We will now hear a statement by Prime Minister Papandreou that we have just received from Brussels:

[Begin recording] [In progress] ...not to accept in any way any course that might deprive the Greek armed forces of the right and the obligation to defend Greek territory, whether it is on land, on an island or at sea. In adopting this position, we stressed that the Rogers agreement incorporates the type of indefinite statement which undermines these sovereign rights of our fatherland.

3. We established -- both through statements by Turkish leaders as well as through multiple violations of our national territory -- the Turkish threat. This is something that is not always believed abroad. I can add that I have indisputable facts which I have not yet presented which prove that on a long-term basis the position of Turkey, starting in 1975, is for joint sovereignty in the Aegean, for partition of the Aegean. At the same time, we also referred to the fact that West Germany and the United States, acting within the framework of NATO, are arming Turkey at such a rate -- modernizing its armed forces at such a rate -- that at some not too distant time there will be a danger of overthrowing the balance of power in the Aegean. In the same way that the West is interested in maintaining the balance of power on a world scale, so do we have both the right and the duty to be interested in the balance of power in the Aegean.

4. Also raised was the question of guarantees of our frontiers by the alliance. As I have repeatedly told you, what is the meaning of an alliance which protects us from one direction, which is only a figurative protection unless there is a world war, and which, at the same time, fails to protect us from a real, dynamic, threat from the east? What I can state -- and I state this in all sincerity -- is that the response was not negative. It would be dangerous to state that I am optimistic. I must admit, however, that there has been some understanding of the Greek positions. Perhaps this is the first time. This, however, does not mean that we can rest on our laurels. I hope that this is very, very clear. The struggle is only beginning.

As for today, for the first time I presented to the NATO Defense Planning Committee, attended by the defense ministers, the national problems of our country -- the Cyprus issue, the Aegean, military aid and guarantees for our frontiers. To this presentation, which was not in detail but was total from the viewpoint of context, there was an immediate reply from the Turkish side, equal in length to my own presentation. The Turkish defense minister presented the Turkish views and, naturally, I replied to him. This is where the Greek-Turkish crossing of swords ended within the framework of the NATO Defense Planning Committee.

I then raised the question -- what I can and perhaps must tell you -- the Turkish minister wondered why such an issue, an issue which affects only our two countries, was raised at NATO. This is where we stressed that it was raised at NATO very logically because this alliance either is an alliance that protects its members, or it is not, since it allows members of the alliance -- it provides the opportunity for an attack on and violation of the frontiers and territorial integrity of a member state. This basically is where the issue ended.

During the afternoon meeting the question raised dealt with the RDF -- the Rapid Deployment Force. This is where I -- not only I but also other European delegations -- presented their absolute objections. In my case, these objections -- over and above the more general view on whether this could become a matter of NATO involvement in areas where NATO has no right to be interested -- I also raised the question of our relations with the Arab countries. I raised it and made it absolutely clear that Greece will never provide any facility which could in any way infringe on an Arab country. On this we took a very clear position. This is a position I will be glad for our Arab friends to be informed of.

This was today's work. Tomorrow, the main and primary work of the day will concern the communique. We have nearly exhausted all the basic issues. I believe the communique will be a very interesting and a very difficult matter. I will inform you about it tomorrow evening. Naturally, tomorrow I will also see [words indistinct] Haig, and I will have more to tell you than I have had to say tonight.

This, then, is the situation, the development and I state this so we can be completely clear among ourselves. I have read certain references by foreign news agencies and I cannot understand how they were made up. The question of Spain was not raised, nor will it be raised tomorrow. I never expressed any interest in remaining within the military wing of NATO. What was written is, for me, coincidental. I do not attribute any underhanded intent, but I believe that because I have not had any direct contact with newsmen to date, irresponsible rumors were circulated. What else can I say?

[Question indistinct]

[Answer] There is no question of [Spain's] entry; there is a question of application.

This is a very important difference, because this is also the position we set for the issue of the communique -- not this one but an earlier one. This had to do with a NATO -- a Luns -- statement, that presentation of the application in English for consideration and approval is acceptable. The Spanish issue is sufficiently complicated, and on this I will have more to say before I leave Brussels.

PAPANDREOU: GREECE MUST NOT BE TAKEN FOR GRANTED

[Dispatch from Brussels by Yiannis Papadhimitropoulos -- recorded]

[Excerpt] Speaking to representatives of the Greek press tonight, the prime minister stated: The Greek position clearly presented Greece's defense problem to international opinion and was incorporated in NATO's records. The Greek delegation is proud of the position it maintained at the Brussels meeting. Now, the entire alliance understands that there is a question of Greece's national security. At the same time, it became apparent that NATO is unable to help on the question of our country's frontiers.

The prime minister stressed that Greece today said "no" to NATO and acted in the same way that Yeoryios Papandreou acted in 1964 and Konstandinos Karamanlis acted in 1974. The alliance now understands that it cannot take us for granted, the prime minister stressed. My government, Papandreou added, is following a policy made according to the national interest.

Prior to his conversation with the newsmen, the prime minister conferred with U.S. Secretary of State Haig, with whom he reviewed Greek defense problems. The U.S. secretary explained his own country's policy toward the southern wing of NATO. The Papandreou-Haig meeting was described by the two as full, basic and productive. Both agreed to intensify the dailogue in the future. Papandreou stated that he did not discuss the question of the bases with Haig, but that he did discuss the Cyprus issue.

On Cyprus Issue

NC100640 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0430 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] In an exclusive statement to our Brussels correspondent, Prime Minister Papandreou said that during the NATO defense ministers conference he had the opportunity to outline the Cyprus problem in its true dimensions and right setting. Mr Papandreou also said he had had telephone contact with President Kiprianou in Washington and expressed reserved optimism that the line being followed will bear fruit.

On Airspace Issue

[Excerpts] In an interview with Greek political editors in Brussels last night, Prime Minister Papandreou stressed among other things that the Greek issue was raised clearly with NATO for the first time. In connection with the Rogers agreement, Mr Papandreou stated to the allies that it is unacceptable for the Greek Government from both the military and political points of view and that the new Greek Government cannot accept it. What Mr Papandreou also emphasized strongly is that the new Greek Government exercises full control over the entire land, air and sea space of the country and that it does not recognize any vagueness in the question of airspace limits.

On Nato Membership

[Brussels dispatch by Yiannis Papadhimitropoulos -- recorded]

[Excerpt] Speaking to newsmen last night, the prime minister denied reports by newspapers and foreign news agencies on our country's position in the alliance. Specifically Mr Papandreou said: I deny that I have stated that I want Greece to remain in NATO. On the contrary, I state categorically that my government has partially suspended Greece's reintegration into NATO and that it has already started applying the procedures for detachment from every point of the Rogers agreement, which stands against our national interests.

ARABS IN BRUSSELS PRAISE PAPANDREOU STATEMENT

BAYULKEN: GREECE USES NATO TO ATTACK TURKEY

[Text] The NATO Defense Planning Committee in Brussels has recessed following Greece's requests concerning the joint communique and subsequent failure to reach an agreement. The committee is expected to meet again this evening. According to a Turkish Radio and Television correspondent, Greece requested that an article stipulating NATO's guarantee for the defense of its territory be added to the text of the joint communique. This request was rejected by the Turkish delegation participating in the committee meeting.

In a statement on the issue, National Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken said Greece will not be permitted to use NATO as a tool to attack Turkey. The Greek delegation attempted to change the proposals submitted by NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns and by the British delegation in a bid to reach an agreement concerning the joint communique. The Turkish delegation opposed these changes as well, stating that such a situation cannot be accepted. The meeting then adjourned for a while. The correspondent reports that Bayulken, Luns and Greek Prime Minister and Defense Minister Andreas Papandreou are holding a meeting to reach an agreement on the joint communique.

SCHMIDT CONVINCES GREECE ON SPAIN'S ADMISSION

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt persuaded Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou in a letter to withdraw Greek objections to Spain's entry into NATO. This was announced by Government Spokesman Kurt Becker in Bonn today. Papandreou has publicly confirmed that he changed his mind as a result of his correspondence with the federal chancellor, Becker said. According to Becker, Schmidt told the Bonn cabinet at its meeting today how he had convinced the Greek prime minister of the need to integrate Spain into the Western community.

According to Becker, the Federal Government welcomes Spain's desire to join NATO and is prepared to take part in the admission process. It was stated at the cabinet meeting that Spain's desire to join should be seen in terms of its consistent pursuit of integration in the Western community.

APEL INTERVIEWED ON GREEK-TURKISH DIFFERENCES

DW101133 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2000 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Gustav Trampe interview with Defense Minister Hans Apel in Brussels; date not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Apel, how long can NATO stand tensions such as those in which two members consider each other to be adversaries? The Greeks say they truly feel threatened by the Turks.

[Answer] I think it is necessary to point out first that this is not a new development. Since the development of tensions around Cyprus, the relationship between the two states has really been in a state of tension, and NATO has contributed considerably to normalizing the situation.

Now a new government has taken over in Greece. This revitalizes the debates. Still, I did not feel any additional tensions here. On the contrary, I was quite impressed by the constructive way in which the Greek prime minister, who is also the defense minister, cooperated in the NATO framework and helped the meeting negotiate some cliffs.

[Question] But you wouldn't say the conference here came off very smoothly?

[Answer] No, I surely cannot say that. It is felt in the NATO framework that differences of opinion do exist between the two states. NATO must contribute to overcoming these differences. However, you cannot construe this as constituting a threat to the alliance.

[Question] You don't believe that sooner or later NATO might face a choice between Turkey and Greece?

[Answer] I don't believe that at all, because the supreme interests are so great that we will stay together. You cannot, after all, overlook the fact that membership in a community and an alliance, in this particular case NATO and the EC, is not interdependent but is indeed interconnected. I am convinced commonsense will soon prevail.

APEL INTERVIEWED ON STATUS OF BUNDESWEHR

DW100949 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1900 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Text] [Question] Very strong doubts have been voiced in the Federal Republic over the past months as to whether the Bundeswehr will be able to fulfill its mission in the coming years. You now say that we received a good grade. How does that fit together? Has NATO become less demanding?

[Answer] NATO is more sober and objective. NATO viewed the Bundeswehr's effectiveness in 1981 and gave it a good grade. It is obvious that we will have budget problems in the coming years, but we are not the only ones. All NATO countries will have them. However, we will try to maintain the Bundeswehr's preparedness for action by concentrating on essential matters. We will succeed in doing this. I am against covering difficulties up. I am also against replacing reality with panic and polemics, regardless of the reason.

[Question] No doubts were expressed regarding the Federal Republic's coping with its tasks in the coming years?

[Answer] No, no doubts existed in this respect.

AUSTRALIAN FOREIGN MINISTER CONCLUDES VISIT

LD091500 Hamburg DPA in German 1429 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- Australia's great interest in more private West German investments was stressed in Bonn today by Australian Foreign Minister Anthony Austin Street. Until now, German capital has constituted only about 5 percent of foreign investments, said Street at the end of his 5-day official visit to the Federal Republic. He said there are good economic reasons for an increase in German investments.

During his first visit to the FRG, Street met in Bonn with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; Economics Minister Otto Graf Lambsdorff; and the SPD and CDU Chairmen Willy Brandt and Helmut Kohl. He said he is "completely satisfied" at the outcome of the talks. There was full agreement that U.S. President Ronald Reagan's recent disarmament proposals were a sign of the United States' earnest desire for arms control and arms limitation. Street stressed that if the Soviet Union does not recognize this readiness, there would be serious consequences for international security. The Conservative Australian politician visited Berlin on Sunday where he met governing Mayor Richard von Weizsaecker (CDU) for an exchange of view.

GENSCHER PLEASED WITH USSR'S SAKHAROV DECISION

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- According to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher the Federal Government received with satisfaction the news that the Soviet authorities are going to allow the daughter-in-law of Andrey Sakharov to leave. This was announced by the German Foreign Office tonight. During the visit to Bonn last month of Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt joined in the Western efforts vis-a-vis the Sakharov case.

MITTERRAND DISCUSSES ECONOMIC, FOREIGN POLICY

[Interview with President Francois Mitterrand by Michele Cotta, president and director general of France-Inter, and Pierre Desgraupes, president and director general of Antenne-2, in Paris -- live]

[Excerpts] [Cotta] Good day to you, Mr President. We thank you for welcoming us here in this library, which is much less intimidating than your office, for this live program. If you want, my first question will be neither political nor economic, nor social, but I will ask you directly: Do you feel well?

[Mitterrand] In a few days' time, on 15 December, I believe, a health bulletin will be published, then again in June, because I promised on my election that the French will be informed every 6 months on the true state of my health.

[Cotta] Regarding nationalization, people are discussing and thinking quite openly: Will there be an end to end to it or not? Two of your ministers, Pierre Mauroy and Jacques Delors, recently brought into the open an important strategic and political difference of opinion. Jacques Delors said: It is finished. We have done enough reforms, we have nationalized enough, to which the prime minister answered: We will complete our reforms at our own speed and with the deals we want. What is your position within this debate? Do you believe it psychologically necessary to slow down the reform action, or do you, on the contrary, believe that you have not yet done everything and that you will continue to proceed in this.

[Mitterrand] Since you talked about nationalization, it shows that it worries you. Is it because you think it is (?everything). We are at the beginning of our conversation, and already you are talking to me about nationalization. It is in all the papers, and it is the concern of a great sector of the French people, and in any case of all businessmen, all heads of enterprises. Well, the rules of the game must be fixed rapidly. Thus I think I can tell you, or rather I must repeat that industrial nationalizations which were to concern 11 groupings, and which so far only affect 9 due to the foreign interests which are prevalent in the other 2 groupings, these industrial nationalizations and these banking nationalizations, once they are implemented in accordance with my election program, there will be an end to it. That is to say, for the 5 years of the legislative term, there will be no more questions. There will be no question of either rampant nationalization, as people say, or of a further series of reforms in this field. The entrepreneurs in the private sector which represent the vast majority of entrepreneurs in France must know that they run no risk at all of being caught up in some new wave of nationalization.

Why do I say during the legislative term? This is because this naturally depends on the new contract which will be made between future deputies during the 1986 election. On the new majority, it will perhaps be the same, or perhaps a different majority which can have a different policy. And in this case it is the people who will decide, or in 1988, when another president will be elected.

I cannot prejudge what will be decided by the majority of French people but so long as this particular contract which binds me to the French people is in force, and it will be until 1986 and probably 1988, then in fact there will be a break in the nationalization process.

[Cotta] I would like to ask you one very simple question: Would you appoint a communist as minister of the economy?

[Mitterrand] You asked me the question about communist ministers. Would I appoint one as minister of the economy for instance? For the time being, I have a good economy and finance minister and I am not thinking about reshuffling the government. Consequently, this question is rather academic. General de Gaulle appointed a communist as minister of the economy. He even appointed one as defense minister. As for me, of course, I am not at that stage. I must be said that I am not thinking in these terms. I believe that communist ministers and communist deputies must be considered like all other members of parliament. Inside the government they have the same rights as the others. They receive the same information as the others. We hold a discussion together every Wednesday morning, but at the Ministry of the Economy, for the moment, I think that I prefer the Socialist that I appointed there because it is he who applies most strictly the policy that I have decided.

[Desgraupes] Mr President, turning to foreign policy: Everyone agrees -- now in 1981 and approaching 1982 -- on the recognition of the interdependence of nations and the new Golden Rule for the modern world in all spheres, that of cultural permeability, trade exchanges, energy self-sufficiency, and so forth. Is this all compatible with the existence of a Socialist France as you have just defined it, in a European or even global environment at the industrial level? The question I put to you in fact is that put at the time of Lenin and Trotsky: revolution in just one country or in all?

[Mitterrand] We are a country of freedom and we want to live at ease with our neighbors and in harmony with countries that practice freedom. This is normal and sound. At the same time we have the identical concept of refusing all forms of protectionism. Within the Europe of the Ten there exists a free market, and this is also very solid ground. Furthermore, we know each other well. We often shared the same history even when it was difficult. But your question did indeed deserve to be asked. You can be confident that we are looked upon quite well. In any case, in the Europe of the Common Market, the Europe of the Ten, there are two Social Democratic governments, the German Government and the Danish Government. There is another socialist government which was elected recently, after our own so there are four governments. If matters were to be determined according to this rule, national interests would prevail in the end regardless of the ideology of those who govern. But if one was to refer solely to this rule, one could say that there are already four participating countries of 10 which have made the same fundamental choice, while the others are to come.

Regarding the Western world, we have found a modus vivendi with the United States. I speak frankly of what I think about the peoples of Latin America and Central America. You know what I think of the monetarist policy which will, according to my belief, end in a grave failure, and this is practiced in a certain number of countries, notably in the United States and regardless of the good faith and no doubt the sincerity of those who pursue this policy. But we respect each other. They carry out their policy, we carry out ours. We look at each other and that is how it is.

Let me tell you that we enjoy great appreciation among all the countries of the Third World and that our policy is precisely what best suits their aspirations. From that viewpoint I think France has never had, or rarely had, such authority and influence in all the countries of the Third World. So you can see that the policy which we pursue is compatible with the great interests and the true interdependencies of the world.

[Cotta] Mr President -- regarding France's authority, speaking more broadly, you have given your backing to the deployment of the U.S. missiles in Europe and at the same time you are giving your approval to Spain joining NATO. Parallel to this you have frozen relations with the USSR. Do you not fear giving the impression of getting closer to the Atlanticist camp, so to speak, and will this not be contrary to or hinder France's moral authority and freedom of action in questions of detente and disarmament?

[Mitterrand] Things are not like that at all. If you were to put the question to the Soviet leaders you would, believe me, have some surprises.

What I can tell you is that when I was elected president I considered my first concern to be to preserve the East-West balance of forces and that this balance is the condition for peace. I called in all the military experts. I asked for all the files to be presented to me.

I noted then that the Soviet Union enjoys enormous advantages in Europe in the conventional sphere of classical weapons, and that in the nuclear, or the so-called tactical sphere, it has a real advantage. In the strategic nuclear sphere a certain supremacy could emerge after 1985-86. From this I thought it was necessary to maintain or restore the balance and this led me to give approval to certain U.S. proposals. So much for the first point.

The second point is that I do not want to see a reversal of developments to the point of restoring the supremacy of one of the two blocs or of one of the two superpowers over the other; without this there is imbalance and risk of war -- risk of war, it must be said, and all who hear must measure the gravity of my words. To preserve this equilibrium it was necessary -- the U.S. decisions having been made -- to get negotiations going with the Soviet Union with all the cards on the table and well aware of what the world would be exposed to if the arms race continued. That is why, after adopting this stance, after seeing the balance of force take shape after the latest U.S. proposals, I called for negotiations. They began 30 November in Geneva between the Soviet Union and the United States.

I approved because I say that, although we do not want SS-20's, which are Soviet missiles capable of destroying the entire military capability of West Europe from the north of Norway to the south of Italy in the space of a quarter-hour, and with an accuracy of about 100 meters, needless to say I believe that the future installation of the U.S. Pershing II missiles, which can reach the nerve centers of the Soviet Union within 5-6 minutes, while the Soviet strategic forces need 20 minutes to cross the Atlantic, would create an imbalance. So we must have neither SS-20's nor Pershings. And this is language which the Soviets are beginning to understand.

As regards Spain and NATO, we have nothing to say on this. We are not members of NATO. That is part of the Atlantic alliance military organization with an integrated command. I have no opinions on this. It is not my concern.

Finally, with regard to the Soviet Union, I can say that while speaking clearly, while continuing to condemn the military occupation of Afghanistan, while warning the Soviet Union against any rash actions in Poland and noting the marked differences in our foreign policies, I intend to maintain a degree of relations between our peoples, our economies. I intend to preserve all the opportunities on our continent for a guaranteed collective security for a country like the Soviet Union and for a country like France, which with the Soviet Union is the only country on the continent to possess an independent nuclear deterrent force, which I intend to maintain and even to sustain to such an extent that we shall always be above the threshold below which there would be no longer be any credibility for French defenses.

[Desgraupes] Many people think that your protests have been rather unjust toward the Jewish state; but on the other hand, I think that, for all sorts of reasons, we find ourselves greatly attracted toward the Arab world if only because of a certain number of economic interests. In the past this attitude has perhaps been pushed very cynically and hailed as a sort of realpolitik, as it has been called. I would like to ask you how you intend to extricate yourself from this ambiguity.

[Mitterrand] By using the same language to the Arabs and to Israel. What I will say in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, I have said in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia; I have said it in Algiers; I will say it in Amman, Jordan, where I have also been invited.

The same language, and this same language is: Israel has the right to exist. This right has been given to it by the United Nations and it has also been recognized by history and by the courage of its people. One cannot refuse it the means of this existence. What it therefore needs are guarantees, secure and recognized frontiers, and one cannot juggle the facts.

The Arab countries and the Palestinian organizations that deny the existence of Israel -- we cannot approve them -- and I have said this in the Arab countries in the same way that I have said to the Israeli -- who are indeed my friends -- I say it is necessary for you to recognize the right of the Palestinian people to exist. It is not up to me to define exactly on the map what will be the georgraphical limits of the entity of the Palestinian homeland; one can discuss Jordan, occupied Jordan -- it will be up to the negotiators to decide -- France is not an arbitrator, not a mediator, it is furthermore not a negotiator. But they are entitled to a homeland. And how can you -- without descending to illusion and lies -- say that there can be a Palestinian homeland if the Palestinians see themselves forbidden to create and to found structures of their choice there. This language is being used here and there.

The policy of France is beginning to be listened to by its Arab friends and by its Israeli friends. Because we are not playing a double game, we run the risk of being understood neither by one side nor the other. We could also have the chance of being understood by one side or the other and even if our proposals are reuected, let France at least preserve her prestige, her aura and her friendships.

[Desgraupe] In other words, you believe that one can introduce morality into foreign politics.

CHEYSSON CITED ON PALESTINIAN STATE POSSIBILITY

PM091157 Paris LE MONDE in French 6-7 Dec 81 p 3

[Text] In an interview pubished on 4 December by the weekly TRIBUNE JUIVE, [External Relations Minister] Claude Cheysson says that he thinks that "the PLO charter, which expresses the intention to destroy Israel, makes negotiations impossible." Nonetheless the minister says that he is convinced that "there will one day be a Palestinian state whose geographical limits will result from negotiations among the forces concerned." "I believe that there is a Palestinian people and I think that there will be a Palestinian state which, if it wishes to have economic independence, will have to reach agreement with its neighbors," he added.

"Peace in the Near East is inconceivable unless the various people recognize each other. Nothing is conceivable if one of the partners denies the existence of the other, if one of the partners says that his objective is to destroy the other," Mr Cheyson also says, explaining that the important thing is an "all-embracing approach." "Progress," according to the ministers, "will be made in stages, and not all at once." Mr Cheysson points out that "the slow development of bilateral contacts is much more useful than a general meeting." "Our contribution to peace is bound to be modest," he adds.

Turning to the question of the representative nature of the PLO, which is regarded by the Arab and Islamic world as "the Palestinian people's sole, exclusive representative," Mr Cheysson says that "there can be no Palestinian representative while there are no state structures." "There can be a representative force, and we regard the PLO as a representative force," he explains. Finally Mr Cheysson stresses that a "general peace agreement in the Near East will have to be guaranteed by all the world powers and by the United Nations."

CHEYSSON CLARIFIES STATEMENT ON MIDEAST PEACE

NC092152 Paris AFP in English 2125 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Text] Brussels, 9 Dec (AFP) -- French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson, who arrived here today from Israel, denied having said there that the European Community's Venice Declaration of the Middle East was "wrong and absurd."

The Venice Declaration of June 1980 stipulated self-determination for the Palestinians and secure borders for all Mideastern nations. During his two-day Israeli visit, Mr Cheysson had given an interview to Jerusalem television in which part of his remarks were summarized by the interviewer.

The minister, here for a NATO ministerial meeting, declared today that "in Jerusalem, I repeated what I have always said: The declaration of principles in Venice has been superseded, superseded by other declarations from the European Community, notably by the one that led to our participation with three other European countries in the multinational Sinai force, because at this point we must go beyond Venice."

"What is wrong and absurd," the minister went on, "is to interpret the Venice Declaration envisaged by some as a declaration of war on the Camp David agreements that would eliminate from any solution countries such as the United States and Egypt." He then recalled the four points of the French position on the Middle East as secure frontiers, the right of peoples to self-determination between the forces of the region with a view to a settlement -- in short, "security for the states and justice for the peoples."

DEFENSE AIDE INTERVIEWED ON WEU REVIVAL

PM071151 Paris LE MATIN in French 27 Nov 81 pp 4-5

[Pascal Krop interview with Secretary of State for Defense Georges Lemoine: "European Defenses: France's Approach" -- date and place not given]

[Text] LE MATIN: The recent proposal by Lucien Pignion, a Socialist deputy, for the creation of an "autonomous military decisionmaking center": in Europe caused some strong feelings. Do you dissociate yourself from that stance?

Georges Lemoine: You refer to the speech made by deputy Pignion, who is chairman of the French delegation to the Western European Union [WEU] Assembly. That speech is interesting for several reasons. The first is that Pignion is one of our most diligent deputies in the European assemblies, be it the European Council or the WEU and, for that reason, what he says deserves our attention. In addition he is a deputy who is also well versed in defense problems. This remark deserves the serious attention which should also be paid to his ideas. Since these remarks have been made, I too would like to refer to his speech. He said: "The ideas I am putting to you do not constitue a government statement." This is an important point. This means that, with the rights of a deputy and the freedom of a man not speaking on behalf of the government, he was expressing a number of hopes. Between reality and hopes there is a gap which constitutes the area of diplomatic realism. Therefore, to make my reply quite clear, there is, so to speak, no conflict between Mr Pignion and I or the government. It is just that the sphere covered is different. This being the case, as he himself pointed out, those statements are personal ones.

LE MATIN: Nonetheless he added that his statements reflect the essence of the government's guiding ideas.

Lemoine: But there are two very important words there. The first is "reflect." Nothing is more misleading than a reflection. The second is "essence." Where does the essence start and where does it end? There is no conflict, just -- as I told you before -- a different sphere of expression for a deputy and somebody who is bound to government action.

LE MATIN: To be more specific, some RPR deputies accuse the government of leaning toward Atlanticism.

Lemoine: Let us not forget that there are some RPR deputies who criticize us for a move toward and rapprochement with supranational structures.

Since May there has been no sign or indication which suggests that there is any rapprochement with the NATO structures. What can be said in addition to this is that, since France officially left NATO, there have still been relations in the context of the Atlantic alliance, if only via the bilateral ties which we have with some of our neighbors. This situation must be stressed from the viewpoint of its spirit and facts. There has been no rapprochement since 10 May and there is nothing to suggest that there is any move toward a rapproachement. These two remarks allow me to place my main replies between the statements by Mr Pignion which you cited and some RPR statements.

LE MATIN; "There is no question of discussing defense within the framework of the EC." [External Relations Minister] Claude Cheysson stated recently, and he added: "There is the WEU for that." Do you share that view?

Lemoine: To take up the remark which you attribute to Mr Cheysson, it is true that in the present state of affairs we consider that defense problems so far are outside the competence of the EC and the European Parliament. If this subject cannot be discussed in the EC, there must be a body, an existing body, a body which is recognized by treaty, like the WEU which we mentioned before. Until this preparatory session [in Paris 1 December] the WEU possibly seemed rather old-fashioned. What is the reason for that? It is almost 30 years since 1948-1954. After 30 years any treaty could give the impression of being less suitable than more recent structures. It is true that the election of the European Parliament by universal suffrage could have given grounds for thinking that at some point that assembly would have tackled defense questions. It has no authority to do so and, as far as we are concerned, we have no reason to say now that it does have that authority. This is true from both the diplomatic and the military viewpoint since our country's whole strategy is based on the defense of the national territory by the means with which you are acquainted.

For that reason, and to cite what [Defense Minister] Charles Hernu said when speaking to the Institute for Advanced National Defense Studies [IHEDN] it is obvious -- and here we are in the framework of hypotheses and strategies -- that an attack on an allied country would also weaken France. In other words, while maintaining the principle of independence in our thinking and in the implementation of our strategy, we cannot deny that an attack made near us would harm our own defense system. We have said that and it must be repeated. Hence we are now aware that, while maintaining France's independent stance, we are bound by the treaties we have signed. We signed the WEU treaties before we even had our own nuclear defense system. These two facts must therefore be taken into account now. That is what we intend to do so. The WEU is the only recognized legal structure which binds seven European countries in the framework of mutual assistance in case of attack. Over the years there have been a number of approaches or adjustments, notably as regards the standing committee on armaments, which have meant that the WEU is no longer what it was originally intended to be. After the failure of the European Defense Community, during Germany's rearmament, it was necessary to make adjustments. But I think that we in France have always been aware, and I refer to [then foreign minister, now minister of state for foreign trade] Michel Jobert's statements in 1973, that the WEU should enable Europe, within a certain area, not to be completely outside the relations, both relations of force and diplomatic relations, which had to exist between the two superpowers.

LE MATIN; People have been saying for 23 years that the WEU is the only competent European body in the defense sphere, without really giving it the means of fulfilling its task. What is the government's intentions in this sphere?

Lemoine: What about NATO? In our view the question does not need to be asked. What about the EC? So far its powers have not been extended. We maintain our position on the WEU. There are at present two tendencies within the WEU framework. First, some partners might think, and this is understandable, that the WEU is expensive. Thus savings should be made which would amount to reducing its means of action. If its means of action are reduced, the aim of its mission is also reduced. You would gradually bring the WEU to a position in which it was merely the shadow of its former self.

By that I mean that, without challenging the WEU, it would be likely to be gradually stripped not of its substance but of its means of action by something of which everybody is very conscious, namely savings. Hence we would be very willing to hold discussions on reorganizing a particular department and seeking some means of making savings, without concealing the difficulties which exist. As regards recruitment, in particular, there is a very wise balance among all the countries which make up the WEU's staff. We intend to propose that the WEU has some possibilities for action. We have listed two such possibilities which we will explain next week. The first is that, given the present rise of pacifism, in Europe, we wonder whether the WEU could examine pacifism. On what is it based? Why does it exist? What are its motives, and goals? I believe that in the WEU framework we could find deputies capable of considering this and making analyses and proposals. When I say that I do not mean that we take or already have a negative attitude toward the question of pacifism. After observing it we want to try to understand it. In the framework of the discussion now taking place in Madrid on disarmament in Europe, we wonder whether it might not be a good idea for a study to be made within the WEU -- I dare not say on the balance of forces because that is a very crucial term at present -- but on what each side has in the way of conventional weapons.

LE MATIN: Do you feel fully bound by all the clauses of the Brussels treaty?

Lemoine: Unless you repudiate a contract you have signed, you accept its terms.

LE MATIN: While not repudiating the terms of that treaty, can some of them not be considered to have been forgotten?

Lemoine: As Pierre Mauroy recalled when speaking to the IHEDN: We will be faithful to the treaties signed by France.

LE MATIN: Since its arrival in government, the left seems to have reaffirmed a degree of Atlantic solidarity....

Lemoine: Atlantic means Atlanticism and Atlanticism means the United States. Introducing the word "Atlanticism" brings in an ambiguity which we do not want. You have to be careful about the connotations of some words. France will respect the clauses of the treaties it has signed, that is our official position. Once that has been done the development of the European framework can be envisaged. But at present, as far as defense problems are concerned, there is only one existing structure and that is the WEU. Period.

Speaks to WEU Assembly

[Text] "Some day it will be necessary to give the work of the Western European Union [WEU] a more substantial content," Secretary of State for Defense Lemoine stated on 1 December in a speech to the WEU Assembly in Paris. Meanwhile the minister protested the current attempts to cut the organization's financial means.

Stressing first the "prodigious" arms "effort" being made "ceaselessly" by the USSR and the "deterioration" in Europe's security, Mr Lemoine recalled that the European Ten (to which Ireland, a nonallied country, belongs) cannot discuss defense. To counter the risks of "Finlandization," neutralism, "Balkanization" and "pacifism which are spreading all the more strongly since Europe is weak and dependent," there is the WEU, Mr Lemoine said, which asserts "in prescise terms the duty to give military assistance" incumbent on all member states, which all also belong to the Atlantic alliance and the EC.

Mr Lemoine suggested that the WEU should draft reports on the pacifist movement and the nuclear balance and that use be made of its standing committee on arms, which has scarcely served any purpose to date. Finally he approved the report submitted by Mr De Poi (Italian Christian Democrat) aimed at organizing relations between the WEU and the European Ten.

That report was adopted by 34 votes to 17 with 5 abstentions, the socialists voting against, with the exception of the French and Italian Socialists, who voted for it. The assembly recommends the WEU Council of Ministers form a working group with the job of planning cooperation between the European Ten and the WEU, defining the two European assemblies' responsibilities and planning the "constitution of a European union based on the harmonization of the Rome treaty" and the WEU treaty. The assembly also advocated that all community members join the WEU.

PS REPORTEDLY TO LAUNCH DISARMAMENT CAMPAIGN

[Text] The PS Executive Bureau has decided to launch a "vast campaign to promote peace and security in Europe," according to an announcement in L'UNITE for 27 November. Initially, the PS weekly indicates, the PS will carry out "information and education activity within the party on the questions of the balance of forces, disarmament and regional security. Subsequently "a public campaign will call for peace to be strengthened via a quest for a military balance at a lower level, the reopening of the SALT negotiations, the success of the Madrid conference and the prospect c a European conference on reducing forces and tension in Europe."

Mr Jacques Huntzinger, assistant member of the national secretariat responsible for international relations, writes, for his part: "The PS thinks that in the present period it must develop a plan of action aimed at reducing the imbalances and the level of nuclear and conventional arms in Europe.... It must prevent at all costs a split developing between the advocates of the Pershings on the one hand and the neutralists and pacifists on the other."

At the Valence congress Mr Lionel Jospin proposed that the PS launch a national petition for peace and the simultaneous disarmament of forces in Europe.

MARCHAIS VIEWS DOMESTIC ISSUES, PARTY CONGRESS

PM101051 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 7 Dec 81 p 4

[Report on "Radio Luxembourg-LE MONDE Grand Jury" interview with PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais on 6 December]

[Excerpts] The PCF secretary general was questioned first on the rate at which reforms should be implemented and statements by J. Delors on a "break." He was also asked whether the "PCF's outbursts against the employers" are not embarrassing rather than helping the government.

Marchais began by saying: "In fact the employers are not playing the game. They are refusing to invest and are hindering the government's industrial recovery plan." Turning to the PCF's attitude, he added: "Our policy is simple, we take into consideration the fact that the people voted for a policy and certain reforms.... They should therefore be implemented.... If the government is to attain its objectives the vital reforms must be implemented, as the president and premier have said."

In Marchais' view, "It is necessary to remove the obstacle raised by the political forces which oppose change." He then reaffirmed that "The Communists' concern, in government, parliament and their organizations, is to overcome these obstacles."

New Approach

Questioned once again on the rate of reforms, the PCF secretary general stated: "We are on the right road, the answers given on this subject by the premier -- and it is these that count -- satisfy us."

"I am not saying that there are no problems," Marchais said in reply to a journalist who was concerned about the Communists' mobilization.

"But most of the Communist militants have never experienced such a period, a government with Communist ministers. We had been in opposition since 1947. We are now part of the majority.... That requires new behavior and a new approach. We are learning from this new situation. That is true of all levels, from the cell to the Central Committee."

Then he added: "Of course some people are wondering: Should we have joined the government or not, in view of the party's results? This is a problem. Nonetheless the Communist militants are behaving in a perfectly constructive way and I welcome this."

The rest of the program related mainly to preparations for the 24th PCF congress. Since one of his interlocutors expressed the view that the draft resulution "glosses over" the 1977-1981 period, Marchais replied that there is indeed an analysis of the past 4 years in the document submitted to the members. The reason why it does not spend much time on 1977, the secretary general said, is that the 23d congress has already analyzed it, drawn the necessary conclusions and fixed the party's tasks accordingly.

"The opinion of the party Central Committee expressed in the draft resolution," Marchais said, "is that during the 1977-1981 period the PCF behaved in the only way it could, and any other attitude would have been infinitely more negative than the drop in our influence in the elections." The PCF secretary general then stressed that the PCF is the only party to make a "critical reappraisal" of its past. Some people, he added, accuse us of dodging the issue or blaming dead Communist leaders for our setbacks. "This is a very strange way of portraying things," he said, stressing the fact that although it was necessary to go back to the fifties to explain why we are lagging, "We feel accountable for all of that period. We are still accountable for what the party has done."

In this connection he pointed out that the question of the "1956 lag" was first raised at the 23d congress: "Criticism of that period when we undoubtedly started lagging behind was started before our election setback," Marchais stressed, and he pointed out that the new strategy was raised by Waldeck Rochet in 1968 and by the "Champigny manifesto." He then recalled the analysis made by the Central Committee which is now being discussed: "There is no doubt that we have lagged behind in assessing the deep-seated changes coming about in France"; we have failed to draw up a strategy quickly enough for France's transition to socialism -- a view of socialism for our country. "It is probable," Marchais also said, "that the burden of the model provided by the only socialist society hung over us too long." As a result of that the Communists became bound by a concept -- the form of union inherited from the popular front and the liberation -- which placed them "in an inferior position" when it came to countering "the formidable campaign waged against them on the basis of mistakes made in the USSR before the 20th CPSU Congress."

Georges Marchais recalled that the 22d and 23d congresses made it possible to draw up a "clear and effective strategy." Take the example of "union" -- of "union at grass roots level on specific objectives." It is a union which can and must be reflected in agreements at the top, he said, but without those agreements preceding the mass movement.

Finally with regard to radio and television, Marchais expressed the view that a rapid reform is necessary since we are still governed by the 1974 law which provided a cover for practices and methods whose consequences are still being felt today. The PCF secretary general said that we must have "honesty and pluralism in news and pluralism with regard to journalists, including the hiring of Communist journalists. "Journalists," he said, "must practice their profession without account being taken of their political opinions and without pressures being exerted on them."

POLLS SHOW CONTINUING CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT

[Text] Three opinion polls confirm that the new government continues to enjoy the confidence of the people. Two of these polls, published by LE POINT and LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS on 23 November reveal a slight deterioration in the climate of confidence, however. They were carried out by IFOP and Indice-Opinion respectively, the first between 10 and 16 November in a survey sample of 1,774 persons aged 18 and over, and the second between 12 and 14 November in a survey sample of 1,000 persons aged 18 and over. The survey published by LE PARISIEN LIBERE of 23 November was carried out between 5 and 10 November in a survey sample of 1,000 persons. As this particular survey was the first of its kind, it cannot be compared with any earlier surveys.

According to the IFOP-LE POINT opinion poll, 45 percent of respondents evaluated Mr Mitterrand's performance in office positively, which is the same percentage as that recorded in the previous survey carried out in August. However, the number of people who are not happy with the president's performance has risen noticeably (from 30 percent to 35 percent). Favourable assessments of Mr Mauroy's performance have fallen from 47 percent to 45 percent, and negative assessments have risen from 25 percent to 34 percent. Forty-four percent of respondents (as opposed to 47 percent in August) think that the government is doing the right thing in tackling the economic problems whereas 41 percent (compared with 35 percent) think the opposite.

This opinion poll shows that the leftwing majority is still politically more popular (48 percent compared with 51 percent) than the opposition (27 percent compared with 28 percent in August). It also reveals a breakthrough by Mr Delors with whom 40 percent of respondents (compared with a previous 37 percent) now identify. The minister of economy and finance is the second most popular member of the government behind Mr Rocard (53 percent as opposed to 54 percent).

LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS publishes the survey conducted by Indice-Opinion under the heading: "A Time of Disenchantment." According to this poll, 59 percent of respondents have confidence in the government (compared with 61 percent in October). The number of respondents who do not have any confidence in the government has risen (from 31 percent to 34 percent). There is concern over the economic situation. A substantial majority of respondents (58 percent as opposed to 52 percent the previous month) think that the situation will deteriorate over the coming months, that purchasing power will fall (68 percent as opposed to 62 percent of respondents) and that unemployment will rise (63 percent as opposed to 54 percent).

Mr Rocard is the most popular of political figures: 65 percent of respondents (compared with 58 percent) think highly of him. He is followed by Mr Mauroy, who is down 4 percent with 64 percent, and Mr Mitterrand, who is down 2 percent with 59 percent. Mr Chirac is still in first place among members of the opposition who "will certainly have an important role to play in the future." But support for him has fallen by 3 percent (from 61 percent to 58 percent). Support for Mr Giscard d'Estaing, who is in second place, has also fallen by 3 percent (from 39 percent to 36 percent).

According to the survey carried out by SOFRES-PARISIEN LIBERE if a presidential election were held immediately Mr Mitterrand would be reelected with 54 percent of the vote as against 46 percent for Mr Giscard d'Estaing. A substantial majority of respondents (65 percent) think the president is doing his job well, whereas only 17 percent are of the opposite opinion. The head of state's performance in matters relating to social peace, the reduction of inequalities, France's place in the world and particularly regarding the implementation of major reforms is evaluated postively. As far as price rises, unemployment and citizens' sense of security are concerned, however, his performance is evaluated negatively.

COLOMBO STATEMENT ON COMMUNITY, GENEVA TALKS

[Text] Rome, 9 Dec (ANSA) -- Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo discussed the problem of European integration and the Soviet-United States European theater nuclear weapons talks underway in Geneva in a statement delivered this morning to the lower house to open debate on the meeting of the heads of state and government of the European Economic Community in London, held November 26 and 27.

With reference to the U.S.-Soviet "Euromissile" negotiations, which opened November 30, the foreign minister disclosed that he had sent a note to Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko on matters of mutual interest for Italy and the Soviet Union pertaining to the Geneva talks. In his message, Colombo said, he sought to focus the attention of the Soviet diplomatic chief on the enormous political significance of the zero option against the backdrop of the process of East-West cooperation and detente, whose development depends on stability and international security. The zero option the minister cited would represent a NATO decision to not deploy 572 cruise and Pershing II medium-range nuclear missiles in European NATO countries in exchange for the dismantlement of the Soviet SS-20's targeted on Western Europe.

Moving on to the problem of reviving the drive towards European integration, Colombo said that the failure of the London summit to reach agreement on all the issues up for discussion should not be a cause for alarm. According to the Italian diplomatic chief, the problem does not consist of finding solutions for specific controversies within the European Community, such as farm policy or EEC rulings on competition. What is involved, he said, is the requirement to generate the political will for reviving European integration so as to work on the common background of all these unsettled issues. "We asked for and gathered consensus on the point that the restructurization and revival of joint policy is to be guaranteed through a more active coordination of national economic and sector policies," Colombo declared.

He went on to cite as the problem of special importance for Italy the issue of Mediterranean farm produce. "We strongly maintained that, even with plans to enlarge the community, the present protection accorded Mediterranean production must be strengthened."

In conclusion, the foreign minister underscored the point that the outcome of the London summit confirmed the thinking that European construction can be advanced only through balanced and integrated progress which includes economic, political and social policy cooperation.

BERLINGUER SEES VALUE OF PCI THIRD WORLD CONTACTS

LD092016 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Interview with PCI Secretary General Berlinguer by correspondent Pietro Buttitta on 9 December on return from Algeria -- recorded]

[Excerpt] [Berlinguer] Generally speaking, our international activity is being carried out in two directions: One, toward the workers movement and the left in Western Europe, with which we seek agreement in order to defend peace, oppose the arms race and find new roads for the transformation of Western societies in the direction of socialism. Second, we seek more fruitful relations with the liberation movements and progressive forces of the Third World in an attempt to contribute to the construction of a new international economic order. Our relations with the Algerian National Liberation Front are of particular importance because of the closeness and frequency of our contacts and because we consider Algeria a key country in the dialogue with the Third World. PSD STATEMENT CRITICAL OF COUNCIL OF REVOLUTION

[Text] "It is important to ensure that the semi-presidential system's set of powers is not imbalanced, and this means that the president should see some of his powers as regards relations with parliament and with the government limited," since the mere winding up of the Council of the Revolution will in itself give rise to "an increase in the president's powers," the strategy motion approved yesterday by the Social Democratic Party [PSD] National Political Commission, which will be submitted to that party's upcoming congress, states.

This strategy motion, which to some extent will represent the Social Democrats' official line, begins by emphasizing the need to rediscover national identity; something which presupposes the safeguarding of national independence, respect for Portugal's own identity within the international context, the safeguarding and enriching of our historical heritage and encouragement of cultural creativity, and the existence of conditions of real economic, social and political viability of the country as a sovereign state. Within the context of safeguarding national independence, the motion maintains that foreign policy should "stem from consideration of the country's essential and permanent interests and should be the outcome of the free choice of the supreme bodies of state power, without interference or subservience of any kind." Thus, considering that the country's essential interests are those which define it as a Western nation belonging to the Atlantic alliance and NATO, and expressing the viewpoint that the safeguarding of democracy implies the rejection of dictatorial regimes, "whether of a leftwing, rightwing or populist cast," and defense against the USSR and the Warsaw Pact, the motion states that Western rearmament is viewed "as an act of legitimate defense" and a guarantee of better balance in East-West relations, without which negotiations in the field of disarmament will only result in a mere advance of Soviet expansionism.

In addition, and in the field of foreign policy, the PSD expresses through this motion the viewpoint that "EEC membership within the agreed period should constitute a paramount aim of national policy, although this membership must be judiciously prepared for domestically...And the negotiations should be conducted in such a manner that the country's vital interests are safeguarded." In the same area of political action, the stance is also expressed that the strengthening of the existing ties with peoples whose official language is Portuguese and with the moderate Arab states is important for the country's real interests. In addition to condemning apartheid and hailing the Polish people -- especially the workers belonging to Solidarity -- the motion to be submitted to the PSD congress adopts a stance on the problems of East Timor, stating in this connection:

"Observance of the principle of the self-determination of peoples in all its scope and in all parts of the world leads the congress to highlight Portugal's position of historical and political responsibility toward East Timor -- the victim of foreign military occupation. For this reason, the congress demands of the president, the government and the assembly of the republic concerted and effective action conducive to the restoration of real conditions of self-determination for the people of Timor and in accordance with the relevant resolutions which have been adopted in the meantime within the UN framework."

PSD Opposed To Collectivization of Society

While accepting that the state should have an active role in creating the conditions essential to the development of society and to citizens' welfare, the PSD rejects in its motion "deviations or slides toward the collectivization of society," and believes that the reorganization of the civil service is a precondition for the existence and rebuilding of the democratic state.

To the same end it asserts the need for noninterference by the government in social and associative structures and the continuation of a policy of dialogue between the government and the social forces, "specifically, those most representative of the various sectors of Portuguese society."

The document also comments on the need to strengthen civil society, since there is no democracy where "bodies not based on democratic legitimacy strictly supervise the activity of the bodies with a democratic basis." To that end it reaffirms the "indispensability of winding up the Council of the Revolution and hails the parliamentary agreement which has already been reached in that area, while at the same time "warning and drawing the public's attention to possible attempts by the Council of the Revolution leading to the promulgation of legislation aimed at confirming situations in the field of the policy on the definition and organization of national defense." [quotes as published]

Defense of Political Parties

The next topic in the motion to be submitted to the PSD congress is the need to consolidate the political parties and strengthen democratic coexistence -- a matter on which, after several reflections on the importance of the political parties, the document to be approved by the PSD's top body specifically states:

"The congress regards the possible emergence of new parties on the national political scene as legitimate and fully democratic, but only if and when they are accepted as a genuine expression of citizens' free will and are bearers of an identical political message, clearly counterposed to that of the existing parties. And for this reason it regards as extremely disruptive of the normality and clarity of democratic life the recently revived indications pointing toward the setting up of political fronts comprising personalities and forces of a contradictory nature and apparently serving as a support for an authoritarianism of a presidentialist nature, which, moreover, has not been denied outright by its potential beneficiaries." Again in the field of the political parties, the PSD adopts a stance on possible agreements with the "democratic opposition" parties, stating peremptorily that no agreement "should be reached as regards access to the exercise of political power," since "in terms of government, the camps are clearly defined, and the political struggle among options has been and will be the keynote." However, the Social Democrats should "contribute, within the framework of strict observance of their commitments in the Democratic Alliance, to agreement on issues concerning the system with the democratic prties -- specifically, the Socialist Party." Moreover, from the viewpoint of the PSD's official line, which this document represents, the reaching of a certain agreement on issues concerning the system with the "democratic opposition" parties is "all the more important since its realization reduces the scope for maneuver of messianic, authoritarian, militarizing or even autocratic appeals."

Economic Situation

After expressing the viewpoint that it is necessary to continue and galvanize the policy of administrative autonomy for the Azores and Madeira and strengthen local government on the mainland, the motion analyzes the economic problem with which Portugal is contending, maintaining that they stem not only from international circumstances and domestic imponderables such as the drought besetting the country but also fromthe institutional subordination of the creative role of the private and cooperative sectors, and so the revision of the constitution should create conditions for the unblocking of the Portuguese economic system. According to this PSD document to be submitted at the congress, there is a need for coordinated economic growth guided by aims concerning the quality of life, a policy of considerable budgetary stringency and of control over inflation and an incomes policy which, although it cannot be aimed at a wholesale increase in purchasing power, should, however, ensure its maintenance as far as possible. To offset the difficulty in substantially increasing wages, the PSD believes that the population's basic needs -- specifically, in the fields of housing, transportation and health -- should be satisfied.

Revision of Constitution

The motion to be submitted to the PSD congress also seeks to define the guidelines which should govern the revision of the constitution, emphasizing in this connection that this should "defend the guidelines of a political, economic and social democracy," which implies enshrining the "disappearance of all forms of military tutelage, the armed forces' subordination to the civil political power, the continued existence of the semi-presidential system of government, without presidential tendencies or subjugations, the impartiality of the Constitutional Court, respect for party pluralism, the enjoyment and exercise of citizens' basic rights, recognition of the essence and development of the political and administrative autonomy of the Azores and Madeira, the safeguarding of local government, the elimination of dogmatism -- especially in economic organization -- and the boosting of private and cooperative enterprise in Portuguese society."

Galvanize Democratic Alliance Blueprint

Next, the motion to be submitted to the PSD congress emphasizes the need for the Democratic Alliance's blueprint to be galvanized and implemented, and stresses that the occasional disharmonies in the coalition or the internal exacerbations -- or even those manipulated from outside -- are the natural and healthy tensions of an interparty dynamic" [no opening quotemark] only serve "attempts at seizing power on the part of regressive movements" or the "plans for destabilizing the system on the part of totalitarian forces -- in particular, the PCP" -- especially at a time when the political situation indicates "the absence of a credible and democratic government alternative."

Relations among the various state bodies, especially between the government and the president, are also analyzed in the PSD motion, which, while maintaining the viewpoint of the need for the balancing of constitutional powers and respect for the various elections, expresses its disagreement, however, with recent statements and stances adopted by Gen Ramalho Eanes, also adding: "The personification of the unity and sovereignty of the state and the dignity" of the president's role itself are affected when a movement of encouragement aimed at the emergence of a presidential party is allowed, even by means of voluntary silence, to be created in public opinion via news media with well-known leanings. Last, the motion, after stating the need for the PSD to "combat frontally the PCP and its allies in the antidemocratic opposition" and the need to preserve Portugal by strengthening the Portuguese nature of the communities living abroad, concludes by recalling the memory of Franciso Sa Carneiro and his activity, "which Francisco Pinto Balsemao has been able to continue."

TEXT OF ARMY OFFICERS', NCOS' MANIFESTO ISSUED

PM101057 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 6 Dec 81 pp 1, 14

[Excerpts] Some 100 armed forces officers and NCO's, whose names, services and posts are published in the inside pages, have signed a lengthy document which expresses the dissatisfaction of these military personnel with the treatment accorded to the armed forces in the news media. The complete text of the document is as follows:

To public opinion in general and to those responsible for the news media in particular: As officers and NCO's of the armed forces, conscious of and responsible for our mission, which is clearly enshrirednin Article 8 of the constitution, loyal to the solemn oath to our fatherland and loyal to the people, of whom we form an inseperable part and among whom we practice daily our profession, which -- let it never be forgotten -- we entered as a career, we have ascertained over the last few years, and with greater proliferation over the last few months, many public stances and reports which, because of their importance and because they refer to the armed forces of their members, cause us to emerge from our usual silence.

We might summarize these activities of reports as follows:

1 -- Articles, commentaries and reports on our services and security forces which, often through lack of knowledge and at other times through dishonesty, perpetrate glaring mistakes, distorted approaches or groundless assertions which, in short -- frivolously or deliberately -- distort the image which the people have of their armed forces, their current situation and their aspirations.

3 -- Undervaluing of, contempt for and attacks on the national and military symbols and values which, without entering into a detailed account, we summarize as those receiving daily by our flag -- the expression of the fatherland's unity, the constant attempt to darken virtues such as honor, heroism or discipline, the demolition of the monuments to those who -- setting us a permanent example -- shed their last drop of blood for Spain, the removal from the names of the streets of our towns and cities of those who, wearing military uniform, held the posts of greatest responsibility in the fatherland's recent history, or the removal of our most esteemed decoration from the coat of arms of a province which was able to earn it through its collective courage.

4 -- Commentaries and reports on the armed forces and their way of acting and thinking in relation to the current political situation, followed by demands for professionalization, democratization or purging of their members -- proof of absolute distrust of the military on the part of partisan sectors which are seeking by any method to destroy the armed forces in order to replace them by others in their own service.

5 -- Generalized or direct attacks, insults, affronts and slanders against members of the armed forces, all of them with brilliant and irreproachable records, especially those who because of their rank and age were heroes of glorious feats of arms and whose courage and professional integrity cannot be called into question by mere conjectures, especially when some of them are awaiting the sentence of a court martial whose findings on proven facts and the legal assessment of those facts will determine the honorableness or otherwise of their conduct.

7 -- Partisan and antinational politicization of the major defense issues -- such as our joining NATO -- or interference, also partisan, in the armed forces' own internal affairs, such as the setting up of the armored service, promotions and appointments policy or the selection of senior officials, with approaches which have nothing to do with purely technical and professional approaches.

In light of these facts we assert that: 1) Our solemn oath to the flag to defend the fatherland's honor, independence and unity is of a permanent nature; 2) We accept Spain's history with pride, and homage to those who gave their lives in its defense constitutes a mainstay of our collective and personal life; 3) The national symbols and military virtures are the heritage of an entire people -- past, present and future -- which nothing and nobody who feels Spanish can disregard or despise; 4) The armed forces, in order to fulfill their mission better, do not need to be professionalized, democratized or purged but merely to be esteemed and respected, as they should be, and have the necessary material means for fulfilling their aims; 5) The political authorities should respect the armed forces' necessary autonomy as regards internal organization and functioning in order to guarantee the absence of partisan interests in their bodies and units; 6) We regard the insults and attacks on our comrades as aimed at the organization [la colectividad], with the consequences to which this gives rise, since we have the code of military justice to punish in due form those who commit any misdeed, and our reputation and prestige must not be slandered by anybody; 7) Any report, article, commentary or value judgment concerning the armed forces which could help to improve and publicize them should be set out with knowledge of military affairs, profound respect for the armed forces and their mission and total exclusion of a destructive spirit in its approach.

We make these points, although they are a reflection of broad opinion, on a personal basis and in accordance with what is stipulated in Article 178 of the Royal Ordinances of the Armed Forces.

PRIME MINISTERS DISCUSS ECONOMIC PROJECTS

LD091600 Helsinki International Service in English 0930 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Excerpts] At a variety of meetings in Helsinki on Monday and Tuesday the Nordic prime ministers discussed security policy, the Nordic labor market agreement and joint Nordic project exports. The meetings were chaired by Finland's acting prime minister Eino Uusitalo, and the other ministers participating were Swedish Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin, Norwegian Prime Minister Kaare Willoch, Icelandic Prime Minister Gunnar Thoroddsen and representing the Danish prime minister Foreign Minister Kjeld Olessen.

Views were also exchanged on the international situation. The question of a Nordic nuclear-weapons free zone was discussed at the prime ministers' official gathering on Monday night. Norwegian Prime Minister Kaare Willoch and the Danish representative, Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen, said they stressed that a nuclear-weapons free north is not a matter of topical concern. In their view, all efforts should be concentrated on the current U.S.-Soviet talks in Geneva. Swedish Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin stressed that Sweden is interested in advancing the project. He repeated his government's view that the Baltic must be part of such a nuclear-weapons free zone. Prime Minister Falldin also gave his colleagues an account of the recent incident involving the Soviet submarine grounded off the Swedish coast. Finland's acting prime minister Eino Uusitalo took no stand on the question of fixing a timetable for the implementation of a Nordic nuclear-weapons free zone. He stressed that Finland regards President Kekkonen's initiative on this question as very important and expressed his satisfaction over the fact that the Nordic foreign ministers had decided earlier in the autumn to continue discussions on the matter.

GO-AHEAD GIVEN FOR NEW SUBMARINES, MISSILE BOATS

PM100951 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 27 Nov 81 p 26

[Erik Liden report]

[Excerpt] The navy's largest-ever order placed with Swedish shiphards -- worth 1.1 billion kronor -- will become a reality 8 December, when the Defense Materiel Administration orders four new submarines from the Kockum shipyard in Malmoe and two missile boats from the Karlskrona shipyard.

The submarine incident outside Karlskrona has been swift to make its mark on the planning departments at military headquarters and at the Defense Ministry. When Rear Adm Gunnar Grandin signs the contract for four completely new submarines, called the A-17 in the planning stage, at Kockums 8 December, that order alone will be worth 800 million kronor.

At the same time the government has decided to allow the navy to build two new missile boats at the Karlskrona shipyard. They will cost 125 million kronor each and are a continuation of the torpedo boats in the Spica class, although they will be longer and heavier and with more missile armaments. Saab's new sea-to-sea missile -- the 15 missile -- will be the boats' main armaments, but the missile boats will also be able to be used on submarine hunt missions, and will be equipped with a modern trailing hydrophone which can be set for different depths and listen for submarines in the Baltic. The navy is making investments in coastal defenses since the surmarine affair showed with a desirable clarity that Sweden's readiness needs to be improved in the form of technical equipment. Thus submarines and the missile boats are the first part of this improvement.

GOVERNMENT WANTS TACTICAL WEAPONS DISCUSSED

PM091319 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 3 Dec 81 p 5

[Ingmar Lindmarker Report]

[Text] Sweden will attempt to persuade the superpowers at the United Nations to extend the Geneva negotiations to embrace all tactical nuclear weapons in Europe, including the Soviet Union. At a meeting with the press on Wednesday [2 December] Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Inga Thorsson, who is in charge of disarmament work, said that Sweden would like to see the talks concentrate primarily on the smaller nuclear arms with short range and relatively small explosive capacity. There are around 10,000 such tactical nuclear warheads in Europe, 6,000 of which are in West Europe. It is being claimed increasingly often, in the U.S. disarmament debate, for example, that an agreement to dismantle these warheads would be easiest to reach quickly.

The Geneva negotiations, which begin Monday, primarily affect "Eurostrategic arms" with greater capacity and range. In this context the United States has avoided the term "theater nuclear forces," (TNF) and is now speaking of negotiations on INF, "Intermediate-range nuclear forces."

Mrs Thorsson said that next year at the United Nations Sweden will claim that INF talks are not enough. In the endeavors to avert nuclear war efforts must be concentrated on the arsenal of smaller tactical nuclear arms in Europe, and Sweden cites the expert debate which has arisen concerning these weapons' decreasing importance. [as published] Sweden takes the view that disarmament work in the United Nations -- despite continued "colossal distrust" and mutual recriminations between the superpowers -- has eased somewhat in the course of the fall. After a long silence, which the Soviet Union exploited in a peace offensive, the Reagan administration has made certain initiatives and an intense disarmament debate is taking place in the United States.

In the UN General Assembly's first committee, in which Inga Thorsson and Ambassador Curt Lidgard have led Swedish contributions, an intense debate has grown up concerning weapons in outer space, open reporting of military expenditure and the use of chemical weapons. Despite tough accusations and counteraccusations about chemical weapons -- the Soviet Union alleging U.S. misuse in Vietnam and the United States alleging Soviet use in Afghanistan, Laos and Kampuchea -- it is seen as a success that the United Nations has been given a role to play. As a footnote it can be reported that the Soviet Union's representatives in the disarmament bodies have been badly affected by the affair of submarine 137 in the Swedish archipelago.

LISSARIDHIS CRITICIZES WALDHEIM ROLE IN TALKS

[Text] In a letter to UN Secretary General Waldheim, EDEK chairman Lissaridhis criticizes the UN secretary for his role on the Cyprus issue. In his letter, Lissaridhis also mentions that the evaluation Waldheim submitted on the intercommunal talks does not reflect reality and that his recommendations violate UN principles. He calls on the UN secretary general to withdraw his ideas and to insist on implementation of the UN resolutions on Cyprus.

He said Guneri was in the island in connection with investment projects, economic measures and economic improvement measures. He added that they also discussed the current government crisis.

Denktas reiterated that Guneri did not come to the island to intervene. Consequently, he added, the atmosphere the Greek Cypriot administration is trying to create around the visit of the honorable pasha is misleading. He has not come here to intervene. We will make the necessary decisions within the framework of our own democratic system and in line with our communal and national interests.

BAYULKEN: GREEK DEMAND FOR GUARANTEE 'MEANINGLESS'

[Text] National Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken has said that the Greek Government's request for a guarantee from NATO for the defense of its territory is meaningless.

Bayulken made this statement in a news conference he held at NATO Headquarters in Brussels at the end of the NATO Defense Planning Committee meeting today. Bayulken said NATO's goals and principles are clear and that a new alliance must be established in order to meet Greece's demand. Pointing out that there have been problems between Turkey and Greece for 30 years or so, Bayulken said, however, that since Greek Prime Minister Papandreou assumed office, unprecedented problems have arisen.

According to reports by Turkish Radio and Television correspondents Nusret Ozgul and Saadettin Turyakioglu from Brussels, Bayulken noted that Turkey is ready for a dialogue with Greece, but Papandreou opted for argument rather than dialogue.

[Text] National Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken has termed as meaningless the Greek Government's request for a guarantee from NATO for the defense of its territory against Turkey. In a news conference at the end of the NATO Defense Planning Committee, Bayulken said this Greek request was not compatible with NATO goals and principles. He added that other NATO member countries also did not approve of this demand.

Bayulken pointed out that problems between Turkey and Greece have existed for 30 years now and have not emerged [as heard] since Papandreou's assumption of power. Recalling that Turkey has always expressed its desire to engage in a dialogue with Greece, Bayulken said Greek Prime Minister Papandreou opted for argument rather than dialogue.

In reply to a correspondent who asked his views on expected developments in the event Greece withdraws from NATO's military wing, Bayulken said Turkey does not desire such a development.

No 'Confrontation' With Greece

TA101536 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1525 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] Brussels, 10 Dec (AA) -- Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken told a press conference in Brussels today despite press reports to the contrary, the NATO Defense Planning Committee which ended without issuing a communique did not witness a confrontation between Turkey and Greece. In reply to a question, he said Turkey was "not offended" and it was out of question for Turkey to withdraw from the alliance.

Refuting the Greek allegation that Turkey was threatening Greece as "imaginary," Bayulken admitted there were certain problems between Turkey and Greece but none of these came into being after the Papandreou government assumed power. "In case the Greek premier had not referred continuously during his election campaign to a potential threat from Turkey, maintaining such an attitude even after the elections, we might not have objected to the inclusion in the NATO communique of a general statement. But a statement implying a Turkish threat is unacceptable," he said.

Referring to Greek premier's statement that Greece was rejecting partially the "Rogers plan" under which Greece had returned to NATO's military wing, Bayulken said the statement was obscure.

SPANISH MINISTER SEES NO MEMBERSHIP PROCESS PROBLEMS

LD110020 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca said at a news conference here in Brussels following the signing of the protocol of Spanish accession to NATO that all Spaniards will realize that entering NATO strengthens democracy and the security of the people.

Perez-Llorca said Greece will not cause any difficulties in the subsequent stages of Spain's entry into NATO. During the past few days the prime minister, Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, has talked on the telephone with the Greek prime minister, Papandreou. The latter assured Calvo-Sotelo that Greece has its own problems with NATO.

In connection with Spain's future relations with the Soviet Union, Perez-Llorca said that the government will maintain the same relations with the Soviet Union, in many cases privileged relations, as many NATO countries have.

At this news conference, the minister stated that Spain's relations of friendship with the United States will only be strengthened when Spain joins NATO. He added that all of this will change the situation of the U.S. bases in Spain. The Spanish minister said Spain will also maintain the same privileged relations from now on with the other member countries of the Atlantic alliance.

In reply [word indistinct] to a question on the possibility of installing nuclear weapons in Spain, Perez-Llorca said the Spanish Government has no plans for this and that this is a matter that would be decided by the Spanish parliament.

The minister of foreign affairs will return to Madrid tonight.

GENSCHER ASSESSES UPCOMING FRG-GDR MEETING

LD101430 Hamburg DPA in German 1328 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 10 Dec (DPA) -- According to FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher, great importance will be attached to the subjects of disarmament and European peace policy at the German-German summit meeting on the weekend. In Bonn today he said that now, shortly after the start of the Geneva disarmament negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union, it is important that the meeting between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and the chairman of the GDR Council of State, Erich Honecker, also send out a "signal of the German and European peace policy". On the basis of the basic treaty between the two German states and of the Helsinki Final Act "we Germans must primarily try to reduce tensions between East and West."

Genscher said that German-German relations and developments in Europe are inseparably linked with one another. The overfall climate of East-West policy determines the weather in Germany too. "On the other hand, however, improvements and easier conditions in German-German relations are also important building blocks for a peaceful development in all of Europe." For this reason it was a matter here, too, of achieving progress in the humanitarian sphere in the talks at Lake Werbellin. "Easier conditions for the people in Germany who want to visit and to join one another are a contribution which the Germans could make for peace in Europe," Genscher said.

DIETZE ANALYZES EAST GERMAN YOUTH PROTESTS

DW101053 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 11 Dec 81 p 16

[Article by Lutz Dietze, professor for public and educational law at Bremen University]

[Excerpts] In the view of the GDR leadership, youth protests in the Federal Republic, squatting and violent clashes with the police are visible proof of the aggravation of the class-political controversy in capitalist states, or a state youth policy which is at variance with the interests of the youth. Under existing socialism, in contrast, everything is entirely different. They say: In the GDR every young person has his safe prospects.

This applicable, however, only to those young people who fit themselves into the all-embracing care system with discipline, diligence and obedient observance of their duties. Generally the young people accept the principle: "The state is doing something for my education, wherefore it can also demand something of me," says a 16-year old school graduate. But this includes the (at least seemingly) complete identification with the ruling social system. In the past few months, however, something has happened which, to go by the GDR's self-image, actually should not happen at all: Young people express displeasure and even demonstrate. In bigger towns of the GDR in particular the youth protest has assumed uncontrolled organized forms and at times even took place in public.

In early April 1981 hundreds of young people participated in an open-air rock festival in Erfurt; they had been prohibited from participating because the state security service had found that the song lyrics contained antistate agitation and propaganda. When police finally took massive action they needed hours to get control of the situation. Many young people were arrested and subsequently condemned to detention terms of up to 2 years in summary court procedures. Nevertheless, the protest movement spread to other cities, for example, Weimar. Just a few weeks earlier some riots had occured in Plauen (Vogtland area) and in Karl-Marx-Stadt. Similar conflicts happened in Rostock and Berlin, and most recently in Eisenhuettenstadt, albeit with less dramatic concomitant circumstances.

The cause of the riots in Plauen was similar to that of Zurich: Several hundred young people demanded in choruses that the local executive board of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany (SED) let them have a meeting place of their own: the old railroad station building which is no longer in use. School pupils and apprentices resisted the arriving people's police and started a sit-down strike. It was put to an end like in Erfurt.

In Rostock a similar demand by young people was defused in that the Free German Youth (FDJ) successfully intervened with the municipal office for real estate utilization for a youth center; this probably succeeded because the "Polish spark" had already jumped over and a further escalation had to be feared. In reality the young people had wanted a "youth-owned" clubhouse and not one controlled by the FDJ. But when the city administration -- allegedly for the purpose of saving energy -- turned off the heating for the youth in winter, many interventions with the Kreis and Bezirk administration were needed until the required heat was supplied. The grumble has continued to this day. Yet the FDJ, by its adaptation readiness, seems to have weakened the protest rather than opened itself even to unorthodox juvenile demands.

Indications of a critical sentiment increase in schools as well. Teachers complain about a decline in the zeal for learning; cases of work refusal, lack of discipline and damage to material objects have increased. The school directorate reacts with lack of understanding: After all, socialism offers the pupils social security, coziness and jobs. So why be against it? If GDR teachers are asked where they see the causes of the growing displeasure in the generation of pupils the answer mostly is: the home. According to this view pupils showing difficulties of learning and discipline mostly come from abject homes: They draw attention to the high divorce rate in the GDR. Besides, the teachers feel that most parents are disinterested in political questions and measure the potential of real socialism only by the standard of the options of consumption in West Germany. Today's youth displays an alarmingly "materialistic" attitude and does not have any ideals, they say.

The attempts to arouse the enthusiasm of young people for the ideals of socialism have not yielded the desired results. The readiness to join the FDJ has abated -- whereupon the FDJ executive board and the advising teachers have turned tables on these youths: Not every applicant is admitted to the organization anymore but only those who have consolidated socialist views and on the whole can prove tangible their constructive attitude. In return the membership in the FDJ entails advantages, for instance the recommendation to the extended secondary school with corresponding assistance in the preparatory courses. The "ticklish topics," meaning the contradiction between propaganda and the realities of life are discussed during lessons on purpose. If pupils ask, for example, why they are not allowed to travel to capitalist foreign countries they are told: Just imagine you were in the FRG and out of a job. Then you could not go wherever you wanted to, either. Go to the socialist fraternal states first and conquer this world. Then we shall see.

It is, however, only a minority of the pupils who experimentally shake the basic pillars of the social system. Most of them miss bourgeois liberties only if and when they are individually affected. They do see the positive aspects of collective education -- readiness to help, comradeship. The more active part of the youth assimilates. The shock over Poland is deep. This is why the younger people in the SED are now discussing what the party must do to prevent a similar development in the GDR. But so far they only are a critical minority.

They say: The improvement in the material living conditions can be put into practice in the long run if the mass of the working people can be urged to step up productivity. This presupposes, in turn, that the identification with the social system be more positive than heretofore. This could possibly be achieved through a controlled and dosed reorientation in information policy, paired with a persuasion to work adapted to the citizen's interest.

It is striking that the juvenile protest in the GDR shows related features to that in West Germany because the causes are similar. An exaggerated security requirement of the state provokes freedom requirements on the part of the young people, that is to say, among those who as yet are not "anybody" in society and who have nothing to lose as well. This is reason for self-criticism -- no need to point one's finger at the youth problems in the GDR.

NATO CRISIS VIEWED IN LIGHT OF BRUSSELS MEETING

DW101253 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 10 Dec 81 p 4

[Dieter Schroeder commentary]

[Text] One of the biggest crises in the Atlantic alliance has been postponed but not warded off shortly prior to the usual pre-Christmas meeting of NATO's defense and foreign ministers. President Reagan's support for a "zero solution" for the medium-range missiles and the opening of negotiations of the matter with the Soviets have defused the discussion on NATO's dual decision and its counterarming for the time being. The ministers of the 15 member states can adopt unreservedly the demand of the President. Outwardly the alliance's unity has been restored again. But this harmony must not gloss over the fact that the dispute about the counterarming has left behind deep traces.

The Europeans continue to deal with a powerful partner who impatiently insists on his leading role and responds to any hesitations of the Old World with the threat of making a decision of its own over their heads. A clever U.S. observer recently has drawn the conclusion that NATO might be facing its end. The alliance would be endangered by Washington rather than Moscow. Though this observation may have been premature, it was not wrong. The "struggle for the soul of Europe," as Reagan's Ambassador to Bonn Arthur F. Burns put it, continues. What the United States expects from Europe is an appropriate contribution to the defense of the Western values and its readiness for modernization of the nuclear arsenal in case the negotiations with Moscow were to fail. As a pledge for its commitment in Europe it considers its 350,000 soldeirs stationed here. "They will not stay if they are not welcomed," Burns warned. Lawrence Eagleburger, the head of the State Department's Europe section, was even more outspoken when he said that Europeans did not have an interpreter's role between the United States and the Soviet Union, Europe could not afford to stand between the suppowers.

This is a clear-cut critcism of Federal Chancellor Schmidt. Eagleburger has now made up for what Brezhnev's spokesman Zamyatin already during the Bonn visit of the Soviet party leader had refused to tolerate. What the superpowers desired from Bonn was not interpreter's services but a chiming in with their wishes. Granted Schmidt did not leave any doubts vis-a-vis the Kremlin boss that he is neither in a position nor does he want to comply with Moscow's wishes, but to the United States his attitude does not seem to be absolutely clear. The fact that he has burdened himself with the interpreter's role in their view is not a sign of inner strength and it irritates them even more that he also wants to keep in touch with the Russians about the continuation of the Geneva negotiations. It is above all between Bonn and Washington that latent tensions continue to remain. Schmidt himself has weakened his position through a contradiction in his utterances. On the one hand he has linked his political fate with the outcome of the Geneva negotiatons, whereas on the other he wants to approve of the counterarming if no result will be achieved in Geneva by the end of 1983. But what is meant to be a means of pressure on the superpowers might easily become a weapon in the hands of the opponents within his party.

The fact that the United States is less inclined to comply with the objections of the Europeans also becomes manifest in the manner of dealing with Turkey. For Washington Ankara at present is the strategically most important ally. The United States believes that a thrust by the Soviets across Iran to the Gulf area can be blocked from their Turkish bases before their Rapid Deployment Force would be able to reach the Gulf area. This is why Haig and Weinberger were wooing the generals in Ankara shortly prior to the NATO session, this is why they want to grant more time to them for a return to democracy than the Europeans do, and this is why they refuse, in contrast to their partners, to bringing pressure to bear on the junta through cuts in their financial and military aid.

New Greek Prime Minister Papandreou in Brussels has felt most clearly the United States' determination of not letting themselves be bothered. He soon had to realize that he overplays his hand if he raises much too high demands. Greece's strategic importance does not match that of Turkey. This is why he soon had to abandon his objection against Spain's admission to NATO. His position had been weak anyway, because the other NATO partners are harboring the illusion that Spain will be strengthened democratically through its army's integration into NATO. What also catches the eye of Washington is Spain's function as an "aircraft carrier." In this situation neither the fear that Athen's share in military aid will further decrease through the admission of Spain nor the promise to assist Spanish Socialist leader Felipe Gonzales, who is skeptical with regard to the NATO membership, was of any help for Papandreou. He merely was able to lay stress on his wishes vis-a-vis Turkey through Greece's withdrawal from NATO's supreme command.

Papandreou's bluff is a matter of routine for NATO. Its capability to survive depends on whether it will succeed in safeguarding its unity vis-a-vis the Soviets, who still hope to overthrow the dual decision without making any concessions in Geneva.

PAPER SEES PAPANDREOU TACTIC BACKFIRING

DW110949 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 11 Dec 81 p 3

[Dispatch signed HA.: "Papandreou's Boomerang"]

[Text] What Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou did at the Brussels meeting of defense ministers definitely was not a diplomatic masterpiece. He had intended to take home as the first success in foreign policy a security guarantee against a potential attack by Turkey.

Nevertheless, the alliance partners, including the Turks, were prepared to confirm once again in the final communique the "territorial inviolability" for every state already duly averred to in the UN Charter and in the CSCE Final Act of Helsinki, as superfluous as it may sound. But this was not enough for Papandreou. This is why he prevented the adoption of the communique -- a matter unheard of in more than 30 years of NATO history.

Papandreou thereby maneuvered himself into a position of having to make moves which in the end surely will not enhance Athen's freedom of action in international politics. Indirectly the Turks came out the winners -- military regime or not. What will probably happen is that the national feelings hurt by Papandreou's insinuation for the time being will strengthen the regime in Turkey. All told: It is a boomerang for the Athens head of government.

ASSEMBLY TO BE INFORMED OF ARMS EXPORT DEALS

[Text] Defense Minister Charles Hernu has decided to inform the National Assembly regularly of the conclusion of foreign arms contracts by France. In 1980 these military exports amounted to Fr23,440,000,000, or 40 percent of the arms industry's annual turnover. The government, which wants to break with the previous practice of secrecy over this trade, will give a report every 6 months summarizing exports of military equipment to the chairmen and keynote speakers of the National Assembly and Senate defense and foreign affairs committees. This report will relate to the position on orders and supplies for the previous half-year and will list operations by broad categories of equipment as well as the distribution of these sales among the OECD zone on the one hand and regions outside the OECD on the other.

Mr Hernu also explained that the same parliamentary representatives will be informed of the conclusion of deals with foreign countries, which implies opening program authorizations under article 29 of the 16 July decree. This document, which relates to the implemtation of a law passed 28 December 1957, enables the state to start in anticipation the manufacture of equipment intended for export and corresponding to series already ordered by the armed forces. Finally it has been decided to give the same representatives the text of intergovernmental agreements governing the production and sale of equipment designed in cooperation.

Many industrialists fear that the lifting, even retrospectively, of secrecy on commercial transactions with foreign countries may prompt potential clients to approach other buyers regarded as more discreet and reliable. Indeed some buyers sometimes ask the industrialist for complete secrecy on the order they are placing with him until the supply date, when the transaction quickly becomes public knowledge. A law dated 30 June 1952 made provision for the parliamentary commissions to be informed, but it quickly fell into abeyance.

NUCLEAR TESTS DISCLOSED BY SEISMOLOGISTS

LD100932 Paris Domestic Service in French 0900 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] France has just carried out two nuclear tests at the Mururoa testing site in the Pacific. At least, this is what has been disclosed by New Zealand seismologists. They report that the first explosion took place on 5 December and the second, on 8 December. The scientists believe that both explosions were medium-size and follow the explosion of a more powerful bomb on 11 November. The government had confirmed at that time that a test had taken place but denied that it was a neutron bomb.

Radioactive Waste Scattered

NC091922 Paris AFP in English 1813 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 9 Dec (AFP) -- Defence Minister Charles Hernu admitted here today that radioactive waste stocked in Mururoa Atoll, France's Pacific Ocean nuclear test base, was scattered last March by a storm that created "a new radiological situation" in the area. He said there was a "high degree of security" at the test base, but did not elaborate on what the "new radiological situation" is.

Mr Hernu made the statement in parliament to a question concerning press reports about pollution of the atoll. The reports were based on a pamphlet put out by the Atomic Energy Commission branch of the pro-Socialist French Democratic Labour Confederation (CFDT).

No trace of radioactivity, Mr Hernu said, had been found in the sea around the atoll, and this had been confirmed by a laboratory report published in Christchurch, New Zealand. He pledged that in future "necessary data" would be communicated to persons involved in Mururoa security, but added it was not possible to transmit "certain documents" to the unions.

POLL ON WAR DANGER AND PACIFISM ANALYZED

PM071131 Paris LE FIGARO in French 23 Nov 81 pp 1, 2

[Charles Rebois report: "FIGARO-SOFRES Opinion Poll on Pacifism: The Munich Spirit"]

[Excerpts] Some 55 percent of people polled think that there will be serious risks of world war over the next few years. Some 47 percent think that the USSR is at present the main threat to peace. The same proportion think that the East bloc countries are militarily stronger. And 75 percent think that if the USSR were to threaten France directly or seriously, an attempt should be made to negotiate a compromise.

The fear of war is considerably less among men than among women. It affects young people more but does not spare any social class. Only the communists seem to fear a conflict less. Since the potential adversary is the USSR they feel duty-bound not to believe that it has aggressive intentions.

Libya and Iran are placed immediately after the USSR in the front ranks of the countries threatening peace. Israel, which lives permanently under arms, ranks only fifth and Pakistan, whose resistance to the Soviet invader is continuing amid indifference, is no longer regarded as a hotbed of tension. One sign of historical evolution is that Germany is no longer taken into account in possibilities of conflict.

Is this demobilization of Germany contagious and inversely proportional to the increase in the danger? It would be possible to believe this when you observe that only 15 percent of people polled would want to resist by all available means, including nuclear weapons, if there were a direct and serious Soviet threat.

In phrasing the question it would perhaps have been better to talk of aggression rather than threat. But aside from that reservation, it is undeniable that the traditional feelings of patriotism fit in less with the prospect of a nuclear apocalypse than with the epic cavalry charges of conventional conflicts. The will to fight whatever the cost is dictated in most cases by social or political predetermination. In the place of honor among those wishing to resist are cadres, and, of the parties, the RPR. The communists, of course, would negotiate with the Soviet aggressor.

That leaves the U.S. shield, in which 64 percent of people polled continue to believe. The eventuality of a nuclear conflict limited to Europe and Ronald Reagan's hastily corrected statements on this subject have scarcely reduced confidence in the traditional ally. However, the old proverb says: "God helps those who help themselves." This is to be done primarily by strengthening the national nuclear force, as 42 percent of those questioned want, or by maintaining it in its present state (35 percent). There is virtual unanimity on this point.

The results of our opinion poll will strengthen the Atlantic alliance's supporters. Their number is increasing while the number of advocates of neutrality is falling. This twofold need -- the Atlantic alliance and the national deterrent force -- is particularly necessary since public opinion thinks that a general arms reduction agreement between the Western and Eastern countries is an unrealistic objective.

In these conditions what explanation can there be for the opposition of 45 percent of those polled to the deployment of the U.S. Pershing missiles in West Europe? This attitude seems scarcely reconcilable with the opinion of the majority, who still believe in U.S. aid in case of conflict. This effect is produced by women, who are acting out of fear and, overwhelmingly, by the communists, who are unreservedly devoted to Moscow's cause. In addition the workers, over whom the PCF exerts its influence, are strengthening the camp of those who oppose the Pershing missiles.

Inconsistencies

The West European governments, which have just said they agree with the U.S. proposal (no Pershings if the Russians withdraw their SS-20 missiles), have been unable to justify their stances to their publics, hence the fact that official statements are out of joint with popular reactions. This is also the reason for the vacillation in answers on the significance of the pacifist demonstrations. Some 36 percent of people think they increase the chances of peace and disarmament in Europe and, on the other hand, 35 percent think they play into the USSR's hands.

This opinion poll highlights a number of inconsistencies. To understand them it is necessary to accept that the people polled -- and probably their neighbors too -- are primarily obeying a law of human survival in the face of the threat of nuclear war. The closer this threat comes geographically and the greater the likelihood of it threatening them directly, possibly sparing those controlling the game, the more they seek to preserve themselves egotistically. What do they see?

In all, the strategic scenario's emphasis has primarily been placed on nuclear deterrence at world level. Nobody in the East or the West could escape the apocalypse. This monstrous prospect paradoxically has a reassuring nature. The fear it instills in the two superpowers has a name: the balance of terror. And now a new factor is being introduced by emphasizing the possibility of a nuclear war limited to Europe! We are falling back into the old process of traditional wars with the additional nuclear horror.

The USSR has made a Machiavellian calculation. By creating an imbalance in Europe with its SS-20s it is placing Europe within its range militarily while reducing the West Europeans' will to resist. Without the counterbalance provided by the Pershing missiles West Germany would be doomed at best to Finlandization and at worst to destruction. How could its neighbors escape the same fate? Despite its independent defense system France's situation would very quickly become untenable. The West European governments are aware of the danger. They still have to make their publics share their convictions.

MITTERRAND, SOVIET ENVOY DISCUSS SECURITY

NC102254 Paris AFP in English 2246 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 10 Dec (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand had a talk today with Soviet Ambassador Stepan Chervonenko on questions concerning security in Europe. After the conversation, the ambassador said they had discussed "the search for a way to attenuate the confrontations and military tensions between the blocs, the search for a lowering of the levels of armaments and a reduction of concentrations of nuclear arms on this continent." The diplomat added he had delivered a message from Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev with an explanation of his views on the international situation.

SOARES CRITICAL OF DEMOCRATIC ALLIANCE

[Charles Vanhecke interview with Socialist Party (PS) Secretary General Mario Soares in Paris -- date not given]

[Text] "Portugal is in a difficult economic and financial situation," Mario Soares said. "After making demagogic promises the Democratic Alliance government has to face the facts: 25 percent inflation, an 8 percent unemployment rate, a $2.2 billion balance of payments deficit, in other words $1 billion more than when I was in power, monthly devaluations of our currency, the escudo, and paralysis in investiments.

"After freezing prices, to the detriment of the balance of payments, the government is being forced to allow them to break loose. After announcing a 5 percent growth rate, it will probably be 1 percent at the end of the year. The result is that it will be necessary to negotiate new loans with the IMF, which will lead to a policy of great austerity next year and will hence make the social situation even more explosive. "I was also forced to adopt austerity measures but they bore fruit: We recovered our gold reserves and established conditions for growth, as the president himself admitted when Sa Carneiro came to power.

"The right has failed to find an answer to the country's problems. It lacks stringency in its administrative management and, in addition, in allowing business to intrude into politics: Former groups have regained their privileges, economic power is again influencing political power. This is producing a climate of great popular discontent."

The PS leader then turned to two other problems: the revision of the constitution and presidential powers. Portugal at present has a semipresidential regime: The head of state can dissolve parliament, he appoints and dismisses the prime minister on the basis of the election results, but he does not chair the cabinet and has no influence over government policy.

"The constitution's transitional period is over," Mr Soares explained. "The Council of the Revolution, which was intended to be a temporary body, should, in our view, disappear. The council, which resulted from 25 April, does, of course, have revolutionary legitimacy but it does not have democratic legitimacy. Now we think that in a democratic regime military power should be subordinate to civilian power. This is obviously not the view of the Communist Party, which is anxious to maintain the council because it thinks it can manipulate it.

"As for the head of state's powers, we adopted a clear stance during the last presidential campaign: We asked General Eanes, who was standing for reelection -- and an agreement was reached on this -- for his candidacy to have a civilian and not a military nature and for the political parties to be defended. We also agreed that the presidential powers should not be reduced or increased. Nonetheless Portugal is now the only democratic country whose president is an active military. We think that the next president in 1985 should be a civilian."

Is Mario Soares not thinking of his own candidacy?

[Answer] I neither rule out nor confirm such a possibility. But there are closer elections: the municipal elections at the end of next year and the parliamentary elections in 1984 which, moreover, might be held early if the Democratic Alliance lost the confidence of parliment or the head of state. The result of those election will determine the PS' ability to put forward a candidate who would [illegible]

[Question] Meanwhile will President Eanes not be tempted, as rumor has it in Lisbon, to form his own party?

[Answer] I am convinced that he will not. It would be unthinkable for President Eanes, who stood as an independent candidate in the last election, to exploit his position to create a "presidential" party when [French President] Mitterand, for instance, has adopted entirley the reverse approach. Mitterrand, who was the French Socialist Party first secretary, resigned from his post to stand for the presidency, and from the day of his election he has been the president of the entire French people. [Answer ends]

We informed Mr Soares of some criticisms leveled at his party, namely that it does not form a real opposition to the ruling right, so as to find the alliances and electorate which will later be necessary to win the presidential election.

[Answer] That is a campaign by the Communist Party, which accuses us of collusion with the Democratic Alliance to revise the constitution. Indeed the PS is in opposition on all fronts: social, parliamentary and cultural. We rule out any alliance before the elections. In addition to our electorate we will address the Democratic Alliance and Communist Party voters to show that we are the only possible alternative. The Social Democratic Party, which is in government with the Social Democratic Center [CDS], the most rightwing party in the present coalition, is in fact completely dominated by the CDS, and that is turning away some of its voters who do not accept the monetarist and antisocial policy followed by the Democratic Alliance.

[Question] Does Mr Soares rule out any agreement with the Communist Party?

[Answer] Socialists and Communists can reach agreement in the field for defending the workers' interests, and that often happens. But our differences of opinion are fundamental. The Portugese Communist Party has remained a Stalinist party whose leaders have been chosen by cooption for the past 40 years. It pays complete allegiance to the Soviet Union and does not want a fully democratic regime for Portugal; on the contrary, it intends to maintain a military power center, as I explained, thinking it can us it to its own ends. We Socialists on the other hand advocate a pluralist civilian democracy and oppose any vanguard mentality. [Answer ends]

Although the Democratic Alliance is suffering from internal dissent, Mr Soares does not deny that his party is experiencing the same type of problem, but he specified:

"A majority emerged with a mandate of 72 percent at our fourth congress. Since then there have been three minority factions, and we want to prevent them feeling obstracized. One of the disagreeements relates to the appointment of senior army officers. At present this depends on the head of state alone. The majority of the party thinks that the president should make these appointments on the basis of nominations by the government. For us this is a question of principle, whereas the minorities are arguing on the basis of individuals."

Finally the Socialist leader explained the way in which he thinks the EC should accept Portugal's membership: "Europe should help Portugal stabilize its economy so as to help stabilize its democratic institutions. It should be expanded, but with as few disparities as possible. It is necessary for the North-South dialogue to take place through our continent."

CALVO-SOTELO CALLS MANIFESTO 'INADMISSIBLE'

LD101802 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1700 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Excerpt] In our last report from the Congress of Deputies, Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo was just coming to the manifesto of the 100 -- the 6 December document which was signed by 100 military men. Calvo-Sotelo said that the government respects military jurisdiction in the strictly military realm, in accordance with the law. But the government does not forget that the constitution confers upon it the power to direct the military administration of the state, nor should this be forgotten by those who mistakenly appear to suppose that the armed forces constitute an autonomous power independent of the civil power. The government, he added, does not accept, nor can it accept, any other control or any other supervision than that of the Cortes.

As prime minister, he concluded, I consider the document and its circumstances inadmissible. I repeat my firm decision to ensure that the armed forces continue to respect the constitution and remain obedient to the government of the nation. I pledge before the chamber to unswervingly defend the supremacy of the civil power.

POLITICAL PARTIES UNITE; WITHDRAW CRITICISM

[Text] Madrid, 11 Dec (AFP) -- Spain's political parties have united in calling for a stronger government stand towards instigators of a "conspiracy against democracy," sources here said today. At the Cortes (parliament) yesterday, opposition parties almost put forward a censure motion against Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo's government, refraining only because of the gravity of the situation according to some political leaders.

For the first time, Mr Calvo-Sotelo was also subject to criticism from rightist parties. In response, Mr Calvo-Sotelo said that he would control the armed forces and defend civilian rule. But parties of both left and right cast doubts on his ability to deal with what one socialist leader called "the most serious situation since 1975." Nevertheless, the parties promised to support the government if it would respond seriously and actively to the neo-fascist threat to Spain's democracy.

SOCIALIST PETITION FOR REFERENDUM ON NATO

[Text] Madrid, 10 Dec (AFP) -- A delegation from the Socialist Workers' Party today handed the government a petition with 600,000 signatures demanding a referendum on Spain's entry in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, officials said. In October, Spain's Communist Party gave the government a petition with half a million signatures backing a referendum. The Socialist Workers' move came as the 15 NATO members were formally to invite Spain today to join the alliance. In a ceremony in Brussels attended by Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca. A spokesman for the Spanish Socialist party, Guillermo Galeote, said that for his party the matter was not closed and he still hoped that the country would stay out of NATO.

CARRILLO TALKS WITH FIDEL CASTRO REPORTED

PM101625 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 27 Nov-3 Dec 81 p 12

[Text] Responding to an invitation from the Communist Party of Cuba's [PCC] First Secretary Fidel Castro, PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo visited that country 22-23 November 1981.

Within the framework of his stay in Cuba, he held talks with the PCC first secretary, in which Politburo candidate member and Secretariat member Jesus Montane Oropesa also took part and in which aspects of the current international situation of interest to the two parties were broached.

During the fraternal meeting, Santiago Carrillo reiterated to Fidel Castro the Spanish Communists' and people's profound feelings of friendship and unshakable solidarity toward the Cuban revolution in the presence of U.S. imperialism's threats of aggression, which the Reagan administration has made public. He also declared himself in favor of ending the unjust and criminal blockade imposed on Cuba and restoring the territory illegally occupied by the U.S. military base in Guantanamo.

The two leaders considered that the plans for aggression directed against Cuba, Nicaragua and Grenada, as well as the intention of crushing the legitimate struggle of the Salvadoran people led by their fighting vanguard -- the Democratic Revolutionary Front-Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front -- constitute an aggressive escalation which could culminate in another brutal military intervention not only affecting Central America and the Caribbean but creating a dangerous world situation -- which gives rise to deep concern on the part of all progressive and peace-loving forces.

Fidel Castro offered detailed information concerning these matters and expressed the Cuban people's satisfaction at the Spanish Communists' firm and supportive response, expressed on this occasion just as at other moments of grave danger, and stressed that they will continue to work and prepare themselves to defend at whatever price is necessary this trench of socialism in America.

Santiago Carrillo expressed the deep concern of all forces taking part in the European movement in support of peace at the grave consequences which these aggressive plans of U.S. imperialism toward Central America and the Caribbean entail for peace in Europe and in the world. Santiago Carrillo's visit to Cuba took place within the framework of the PCE's and the Spanish people's solidarity with Cuba, Nicaragua, El Salvador and Central America and the Caribbean in general and as a demonstration of that solidarity, for which Fidel Castro expressed personally to Santiago Carrillo and to the Spanish people the Cuban people's deepest gratitude.

COMMANDER DECLARES SUBMARINE REPORT 'SECRET'

LD102314 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 2100 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] The supreme commander has classified as secret the armed forces staff report on the submarine affair. The report was handed over today by the supreme commander to the government. It was announced earlier that some of the report would be made public, but the supreme commander has decided that the whole report on the submarine should be classified as secret.

NEW WEAPONS DEVELOPED TO TRACK SUBMARINES

PM101635 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 29 Nov 81 p 6

[Erik Liden report]

[Excerpt] The navy has designed and tested the world's smallest depth charge, for use against foreign submarines in peacetime. The charge is called the Elma and it is dropped in "clusters" on submarines refusing to leave Swedish waters. Because of its directional explosive effect small holes are made in the submarine shell, and in the long term those would be enough to fill it with water. The idea is to force the submarine to the surface without harming the crew. Because the Elma is cheap to produce and is easy to carry on helicopters and ships, 20 can be dropped at a time. This also improves accuracy. The holes which are made in the submarine's hull are the size of a 5-ore coin. The navy has also ordered serial production of the Malin "sound bomb" which will be dropped from helicopters and ships. It attaches itself to the hull of a submarine magnetically, and an acoustic transmitter is activated which makes the submarine easy to track. In principle a foreign submarine with a Malin stuck to it cannot elude navy helicopters and ships. A so-called incident torpedo has also been produced. The explosives in a normal submarine hunter torpedo are replaced by an explosive head designed only to damage the submarine. The submarine screw (which is where torpedoes normally hit) is destroyed or its maneuvering ability is impaired. These new weapons for use in peacetime in the protection of territorial waters against foreign submarines will be mounted on the new missile boats. "We will now be able to act forcefully in submarine incidents without being restricted by consideration for human life," Navy Staff Information Officer Capt Sven Carlsson told us. The weapons have been developed in the wake of last year's much publicized submarine hunt in the area around Huvudskaer in the southern section of the Stockholm archipelago, when at least one foreign submarine eluded the Navy for more than 2 weeks. Commander in Chief Lennart Luung has also begun work on revising the regulations for the use of arms against foreign submarines which refuse to leave Swedish waters. The revisions will cover both the use of the new incident weapons which have been produced and instructions for the swifter use of armed depth charges in serious situations -- including use in the immediate vicinity of suspected submarines.

This tightening up was requested by the navy personnel involved, including the crew of the Halland. Navy chief Per Rudberg is himself continuing to look into the navy's present and future capacity for surveillance and combat action in Swedish waters. Torpedoes which can be fired from light or heavy helicopters are already in existence and have been tested -- one test was taking place outside Karlskrona when submarine 137 ran aground in October. A new trailed hydrophone for use by the navy's lighter vessels considerably increases hydrophone capacity beyond the helicopters' listening time, which is limited by refueling and crew change requirements. Hydrophone buoys will also be added to this chain of surveillance. They can be dropped over a large area and their signals can then be received and analyzed by helicopters or aircraft. The hydrophone receiver can be placed at any depth and can be dropped from high altitude -- which makes them difficult to discover.

KIPRIANOU 10 DEC REMARKS AFTER FOREIGN TOUR

[Text] President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou has been in Athens since 1430 today. Kiprianou arrived in Athens from the U.S. the last stop of his tour after Bulgaria, Hungary and France. At Ellinikon airport, President Kiprianou made the following statement to Greek press representatives:

[Begin recording] As is well known, I have undertaken two official visits; one to Bulgaria and one to Hungary. I also met French President Mitterrand in Paris. I then proceeded to the U.S. where in New York I conferred with the UN secretary general and the chairman of the UN General Assembly, as well as with the chairman of the Nonaligned Contact Committee. In conclusion, in Washington, I met with U.S. President Reagan. This meeting was attended by the vice president, the secretary of state and other personalities of the U.S. administration.

In [illegible]e to my first visits to Bulgaria and Hungary, I must state that I met very gr[illegible]standing on the problem of Cyprus. As mentioned in the communique, there is full [illegible]ort for our positions on the Cyprus problem. The welcome we were given both in Bulgaria on the part of Chairman Zhivkov and in Hungary on the part of Chairman Losonczi and the other officials with whom we met, as well as on the part of the Bulgarian and Hungarian people, was truly particularly warm. The expressions in support of Cyprus were touching.

Both in Sofia and in Budapest, where I also had talks with Mr Kadar, the secretary general of the Hungarian Communist Party, we basically discussed the Cypriot issue as well as international issues. We also discussed our bipartite relations, and decided on the further expansion of cooperation between Cyprus and Bulgaria and Cyprus and Hungary. I truly believe that these visits contributed to the further expansion of relations and cooperation between Cyprus and these two countries.

In Paris, the meeting with French President Mitterrand also dealt, basically, with the Cyprus problem. There was a positive response to the analysis I made for the French president. We also discussed bipartite problems, that is, matters related to the expansion of bipartite cooperation. We also discussed certain problems which Cyprus is facing in relation to its attachment to the EEC. On this issue there was also a positive response from the French president, who said he would try to see how the problem facing Cyprus can be solved. This problem basically has to do with Cypriot exports to EEC countries during the transitory stage and up to the customs union.

In the United States, we reviewed the latest developments of the Cyprus issue with the UN secretary general and I had the opportunity to reiterate our views on the question of his evaluation. I emphasized that there are both positive and negative elements. We have expressed our views on both. What is of importance, however, even if all the points were positive, is a change in the Turkish position and its abandonment of its partitionist policy. Only in this way could there be progress in the direction of a solution to the Cyprus problem.

I also had the opportunity to explain to the secretary general that we will do whatever is possible on our part, naturally without abandoning our positions, in order to have some progress; but that progress does not depend upon us. Progress basically depends upon the change in the position of Turkey. It is essential to have a radical change in the Turkish position if there is to be any progress. There must be a radical change in the partitionist policy that Turkey has followed to date. We say Turkey because, although a dialogue is being conducted with the Turkish Cypriots, it is in fact Turkey which decides on behalf of the Turkish Cypriot community, which is fundamentally under occupation.

I explained to the UN secretary general that we are willing to allow a certain logical period of time so that we may see whether there could be progress in a new effort, but that we are not prepared to maintain a sterile dialogue which will be conducted for ever without any results. In such an eventuality, if there is no progress, our decision is that the Cypriot issue should be discussed by the UN General Assembly once again. When I say the General Assembly, I refer to this year's General Assembly which, as we hope, will be continued even after the end of its regular session on 15 December. In other words, that it will be reconvened for certain matters, including the Cyprus issue, when we consider the time has come to discuss this issue.

This is the very question which I discussed with the chairman of the UN General Assembly and with the chairman of the Nonaligned Contact Committee. Both of them gave me much encouragement in thes direction and it can be considered nearly certain that a discussion of the Cyprus issue at the UN General Assembly is guaranteed if there is no progress in the dialoge within a tme limit to be determined by us.

In Washington, the basic meeting was with the U.S. President and, as I have stated earlier, this meeting was also attended by Vice President Bush, Secretary of State Haig, and various other personalities. President Reagan asked me to brief him on the Cyprus issue, which I did. Analytically, I explained our positions and our views and I emphasized the fact that the U.S. is in a position, if it so wishes, to play a decisive role in reference to changing the Turkish position in view of the fact that Turkey today totally relies upon the U.S. in every respect.

I explained that there can be no solution to the Cyprus problem without guaranteeing the unity of the state. I explained how the federation became acceptable, but that federation must be of such a form that it will guarantee the unity of the state and the inalienable rights of the citizens, including the basic liberties, human rights and basic freedoms, also including free movement, free settlement and the right to own property. I explained that there can be no solution to the Cyprus problem without the withdrawal of the occupation troops. In reality, I accentuated the necessity for demilitarization.

Our aspiration, a fact which fully conforms to a realistic examination of the facts, is -- and this is to the benefit of all -- to turn Cyprus into a place of peace, calm, freedom on a permanent basis for all its inhabitants, without foreign intervention of any form. I also referred to the necessity of broader international guarantees in the case of a solution to the Cyprus problem. I explained generally our positions, how we see the correct solution to the Cyprus problem, a viable solution which, in the last analysis, would be to the benefit not only of the Cypriot people as a whole, not only for Cyprus, but also in the interest of the cause of international peace and security in the delicate area of Cyprus and most certainly in the interest of the U.S.

We then exhaustively discussed, during a working luncheon with Secretary of State Haig, the Cyprus problem. This was the only issue we discussed and I must admit that I was given the opportunity -- a fact which I wanted -- to explain and clearly present our positions on the Cyprus problem. I made it clear that any form of patritionist solution cannot be acceptable under any conditions, and that Cyprus must be fully independent, sovereign, united, territorially integral and nonaligned. I emphasized the necessity of implementing the UN resolutions, which incorporate all the necessary elements for such a solution, together with the summit agreement which also includes the necessary elements for a solution, particularly of the domestic aspect of the Cypriot problem and in part of the foreign aspect.

I cannot say that I was given any promises. I do believe, however, that, as also expressed by the U.S. side, that there was usefulness for both sides in this contact. Whether there will be any concrete results or not, we shall see in due time. I cannot state in advance what future U.S. policy will be or what the U.S. will do.

Apart from the meetings with the President and generally with the U.S. administration, I had meetings with the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. In both cases, there was much discussion on the Cyprus issue and I established that these two bodies have a considerable number of members who clearly support our positions on the Cyprus problem. I naturally had the opportunity to contact the various mass information media and I believe this was also useful.

With President Reagan we also discussed the question of Turkey's negative positions on the question of the missing persons. I explained to him the necessity for the smooth functioning of the committee which was set up in order to establish the fate of all the missing persons. We also discussed this with the UN secretary general, who in fact undertook to promote the issue after the relevant resolution of the Third Political Committee of the UN General Assembly.

Generally, this was a series of important contacts, I would say, and I am generally satisfied with this tour and the contacts and talks I have had. [end recording]

NORTH'S KONUK EXPLAINS RESIGNATION MOTIVES

TA101619 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Text] Democratic People's Party [DPP] leader Nejat Konuk has resigned from his post as deputy and party leader, submitting his letter of resignation to the legislative assembly presidency and to the secretariat general of the DPP. The letter will be submitted to the legislative assembly session to be held tomorrow.

In this letter, Konuk says: Since the 1981 general elections, there has been a government problem in our country. This problem reached very serious proportions after the adoption in the assembly of the motion of nonconfidence against the Cagatay minority government. Over the past few days, I made a very serious evaluation in my own mind. I reached the firm conclusion that a grave task facilitating the solution of the government problem from the viewpoint of the country's interests falls on me. I am fulfilling the unrenouncable necessity of this task, which requires self-sacrifice. I am retiring from political life and thus from the post of deputy.

Konuk also resigned from his post as legislative assembly speaker during the assembly debate on whether or not to include in the agenda the motion of nonconfidence against the Cagatay government jointly submitted by the Communal Liberation Party, the Republican Turkish Party and the DPP. Following the resignation of Konuk as deputy, the number of DPP deputies at the legislative assembly dropped from two to one.

Papandreou Press Conference

NC102112 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1943 GMT 10 Dec 81

[Press conference held by Prime Minister Papandreou given at his home in Astri 10 December -- recorded]

[Text] [Papandreou] Good evening. Tonight, I believe I am fulfilling a promise I made to the Greek people before the election. This is the promise I would brief the people on the country's major issues. In order to avoid the misinterpretation that I am abusing this right, should the leader of the official opposition party also wish to brief the people, then there will be no problem. Tonight, I feel sincerely a particular emotion and pride that I am Greek, because I represented this unbending and courageous people. I am touched deeply by the national enthusiasm and unity of spirit this people -- this people who have suffered so much -- showed to us who represented them at the NATO conference in Brussels. The battle put up by the Greek delegation was not only a battle of our government or me personally. It had to do with the entire Greek people, irrespective of their political beliefs, whether they belong to us or to the KKE. No matter where they may belong, they are Greek, and what I and our delegation felt is that this entire people took an unbending position so that we could express their expectations and defend their national interest. I truly believe this feeling of unity of spirit, of national enthusiasm, should be shared as well by all political leaders of the country.

Look, in Brussels for the first time the so-called dispute between Greece and Turkey became an acute internal problem of NATO. For the first time in its history the Defense Planning Committee was in no position to issue a communique -- this is in 30 years of its existence. This presented in relief the weakness of the alliance, its weakness and inability to agree on a very simple matter: to agree that the frontiers of each member state are inviolable, no matter where the threat may come from. In the battle we put up we found many supporters. I believe the sincere and crystal-clear position of the Greek Government on the critical issue of our national security decisively strengthened our position internationally.

It is for this reason that I return to the fatherland truly optimistic, certainly more optimistic than when I left for Brussels. At the meeting of the defense ministers, as well as during the sideline discussions I had with Weinberger, Haig, Rogers and Luns, the problem of the U.S. bases in Greece was not touched upon. It is for this reason that I will have nothing more to say on this matter than that during the winter of 1982 negotiations will start between Greece and the United States.

In Brussels my first task -- and this may appear strange to you -- was to establish that there is truly a Turkish threat to the Aegean. No matter how strange this may appear to you, this was a difficult task. I referred naturally to statements by the political leaders of Turkey -- from Ecevit to Demirel to Koruturk, an endless series of political leaders -- who have made statements, extremely threatening, which touch on our national sovereign rights -- our island territories, airspace and Thrace. Naturally I do not refer to the Cyprus issue, on which I will have certain things to say a little later. I also referred to the truly numerous violations of the Greek continental shelf by the Turkish side, of the violations of our national airspace of 10 miles which has been established since 1931. I also referred both to the existence of the army of the Aegean -- the so-called 4th Army -- as well as to the existence of approximately 150 landing craft on the opposite shore of the Aegean, which obviously have no relationship to the Black Sea.

Naturally, the Turkish national defense minister denied that Turkey has violated Greek national airspace which, according to his views, is only 6 miles and not 10. In reference to the army of the Aegean, he stressed that it was established for training purposes only. He maintained by contrast that while Turkey fosters the most friendly of sentiments toward Greece, we have armed the islands of the eastern Aegean and have aggressive views toward Turkey. Naturally it was very difficult for him to convince anyone because there are indisputable facts. I must also tell you that there are many more which I have not yet had the opportunity to present, either to the Chamber of Deputies or to the Greek people.

My second task dealt with the Rogers agreement -- the agreement on Greece's reintegration with NATO. I recalled the fact that establishment of the NATO headquarters at Larissa -- the 7th Attache, as it is called -- which is situated opposite the 6th Attache at Smyrna, raises the question of operational control over the Aegean airspace; that is, whether the Greek Air Force will or will not have operational control as far as the eastern frontiers of our country with Turkey. According to the policy statement of our government, in other words in absolute adherence to this statement, I underlined in Brussels:

1. That Greece will never permit the air defense of our national territory to pass into someone else's hands, no matter what other hands. It is, and it will absolutely and exclusively remain, a Greek responsibility and a Greek duty. This is a truly critical matter related to our national defense and to the future of our island territories, because if we accept the Turkish view, then our islands will be situated on the Turkish continental shelf and the protection of their airspace will come under Turkey and not Greece. It is not necessary for me to mention what the consequences of such an arrangement would be.

2. That the Rogers agreement has in actual fact at least been partially suspended and the process of detachment has been set in motion.

3. That our country's armed forces are in no position -- because we are a small country, with a relatively small population and our territories are limited -- to deal simultaneously with a threat from the north and from the east. Since the important issue of our eastern frontiers remains unresolved, since there are basic suspicions -- information -- that these frontiers could one day be violated, we are obliged to deploy the country's armed forces in such a way that there will be a guaranteed effective defense, which is also the only way to prevent a confrontation in the Aegean. In reference to the north, even today's leader of the official opposition party [Averof] has stressed that the danger from the north, as it is called, has abated. This most certainly does apply, and the only exception would lie in a world war. But at this moment we cannot even think of such a catastrophic development.

I then requested a NATO resolution -- a resolution of the NATO defense ministers -- that the protection offered by the alliance to the territorial integrity of the member states should incorporate all threats, no matter where they may come from. I would like to give you a picture of the prevailing climate. Many delegations asked, "But this is self-evident; why should we have to say so?" Naturally Turkey immediately opposed this. The reply I gave was this: If this is truly a repetition of positions incorporated in the Atlantic alliance, then why should we not reiterate it? Who could this harm? The Turkish delegation was faced with a dilema, a very grave dilema: Why should it refuse such a position at a time when it has peaceful intentions toward our country? Why should it refuse, particularly since it considers that Greece threatens the territorial integrity of Turkey? It should rather have insisted on this point in order to prevent this naturally imaginary danger.

The Turkish national defense minister argued that he would have accepted this position if it were not combined with the fact that it was a Greek who proposed this arrangement. In such an eventuality it would appear that the problem, the threat, comes from Turkey. This is something they do not want to accept.

I want to tell you that this contested proposal of ours passed through some 20 or 25 attempts to reach an acceptable wording and that many delegations undertook to draft proposals which could be acceptable by all -- by both the Greeks and the Turks. I must also tell you that there was wide support for Greece's position. For us, our resolve not to accept the joint communique, to exert a veto for the first time, was I believe true to our national interests. I truly believe this position of ours decisively strengthened the Greek presence, the prestige of Greece abroad. I am certain it will become the starting point for favorable developments in our national affairs.

In what concerns the major national question of Cyprus, I put it on an entirely new basis. The substance of the Cyprus problem has not been -- and it is not -- a dispute between two communities -- the Greek Cypriot and the Turkish Cypriot communities. That is a fairy tale. The dialogue between the two communities is not a dialogue between the two communities; it is a Nicosia-Ankara dialogue -- Ankara has a huge military presence in occupied Cyprus. Thus, for us, the Greek Government, the prerequisite for an acceptable Cyprus solution is the withdrawal of all foreign military forces from the island without exception. Then and only then, under UN auspices, will it be possible for the Cypriot people to solve their constitutional problems, to find a real solution to the refugee question, which as you know is of great dimensions. Only thus will it be possible to solve the Cyprus problem. Another effort is condemned to failure.

As you know, I had long talks with both the U.S. secretary of defense and with the secretary of state. These talks were the talks of two delegations. I would say that four or five people from each side participated in the talks. Therefore, whatever has been said is, ipso facto, a given fact. And I must tell you, and I admit it with some suprise, I consider both sessions of talks encouraging. When I say encouraging, I do not want to give the impression that the problems have been solved. No -- but what I have established is that there is room for restrained -- I stress restrained -- optimism.

Now I will proceed with some related problems. Three different NATO groups conferred in Brussels. The first, last Monday, the so-called Eurogroup, that is, the European members of the alliance. Canada and the United States were thus exempted. As you know, there our government did not veto the issuing of the communique. But, of course, it did not raise the basic question at that level which I raised at the defense ministers session.

Tomorrow, following our own conference -- the defense ministers conference -- the conference of foreign ministers will end. Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos is representing Greece at that conference. A communique will be issued there as well.

What I want to tell the Greek people sincerely is that these communiques -- both by the Eurogroup and by the foreign ministers -- include a climate -- I would not necessarily say positions -- they include a climate which does not keep pace with the positions and the orientations of PASOK and of our government. But it is clear that when one wages a battle, one should consider one's forces carefully and must wage the battle where it is crucial. And for the nation, the crucial cause is security, our security, the guaranteeing, if you like, of our territorial integrity, of our national independence. And thus we primarily, not exclusively, waged the battle on the major issue of our national security. I must say this: A battle was waged over all the other paragraphs and there was a continuous and strong Greek presence. But as you understand, it was not possible to press on with the veto -- the single case in which the veto was employed already constitutes an historical event of the first magnitude.

But I would like to tell you about things, how they stand. They directly concern our national security. First is the U.S. proposal on granting facilities to the Rapid Deployment Force -- this is what it is called in English -- which is intended for use in Southeast Asia and the Middle East. On this, I must say, there have been objections from many delegations; I have no right to say from which. However, we insisted on two things: One, that our national decision, our national judgment, shall be decisive on every question, and two, that we will never provide facilities for operations directed against friendly countries with which we have good diplomatic, economic trade, cultural and political relations, and particularly if they affect the interests of the countries which comprise the Arab nation. This most specifically.

There is another major question which was drowned by the agitation over the Greek question. It is the question of the installation of the Euromissiles -- the Pershing II and the cruise missiles. The position on which we insisted is the zero option, or zero solution. As you know, this solution was recently adopted by President Reagan as well, in a turn he made on the question of the missiles. But I would like to remind you that the position of PASOK and my personal position was strongly and most clearly explained in March in Paris when I participated in a conference of socialist parties in connection with European security. Thus, this was our own position and we are glad that others are gradually adopting it.

There is one more question: I do not know what press reports have come from Brussels, where the foreign ministers are meeting. But as you know there is the question of Spain. We submitted a document to the session on this question. I shall read two or three paragraphs from it so I can convey the atmosphere to you.

First of all we stated that we are obliged to underline that today's Greek Government, as it has so often proclaimed, insists on its principle of opposing the division of the world into competing political-military coalitions. Within this framework it is natural that our government should not favor the expansion and strengthening of these coalitions through the admission of new members. Second, Greece is faced with particular problems within the framework of the alliance, which the prime minister presented during the recent NATO defense ministers conference. Third, the entry of Spain, a Mediterranean country, could create additional problems beyond the ones that have already been created for Greece, through no fault of its own, in the already existing conditions of command and control in the Mediterranean. In a few words, there are certain commands over sea areas. From the moment Spain joins these commands, the boundaries of these commands will change. But most certainly we in the eastern Mediterranean will not accept any change to the existing status of naval commands. We want to make this absolutely clear.

Despite this, Greece will not refuse to sign the protocol. However, it will express its opposition in advance to any change that will result from the arrangements to be made as a result of Spain's entry into the already existing naval command arrangements in its area. I will proceed, and give further stress to this paragraph. I want you to appreciate it fully. With this tacit reservation, and with Greek national interests as the governing rule, and also on the basis of the latest developments in the Mediterranean area, the Greek Government will consider when to submit the protocol on Spain's entry for ratification by the Chamber of Deputies which, like other parliaments, is the sovereign body for the ratification of any agreement.

Concluding, I would like to state that I feel truly grateful for the support and unity of spirit and national enthusiasm with which the people supported this very difficult but also very important government initiative. I want to assure the Greek people that this is a first step along the march toward the establishment of a Greece that will belong to the Greeks. Thank you.

[Announcer] We will now start with some questions. We begin with Kambisis of AKROPOLIS.

[Question] Mr Prime Minister, you stated that at this moment there is a partial suspension of the Rogers agreement. Given the fact that we have returned once again to the military wing of NATO under the Rogers agreement, what at this very moment is the true status of our relations with the alliance?

[Answer] I am glad you asked this question: I am sincerely glad. This is something I also wanted to state, and I will speak sincerely as I always try to do. It is a fact that in the position I presented to you I used the phrase "partial suspension" in relation to my mention of the Larissa headquarters, the question of airspace and the deployment of forces, whether undertaken under national or NATO criteria -- all this makes it clear that there is a vagueness. I want to stress that this vagueness has to do with the tactics, the handling the government must undertake. In other words, there are certain things that are better to leave vague at this moment. Many, in fact, and not only the Greeks, would like to know the answer to Mr Kambisis' question.

[Announcer] [words indistinct] RIZOSPASTIS.

[Question] Mr Prime Minister, from what you have told us it appears that the question of Spain's entry into NATO is only a matter of time for the Greek Government, if I correctly understood. In an eventuality, I will pass over this and I ask: In case Spain enters NATO, what will the consequences be for European security, peace and detente, since we will have an expansion of NATO with the addition of a 16th member?

[Answer] Your observation is absolutely correct. This is something I have also stressed in private. I have not made a public statement on it, but the expansion of NATO cannot -- one cannot be certain whether this wouldn't also mean an expansion of the Warsaw Pact. This is what I believe you are basically stressing. In reference to the position of the government, I hoped you would provide the interpretation, the correct interpretation, that we have no obligation over and above the signing of the protocol -- we have no obligation. We will judge when and whether -- we will judge this; the Greek Government will do this.

[Question] I would like to ask you, Mr Prime Minister, if what you state [words indistinct] in other words the guarantees for protection of our eastern frontiers was requested, was discussed, or will it be discussed unilaterally with the Americans?

[Answer] It was discussed....

[Question continues] At the same time will this play any part in our negotiations on the bases in January or in the dialogue on armaments in reference to the balance of power in the Aegean?

[Answer] That is a correct question. Naturally I saw the U.S. defense secretary the first day I arrived, that is, Monday afternoon. Naturally at that time we hadn't yet started our deliberations at the defense ministers conference. I saw Haig afterwards, however, after the end of the regular meeting of the defense ministers conference and Haig already knew we had exercised a veto. It is, naturally, clear that when we speak of Greek-U.S. discussions or negotiations, the question touches fundamentally on the threat, the Turkish threat, to our Aegean frontiers -- most clearly.

As I have said, I did not touch on the question of the bases. It is certain that the question of our country's defense will have some relation to the question of the bases, and most naturally always within the framework of our basic position that there will be a time schedule for their withdrawal from Greek territory. There are other conditions -- I explained them in the Chamber of Deputies -- and I do not need to repeat them.

However, you also mention something which was discussed at length at the meeting of the defense ministers, and this was done by the Greek delegation. This is the now-uncontrolled provision of war material to Turkey by the United States and until recently by West Germany before it took a position resulting from the antidemocratic regime in Turkey. And it most certainly was an issue to which we gave much attention. If this support -- this modernization, as it is called, of power in the Aegean -- continues, within a relatively short time and despite the huge efforts by our people for national defense, it will be overthrown. It is clear that already the national defense budget in our country limits us in our social policy -- in education, health, housing -- our entire social program is retarded due to the fact that we have such a vast budget in relation to our gross national product.

We stand at 6.7 percent, and we are the only country in the West with such an expenditure for defense. It cannot be otherwise, however. In any event this was something we emphasized. We stressed also during the private talks we had that this unacceptable course cannot continue, that this unprecedented support for the Turkish war machine cannot be continued at a time when, unfortunately, as it relates to us, it is directed to the greatest degree toward the west, toward the Aegean, the Greek Aegean.

[Announcer] TA NEA.

[Question] Mr Prime Minister, now that for every agreement it is essential to have unanimity within NATO, are there serious hopes for a new agreement to replace the Rogers agreement and which will protect our sovereign rights?

[Answer] I believe you stated the question very correctly. Under today's conditions, within the framework of NATO there can be no official decision which would satisfy this request, this demand, I would say, of the Greek people. This is the truth. This, however, does not mean that we cannot achieve our goal with some other course which as this is not the proper time, we cannot discuss tonight.

[Announcer] Nikos Angelis of ELLINIKOS VORRAS.

[Question] [Words indistinct] until such time as the "desirable" -- as Makarios described it -- or the "vision" -- as you describe it, as achieved, in other words, withdrawal of foreign armies from Cyprus, will Greece favor continuation of the intercommunal dialogue?

[Answer] Look, until recently, only a short time ago, we had the Waldheim initiative. The text of the Waldheim ideas, naturally, and we must state this clearly, does not respond to the just cause of the people of Cyprus.

However, it was considered that it would be a mistake if Nicosia did not accept a dialogue with the United Nations, because no matter how you look at the matter and irrespective of the preferences and leanings of Waldheim. He is the UN secretary general. I sincerely believe that if and and when this does not produce results, and I am not at all optimistic, then there will be no meaning in any further discussion or further dialogue. This is my viewpoint.

[Announcer] Mavroidhis of MACEDONIA of Thessaloniki.

[Question] [Words indistinct]...in your statement on NATO you said the process has been set in motion for detachment from the Rogers agreement. I would like to ask: What does this process represent? How is it expressed?

[Answer] It is...[pause] What does it mean to be a member of NATO's military wing? This is what you are basically asking me. It means this: It means first of all that a considerable portion of the country's armed forces are under NATO command. There are various categories, three or four categories, of armed forces: Those which are, those which can be -- naturally all are in the event of a world war. I believe -- you remember very well that the current president of the republic and former Prime Minister Karamanlis, spoke about a certain special relationship. This special relationship is a [word indistinct] formula which states -- what? It states that only the government, the Greek Government, has the right to command and to deploy its armed forces unless there is a world war, in which case all these forces are embodied within the NATO command. At this moment we have not accepted the Rogers agreement, nor will we accept it. There is no question, no doubt, about the operational control of the Greek armed forces over the sea and airspace of the Aegean. In conclusion, as I stated earlier, we cannot (?deploy) our forces, except on the basis of the basic criterion, which remains the defense of our territorial integrity from the east. Under such conditions one could state that what is left is only staff cooperation, participation in various committees, of planning. It is difficult to know where one ends and the other begins. I would like to say that [word indistinct] has progressed very well.

[Announcer] Mr Loukatos of TO VIMA.

[Question] Mr Prime Minister, I would like to ask what the future course will be of relations with the Atlantic alliance, with NATO's military wing, one, in the eventuality that some form of guarantee is finally provided, and two, in the exact opposite eventuality, when no guarantee is provided? Naturally if this [word indistinct].

[Answer] This is a very understandable question, I must say, and a question every Greek could ask, as well as every foreigner. I believe I replied to Mr Kambisis earlier that nationally it is not useful to give any clarification.

[Announcer] ELEVTHEROTIPIA.

[Question] Mr Prime Minister, I do not know how you managed to convince Weinberger that our position is crystal-clear. This statement of yours, in any eventuality, did create some sensation here. Many have wondered who is to blame for the lack of briefing to date of the U.S. administration, of Weinberger particularly, on these positions. Is it we, the State Department or who?

[Answer] [Word indistinct] like your colleague [word indistinct] and many others had the same reaction you have: that this was an improbable confirmation of the positions of the Greek Government. Your question does have merit. I believe that, without blaming anyone, I have to say that first of all it is a fact that our diplomatic service, our diplomatic service throughout the world, appears not to have functioned properly. This affects not only personalities but also structure.

Much effort will be required for it to function properly. At the same time I must also state something else: In the United States, but not only in the United States, one must differentiate between the political level, the government and the various services — the state structure, which is very rarely affected by any government. It is for this reason that very often we have peculiar situations in the policy of many countries and, naturally, of the United States as well. Perhaps this could help you find an answer to your question.

[Announcer] A last question from Evangelatos of APOYEVMATINI.

[Question] Do you believe the firm position maintained by the Greek delegation in relation to the question of guarantees of our frontiers will lead the dispute between Greece and Turkey toward further tension and that this will fundamentally sever the dialogue?

[Answer] Look, the question of dialogue, let us place it aside; this is a different issue. So far there has been no dialogue. There will be a meeting between Kharalambopoulos and Turkmen today where the question of every procedure can be discussed. The meeting will take place. I have no news. In reference, however, to the other, the basic question I must tell you that the position of the Turkish defense minister leads to the conclusion that no tension will exist because he truly, insistently and at length, tried to convince the ministers that Turkey has absolutely no aggressive views against Greece. I could expand on this but I prefer not to. My view is that there will be no tension unless this is something very transitory, that there will be no tension in relations, over and above the position these relations are in today.

Averof Scores Statement

[Text] New Democracy Chairman Averof, referring to Papandreou's press conference this evening, made the following statement:

I listened to the press conference of the government's prime minister with great attention. He left me with some questions on which I will request a briefing. I must, however, make two observations, one of a detailed character and the other more general: The prime minister stated correctly that our expenditure for the country's defense is disproportionally high. On the other hand, spiritual and material strengths are the only true security of our frontiers, over and above any guarantees.

The government's prime minister, however, also spoke about increased Turkish armament and about the danger of a total overthrow of the Aegean balance of power. Will loosening our relations with the alliance assist or harm preservation of this balance?

In conclusion, my more general observation is that I fear that the government is conducting foreign policy primarily on the criteria of domestic policy.

GOVERNMENT 'INDIGNANT' OVER ARMENIAN'S RELEASE

TA101212 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Turkish Government statement; date not given]

[Text] We have learned that an Armenian terrorist -- an ASALA [Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia] member -- who was a prime suspect in the case of the armed attack against Gokberk Ergenekon, second secretary of our Embassy in Rome, was sentenced in Paris to 4 months in prison for carrying a false passport, that his sentence was then suspended and that he was released. Although he was not identified positively by Ergenekon, he was, together with another person, recognized by Ergenekon out of six persons shown to him. Furthermore, this person had a wound on his arm. He possessed a Beirut-Milan-Beirut plane ticket, of which he had used the Beirut-Milan part. This evidence leaves no doubt that he was indeed the person who carried out the attack against Ergenekon. Furthermore, it was known that the French police had suspicions about him.

Because the crime was committed in Italy, Turkey could not demand this person's extradition. Consequently our government made repeated and persistent representations to the Italian judicial authorities so the latter could demand the suspect's extradition from France. At the same time, our government made representations to the French authorities not to release that person pending an extradition request from the Italian authorities. The French authorities released that person before the Italian authorities could made the necessary request.

Undoubtedly, the judicial mechanism of every country works differently and the principles of French law are different. We do not want to express opinions or criticize them. However, we have no doubt that the laws and judicial systems of all countries, and especially of Western democracies, must be, and indeed are, based on the principle of maintaining the democratic system and of preventing destructive attacks against this system.

We believe that even if he has committed no other crimes, the fact that this person is a member of ASALA -- an organization which has publicly and almost proudly declared that it has declared war not only against Turkey but against many Western countries -- is in itself a danger for the Western democracies and should mean that he not be released. Furthermore, if there is also a serious suspicion about that person's guilt in committing an attack, then we believe that to investigate that person most carefully and meticulously would be in those countries' interest in protecting their own nations and systems, not a gesture toward Turkey.

An ASALA member and a person who was believed to be the perpetrator of an attack has been released. It was not deemed necessary to collect information about that person's past activities. More than that, no announcement was made as to when the wound in his arm was inflicted. Even if the French authorities have this information, it has not been communicated to Turkey, which is directly involved in the incident, and, as far as we know, it has also not been communicated to the Italian authorities.

Both French and Italian public opinion will be uneasy about the release of a person, who, due to his membership in ASALA, can surely be called a professional killer. His release enables him to continue with his despicable activities. It exceeds the limits of all kinds of logic to declare on the one hand that terrorism will be fought and, on the other hand, to enable convicted [sabikali] terrorists to move about as they please, tolerating them, and more than that, almost encouraging them.

Even though it is a rule that a judge is bound by the case before him and should not be concerned with points that are not included in the case, if the attorney knows of incidents outside the specific case it is possible to keep that person under arrest because of another crime, even if the judge acquits him in the specific case.

In this situation it is impossible to ignore the desire of the French authorities to get the Armenian -- who is a prime suspect -- out of the country as soon as possible and thus prevent conflicts [ihtilaf]. We know the French state is strong and powerful enough not to be timid. Consequently a great deal of astonishment is added to the regrets and indignation we feel about this behavior. We would like to tell the world once again that if such tolerant attitudes lead to a tragedy in future, the entire responsibility will lie with those who display that tolerance.

TERCUMAN ON EUROPE'S HESITANCE IN GIVING AID

NC101232 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 6 Dec 81 p 12

["Sweetly Sweetly" column by Ilhan Engin: "Not a Feared but a Respected Turkey"]

[Excerpts] The Greeks are in a panic. Every now and then their prime minister shouts at the top of his voice, "The Turks are going to attack us." Moreover, he is arousing the Greek Lobby all over the world against Turkey. His intention is to mobilize a new army of crusaders. Why? An adverse atmosphere is prevailing against us in the Council of Europe. Europe does not want a strong Turkey. Why? The Soviet Union approaches us in our distress and asks for impossible things and puts forward impossible suggestions. Why? The United States and our NATO allies give abundant promises for the development of a strong Turkey, but when it comes to turning words into deeds they shirk. Why? Germany has been our ally and friend and the European country closest to us since World War I. But when it comes to helping Turkey and establishing actual relations with us, it is the first country to implement visa requirements against us. It carries out all sorts of inquiries before it extends a little aid. And even that little is rendered very slowly. Why?

There is only one single reason for all this. All eyes are watching Turkey. Turkey's increasing strength, its growing population and its industrialization will upset the equilibrium of the world. Our neighbors are uncomfortable about this. For should Turkey become industrialized, it will be able to form closer contacts with the Muslim states. Those big powers which have lost their colonies will now lose their markets. The military balance will be upset too. Turkey is the most advanced of the undeveloped countries. It is not in their interest to contribute to this advance because Turkey is on its way to becoming the Great Turkey of tomorrow. All these fears have united in opposition to Turkey. Europe has always preferred a weak Turkey fraught with internal strife to a stable steady and powerful Turkey. Just like during the war of liberation, Europe again wants an isolated Turkey and a Turkey receiving directions from others.

The only way to prevent all this is self-confidence. We must derive our strength from our own might. We must unite in our efforts to overcome the present difficult period. We must explore ways and means of carrying on by ourselves. And if one day we become as strong and homogenous a nation as they fear, then we too will have a few words to say to the world. We believe they will then have to accept us. We will no longer need them, but they will need us. This should be our objective.

CANADA

JAMAICA'S SEAGA DISCUSSES CARIBBEAN BASIN PLAN

FL092305 Bridgetown CANA in English 1848 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Text] Kingston, Jamaica, 9 Dec (CANA) -- Jamaica's prime minister, Edward Seaga, has said in Canada that he hopes definitive positions on the Caribbean basin plan -- the U.S. -sponsored initiative to steer developmental assistance to Central American and the Caribbean -- would emerge with the next three months.

It was necessary for the plan to take shape, Mr Seaga told members of the Canadian Club in Ottawa, because countries in the region were urgently in need of attention.

Mr Seaga is today winding up a five-day trip to Canada. He yesterday had talks with his Canadian counterpart, Pierre Elliot Trudeau, and reportedly told the Canadian leader of his concern that the initiative soon become a reality.

Canada, along with Venezuela and Mexico, are co-sponsoring the proposal, which began to emerge fully when the foreign ministers of these countries and the United States met in the Bahamas at mid-year. But they failed to arrive at concensus on what form the programme should take.

The United States is in favour of providing stimulus for private sector development, such as allowing easier access of regional goods to the American market, as well as steering benefits away from those basin countries with whose political ideology it does not agree. But the other partners have made it clear that they would not condone a political component in the programme.

At the same time, Caribbean and Central American states who have endorsed the position taken by Canada, Mexico and Venezuela, are generally in favour of a multilateral approach to aid dispensation with funds channelled through existing regional institutions.

There have been calls for greater public sector transfers to develop infrastructure which could then be used to attract foreign private capital, rather than the Reagan method.

According to the Jamaica Information Service (JIS) Mr Seaga told his Canadian audience that the basin countries did not have the resources to improve the standard of living of their peoples at the rate desired and, therefore, had to seek the additional needs from capital exporting countries.

RED BRIGADE TERRORISTS SENTENCED IN GENOA

[Text] Genoa, 10 Dec (ANSA) -- A Genoa court late last night sentenced 44 suspected members of the Red Brigades terrorist organization to a total of over two-and-a-half centuries of imprisonment. Four other defendants were acquitted by the court.

Those convicted were found guilty of belonging to armed gangs and related terrorist activities after court deliberations that lasted 16 hours yesterday. Among the defendants was 74-year old Caterina Picasso, dubbed the Red Brigades' [BR] grandmother. She received a sentence of three years and four months for having used her home as a Brigadist hideout and hiding arms and other material for the BR's Genoese column. After her arrest she at first cooperated with police but later repented having become a "repentant terrorist" and announced that she was a full-fledged Brigadist.

MALTA

ELECTION CAMPAIGN WINDS UP; CLOSE CONTEST SEEN

NC091058 Paris AFP in English 1044 GMT 9 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Valletta, 9 Dec (AFP) -- Malta's month-long election campaign, in which the Nationalist Party is bidding to end 10 years of Labour rule, ends tomorrow night, giving its 320,000 inhabitants a day's respite before Saturday's poll. Mr Dom Mintoff's Malta Labour Party (MLP), in office for two successive terms, has 34 seats in the House of Representatives, while the opposition Nationalist Party under Eddie Fenech Adami has 31 seats.

The coming contest, in which as usual more than 90 per cent of Malta's electorate is expected to vote in 15 hours of polling starting at 7 a.m. on Saturday, will again be closely fought, according to observers here. The Nationalist Party, energized by the depressing prospect of a third term in opposition, has been arguing that under a decade of Labour Malta has seen the erosion of civil liberties, trade union and workers rights, traditional moral values, and constructive international relations. Labour has been pointing to what it sees as 10 positive years of stability and social progress, which it claims will be jeopardized by a Nationalist victory.

Beyond traditional left-versus-right campaigning, however, there has emerged radically different foreign policy options. The Nationalists promise a decisive swing away from Mintoff-style non-alignment and marginal association with the European Economic Community (EEC), to a more Western commitment for Malta and full EEC membership. It is an issue of consequence: Depending on next week's election result, Malta's future will tilt more towards the Atlantic or remain more steadily behind non-aligned Third-World options including a nuclear-free Mediterranean. Though first ballot counts will be in by Sunday evening from the 13 electoral districts electing five members each, by proportional representation, official results will not be known until late Tuesday or early Wednesday.

NETHERLANDS

DEPUTIES BACK CONTINGENT FOR SINAI FORCE

PM091313 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 3 Dec 81 p 3

[Excerpt] The Hague, 3 December -- A large majority of members of the second chamber agree with the government's decision to allow a small contingent of troops to take part in the international peacekeeping force in Sinai. Only the Political Party of Radicals and the Pacifist Socialist Party yesterday expressed reservations in the monthly discussion with Foreign Minister van der Stoel and Defense Minister van Mierlo.

The Netherlands' participation and the declarations which have been made about it by the government, the four participating EEC partners and the community as a whole do not mean that the EEC has gone back on the Venice Declaration, Van der Stoel stressed. This declaration, made in June 1980, contained the then Nine's Middle East policy and included an expression of the necessity of PLO participation in peace negotiations.

According to Van Mierlo, the Netherlands will at best be able to send a staff and surveillance unit to Sinai. This unit will consist of a platoon of military police, two platoons of infantry, a number of marines and four helicopters with maintenance personnel -- a total of 140 men. This planned force will meet the wishes of the government and chamber and contain as many volunteers as possible.

CHANCELLOR KREISKY COMMENTS ON EVENTS IN POLAND

AU111052 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1012 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Report on telephone interview with Chancellor Kreisky at 0800 GMT on 13 December 1981 -- with recorded Kreisky answers]

[Text] First the chancellor's assessment of the situation [in Poland]:

[Begin Kreisky recording] On can more or less guess what has happened there, and I could imagine that a last great attempt is being made there to prevent the worst. Perhaps it is possible after all for the proclamation of the state of emergency to bring the opposing forces back to talks, to endeavors to put things in order. Of course it is terribly difficult to imagine how things look today in Poland, all that is outside of our own scope of imagination, but indeed it is a fact that obviously chaos has actually broken out there.... [voice trails off] [end recording]

The second, quite obvious question to be put to Chancellor Kreisky: Has anything changed for Austria, which only 1 week ago introduced visas for Polish citizens wanting to enter Austria. Has anything changed for Austria through today's events in Poland?

[Begin Kreisky recording] It is clear, of course, that if under the pressure of the conditions, that is, if there are persecutions which did not exist to date and if people flee from Poland, Austria as always will then be a country of asylum for political refugees. But I am saying again that we are not an emigration country for people who simply want to get away from their country, because we do not have an adequate capacity to accept them, unless other European countries and other states in the world are ready to help make possible such migration. Political refugees have always been admitted to our country. [end recording]

Further Reaction

[Excerpts] Interior Minister Lanc and Foreign Minister Pahr have issued instructions that both Austrian border authorities and Austrian personnel at diplomatic representations abroad are to be particularly generous regarding the issuance of visas for Polish citizens. Foreign Minister Pahr declared that he hoped the events in Poland would not mark the end of the liberalization process in this country, and that the arrested persons, especially the trade union members, would be released as quickly as possible.

In Vienna, several spontaneous demonstrations were held today, by Austrians and by Poles living in Austria. In the morning, hundreds of Poles gathered in front of the Gardekirche on Vienna's Rennweg. Next to the church entrance, the slogan "State of war in Poland" was displayed. Through leaflets, the Poles were informed about events in their homeland. Young people distributed stickers with the legend "Russians -- hands off Poland" and called for solidarity with the Polish trade union.

In Vienna-Hietzing, about 500 demonstrators met to protest the events in Poland. Well over half of the participants were Poles. The participants in the demonstration, which had not been registered with the police [as required by Austrian law], gathered after 1200 in front of the Kettenbrueckengasse subway station in Vienna's fifth district, and then took the subway to the embassy. However, they were not permitted by police to approach the entrance of the Polish Embassy building. At 1400 the demonstration ended in Hietzing, following an announcement that another demonstration would be held tomorrow night in the city center. It was stressed that this time, the demonstration would be duly registered with the police.

PAPER REVIEWS 292D MBFR PLENARY SESSION

[Text] The Vienna negotiations on the reduction of forces in Central Europe have been underway for more than 8 years, but the 25th round of these talks ended on Thursday, again without tangible results. At the last plenary session of this round, the Eastern side submitted the proposal to establish a drafting committee to start work on the text of a first agreement at the end of January, when the negotiations will resume. The Western side stressed again that without an agreement on the controversial troop strength figures of the East and on "accompanying control measures," no progress was possible.

At a press conference following the 292d plenary session, the NATO representative, Netherlands Ambassador de vos van Steenwijk, pointed out that in this round the West had again tried in vain to bring the East to a serious discussion about the troop strength question, as well as on the accompanying control measures. However, the Warsaw Pact countries "persistently refused to divulge the information necessary to solve the troop strength figures question." De Vos emphasized, however, that with regard to concepts and in several sectors, there has been a reconcilement of positions and in some cases agreement.

Speaking for the Eastern side, GDR Ambassador Andre Wieland declared that in the past round the NATO countries dodged a constructive dialogue about the key problems of a first agreement. Nowhere else, he continued, are more weapons and soldiers concentrated today than in Central Europe. It stands to reason that the Eastern side is interested in ending this state of affairs. Wieland also pointed out that following the unilateral withdrawal of Soviet soldiers and tanks from the GDR after the end of last year, the troop strength of the Warsaw Pact forces in Central Europe was today lower than that of NATO.

The 26th round of the negotiations will begin after the Christmas and New Year's break, on 28 January.

SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON POLISH DEVELOPMENTS

LD140936 Hamburg DPA in German 0058 GMT 14 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Warsaw, 14 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt was informed of the events in Poland during his meeting with the GDR state and party chief Erich Honecker in Schorfheide, north of Berlin. Since the early hours of the morning the Federal Chancellor has supplied him with all the information on the events. Schmidt said on ARD that on hearing the news Honecker was as dismayed as he was. Already at his closing press conference in the GDR, the chancellor said that both politicians hope that Poland will succeed in uniting the elements among the people that are in conflict.

Returns From GDR

LD132142 Hamburg DPA in German 1921 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Text] Hamburg, 13 Dec (DPA) -- Following his 3-day meeting with GDR head of state and party Erich Honecker, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt returned to the Federal Republic on Sunday evening. The federal chancellor, whose last stop was the small Mecklenburg town of Guestrow, arrived at Hamburg central station after about 3 hours on a special train. He continued on to his home in Hamburg-Langenhorn.

Schmidt made no further detailed statements in Hamburg. He merely emphasized that after a talk with Honecker, he was still unable to make an assessment on the latest events in Poland. But he assumed that the countries would be able to cope with their difficulties unaided.

CSU CHAIRMAN SCORES SCHMIDT STANCE ON POLAND

LD140642 Hamburg DPA in German 1423 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Text] Munich, 13 Dec (DPA) -- CSU Chairman Franz-Josef Strauss has accused Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of lack of political instinct and dishonesty because of his position on the events in Poland. While martial law was being declared in Poland and leading members of Solidarity were being arrested, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt remained the guest of the "Eastern bloc leader who has for months most vociferously called for a hard, and if necessary, violent reaction to Solidarity." The brutal action against Solidarity was thus also a success for Honecker, it says in the statement distributed by the CSU leadership in Bavaria. There is no doubt that Erich Honecker knew the exact time of the action, considering the close political connections among the Eastern bloc states. Against this background East Berlin's fixing of the date for Schmidt's visit was pure cynicism.

AIR TRAFFIC AGREEMENT WITH DRA TO BE ENDED

[Excerpts] Bonn, 11 Dec (DPA) -- Like Britain and France, the Federal Republic has terminated its air traffic agreement with Soviet-occupied Afghanistan with effect from 31 December 1982. A Ministry of Transport spokesman told newsmen in Bonn today that the reason for this step is the behavior of the Afghan Government during an aircraft hijacking in March, which ended in Kabul without measures being taken against the air pirates. The Federal Government is one of the seven states committed to terminating air traffic agreements with countries that do not either extradite hijackers or punish them.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman added that at present Bonn is not contemplating terminating the air traffic agreement with the Republic of South Africa, too. If the German-Afghanistan air traffic agreement expires, the Afghan airline Ariana will have to discontinue the two weekly return flights between Kabul and Frankfurt. Lufthansa does not fly to Afghanistan.

TWO POLISH ESPIONAGE SUSPECTS EXPELLED

[Text] Berlin, 11 Dec (DPA) -- The Allied Command in Berlin expelled two alleged Polish spies on Friday, the French authorities have announced. For the first time it was also confirmed that one of the two Poles arrested on Monday was Wlodzimierz Borowik, first secretary of the Polish Embassy in the GDR. The other person expelled, Miroslaw Piegat, is described in the announcement as a Polish Foreign Ministry "expert."

Both men had been arrested on Monday in the Kreuzberg district and imprisoned on the following day for espionage under German law. According to newspaper reports, the two are said to have been arrested redhanded. Apparently they had met with a Polish student and had demanded information on Poles who had emigrated to West Berlin. The Berlin authorities neither confirmed nor denied these reports. The announcement on Friday did not contain any details about the incident. According to the French report both men were expelled to the GDR during the afternoon.

TURKISH WORKERS PROTEST RESTRICTIONS ON FAMILIES

TA111732 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] Turkish worker organizations in the FRG are protesting the FRG Government's decisions to limit the rights of workers to bring their spouses and children to the FRG. At a news conference in Bonn organized by these Turkish worker organizations it was stated that the decisions in question are against human rights [words indistinct] that a protest will be lodged with international human rights organizations.

Foreign workers employed in the FRG will counter these decisions by organizing a week of friendship with the Germans. During this friendship week, which will begin in 16 FRG cities tomorrow and will last until 20 December, foreign workers will hold open air meetings and exhibitions explaining their problems and views. According to the decisions, foreign workers living in the FRG can bring only their children under 16 years of age, and spouses can come to the FRG only if the worker has been working in the country for at least 8 years.

Representations have been made with FRG authorities for the abolishment of these measures, which also affect Turkish workers. A meeting was held at the Foreign Ministry between the FRG ambassador to Ankara, Dirk Oncken, and the economic affairs deputy secretary general of the Foreign Ministry, Ambassador Oktay Iscen. At the meeting, the view that the measures in question were not humane was expressed and their abolishment was requested.

PAPER SPECULATES ON POLISH DEVELOPMENTS

[Carl Gustav Stroehm commentary: "Danger of Explosion"]

[Text] Since yesterday General Jaruzelski has been ruling Poland by means of martial law. Consequently the country is "in a state of war," as the constitution defines it. The term "state of emergency" otherwise so readily preferred does not apply either under the aspects of formal law or by its meaning. For, the supreme leadership of Poland by its sweeping action against the trade union "Solidarity" has turned the condition of permanent conflict prevalent in the country since the summer of 1980 into a military action against the organization of the independent workers movement.

So far it is impossible to tell how this workers' movement will react to the assault and to the suspension -- which probably means liquidation -- of its organization. Leaflets appeared in Warsaw calling for a general strike. If additional and larger strike actions happen under martial law, the general would have but two options: either do nothing and thus destroy his own prestige or intervene with force and thus conjure up all the more the civil war of which he had warned.

Moreover, it is hardly conceivable that a military regime in Central Europe -- after all, Poland is not located somewhere in the Third World -- can lastingly solve problems of a social and political nature. Jaruzelski has dragged the armed forces into domestic policy. It remains an open question whether this can be a blessing for the army and the people.

Poland, the most important neighbor of the Soviet Union, at Russia's western border, so far had retained a certain predictability in all its chaos: the bottle was open, the pressure had an outlet. Jaruzelski has corked the bottle now. The general hopes to have thereby confined the "Solidarity" spirit which is so unpleasant to him and the Kremlin. Nevertheless -- the bottle may explode.

STATE OF EMERGENCY IN POLAND "MILD SOLUTION"

DW141237 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 14 Dec 81 p 4

[Josef Riedmiller article: "Poland's Army Is To Save the Party"]

[Text] One year has passed since the setting up of a memorial for the workers killed in the December 1970 strikes in Gdansk, the very city where now the "Solidarity" leaders have been deprived of their power. When the memorial was inaugurated a year ago the Polish Armed Forces supplied the guard of honor. On Sunday they were mobilized to form a protective wall behind which the state authority can be revived and the socialist system recover from its setbacks. Both were set on 17 December: the "Solidarity" trade union which by resolution of its national commission wanted to make it a day of national protest against the use of force as well as General Jaruzelski, who as party and government chief had not succeeded since the spring to bring about national understanding and who now had to resort to the instrument of martial law to prevent a national apotheosis of sorrow and resistance.

The Gdansk meeting of the "Solidarity" leaders offered Jaruzelski a good opportunity of paralyzing the trade union movement -- for how long is open to question at this point. But the decision to act naturally was made earlier, probably in the early autumn when groups of military officers swarmed out to gather information about the worries and concerns as well as the mood of the people and their likely reaction in the case of an intervention by the military. Now these military patrols are appearing again, however, not as friendly advisors and helpers but as commissars placed over civilian authorities and ministries. Jaruzelski in his address to the Poles protectively tried to defend himself against the suspicion bound to come up of heading a military dictatorship. But he will not be totally able to dissuade the Poles, who have had relevant experiences in their history, from being suspicious.

Yet the assumption of power by the military in Poland under existing circumstances is a mild solution, if matters rest there. Aside from the church, the armed forces enjoy the most prestige among the people. Unlike the party and government officials, the soldiers are close to the people, embodying the country's traditions and pride but also constituting a memory of its dark hours. Soldiers, if they are really Polish soldiers, are allowed more than other authorities of the People's Republic, without immediately producing aversion and opposition. Jaruzelski, announcing martial law, made ample use of these facts in referring to the soldiers' "clean hands." At the same time he was trying to direct the people's negative emotions about the party, toward the most hated former officials which he detained like the trade union leaders. In this way he distributed the just punishment by the people among all supposedly responsible for Poland's present misfortune.

But the idea of the military being the selfless charwoman in the country is as little true in Poland as in all those countries where it is to help the rulers prolong their power. Poland's army has not primarily been mobilized to implement such laudible intentions as the functioning of the supply and the continuation of production but above all to keep the regime alive. It would not have been able to recover from its paralysis by its own resources or through encouragement by the people, and it is uncertain whether it will be able to do this on the point of only the Polish bayonets. The proclamation of martial law is an attempt to revitalize the power organs of the Polish socialist system, and this without bloodshed, if possible.

The Warsaw leaders and the worried neighbors were trying for a long time to find a model of settling the conflict which would allow it to end the Polish troubles quietly and without international disapproval. If Jaruzelski's hope comes true that the demonstration of power is as effective as its use he could succeed in letting his way of crisis management remain an internal Polish affair. As long as the Poles settle their conflict among themselves, without outside military intervention and above all without bloodshed, the international public will have to accept this as proof that they are able and about to solve their problems themselves. Leonid Brezhnev who continues to wait for a meeting with Ronald Reagan would then be as satisfied as Chancellor Helmut Schmidt whose German peace oratory is being drowned by the Polish noise.

Is this new frost in Poland and in international relations solely attributable to the "Solidarity" leaders, their excessiveness and shortsightness? "Solidarity" is not exempt from every responsibility for the events. Above all in the recent past it was the spokesman of political demands which in many respects were similar to those by which Hungary and the CSSR gave Moscow a reason to intervene. To be aware of these reasons is one thing, to consider them justified or non-revisable, another. In Poland the party lost the "leading role" claimed by it. It is not easy to make the people realize that this will have consequences.

OFFICIALS INTERVIEWED ON CRISIS IN POLAND

Cheysson Comments

LD131744 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Excerpts] A state of emergency was declared in Poland. Both in Washington and in the capitals of Europe, it is stressed that this is primarily an internal Polish affair which must be settled between Poles. This is what Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson said on behalf of France, when contacted by us on the telephone.

[Begin recording] [Cheysson] I note in the statement made by General Jaruzelski that this is an internal Polish affair, and the statements made by other foreign circles show that they fully intend to consider it as an internal Polish affair, and this is what we hope for above all; that is to say, let the Poles settle their own affairs.

[Question] According to information available to you, is there a threat of foreign intervention in Poland?

[Answer] We have no information tending to this. Quite the contrary; all statements by foreign countries that I have read stress that the Poles must be left responsible for their own affairs.

[Question] It is nonetheless a serious setback for democracy in Poland.

[Answer] Let us wait and see what happens. It is obvious that in the reports reaching us there are elements which seem disquieting, but let us wait to see what happens.

[Question] Do you think that there is a risk of civil war in Poland?

[Answer] Really, I know nothing about it. The possibility of a civil war is a dreadful possibility, because everyone knows what a civil war costs, but for the moment I see no reason to consider this possibility. [end recording]

No statement has yet been made by the PCF, while Jacques Chirac reacted by stating that if freedom is suppressed in Poland, the Western nations should consider the consequences in their relations with East Europe.

Mauroy Voices Concern

LD140756 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Statement by Premier Pierre Mauroy from Matignon Palace -- live]

[Text] It is up to Poland to find for itself, in complete independence, its own path toward freedom, justice and prosperity. These were the sentiments that the government was going to express on the occasion of the official visit that I was due to pay to Poland from 16 to 19 December. This journey was to have been the occasion for greeting the democratization underway for more than a year and by all the elements making up the Polish nation.

The French Government naturally refuses to interfere in any way in Poland's affairs, but the installation last night in Poland of a military administration, the arrest of numerous responsible political and trade union personalities and the imposition of martial law interrupt this democratic evolution. These actions arouse the gravest concern of the French Government. We share in the spontaneous expressions of emotion of the French people and voiced by numerous organizations, notably trade unions.

The French Government notes that the decisions made in Poland pertain to that country's internal sovereignty. France wishes to see a resumption of dialogue among Poles and a return to vital freedoms. Each of us can see that if the movement for renewal that has been started in Poland were to be halted, then grave repercussions would ensure.

France and Poland have long shared the ideals of freedom. This common fight for freedom took place in Paris as well as in Warsaw throughout the 19th century and then during the fight against Nazism. These common struggles are in France particularly important as they relate to Poland. The French Government holds the view that, free from all foreign interference, Poland should find the path leading to its recovery and its liberty.

CHEVENEMENT ON REPORTS OF NUCLEAR AID TO INDIA

OW111333 Hong Kong AFP in English 1222 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] Tokyo, 11 Dec (AFP) -- Jean Pierre Chevenement, French minister for research, today described as "pure speculation" some press reports that he told Indian officials France would co-operate on building a fast breeder reacter at Kalpakkam near Madras. Answering a question from the press at a meeting of the French chamber of commerce in Japan, he said France was ready to strengthen its cooperation with India in all sectors. "I also told a tenacious journalist that France did not rule out the nuclear sector within this cooperation. I said nothing else and the reports you mention are pure speculation," the minister said.

GOVERNMENT APPROVES ELECTRONICS DEAL FOR PIPELINE

[Commentary by Patrick Haas]

[Text] Paris, 11 Dec (AFP) -- The French Government this week gave Thomson-CSF its blessing for a pipeline electronics deal with the Soviet Union. This contract, worth roughly $300 million, covers remote surveillance systems for the pipeline that will take gas from Siberia to Western Europe. It is a useful export deal for France, but the original September 30 deal has been modified to accommodate United States susceptibilities. The terms of the initial contract documents implied that certain ultra-sophisticated equipment, regarded as "strategic," would be supplied to the USSR. It is likely that the most sensitive equipment has been changed so that it will get past the Western COCOM body, which vets supplies to the USSR that could have a military purpose.

An outline of the Thomson-CSF contract will be sent to COCOM, which is a relic of the Cold War that has been gathering dust for years. The French External Affairs Ministry said today that France has "its own rules" for exports to the Soviet Union. These rules lined up with France's international commitments. Ministry officials said that "this contract gives rise to no problems as regards these rules." It said an international coordination procedure was available. The French Government, some of whose members attended the contract signing ceremony on Wednesday, had been hoping France would get some business from the USSR in return for buying 8 billion cubic metres of its gas per annum starting in 1984.

Doubtless it argued in talks with U.S. officials that West Germnay and France need this gas, and that the French electronics are needed if the gas is to flow at all. The contract was made public on the eve of foreign trade minister Michel Jobert's departure for the Soviet Union, where he will chair a meeting of the joint Franco-Soviet trade commission. The contract for the supply of gas is in its final stages of negotiations, and it is possible that the price will be similar to that laid down under the recent Soviet-West German deal. This price is just over $5 per British thermal unit.

France normally ought to pay more as the gas has to travel further. Meanwhile France is negotiating other industrial deals, particularly a $300 million gas cooling plant. In all the French hope to book equipment contracts worth at least $1 billion.

TRADE MINISTER LEAVES FOR TALKS IN MOSCOW

NC121758 Paris AFP in English 1721 GMT 12 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 12 Dec (AFP) -- French External Trade Minister Michel Jobert left today on a four-day economic mission to Moscow aimed at curbing France's escalating trade deficit with the Soviet Union. Mr Jobert, accompanied by 40 aides, arrived in Leningrad today. He will co-chair with Soviet counterpart Nikolay Patolichev the 16th session of the Franco-Soviet grand commission on Monday and Tuesday, and will also meet with Soviet Prime Minister Nikolay Tikhonov and Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. Sources here said his main concern would be to reverse the direction of France's trade balance with the Soviet Union.

Last year France imported 940 million dollars more in goods from the Soviet Union than the Soviets bought from France. By the end of October that deficit, the first ever for France, was 1,200 million dollars and climbing with Siberian gas purchases. As one solution, sources said, Mr Jobert will seek more contracts, such as that signed by the French company Thomson yesterday to furnish a 300-million-dollar computer-monitoring system for a future Soviet gas pipeline. Among Franco-Soviet deals in the offing -- which Mr Jobert will presumably explore -- are reconstruction of a Moscow automobile factory, sale of French gas transmission equipment, exploration for Soviet oil and tapping of Soviet gas fields.

U.S. CENTRAL AMERICA POLICY 'MISGUIDED'

[Marcel Niedergang article: "Central America's Dominoes"]

[Text] Blockade threats, selective economic aid, the barely secret drafting of plans for armed intervention, tolerance of emigres openly planning the "liberation" of Cuba or Nicaragua: The Reagan administration is pursuing the same misguided and dangerous policy in Central America that the Eisenhower administration pursued 20 years ago.

Cuba did not become the first communist state in the Western hemisphere solely through negative and hostile U.S. action. But the Castroist regime was not predestined to enter the Soviet sphere of influence. Immediately after its victory over the Batista dictatorship the die was not cast. And the "punishments" which Washington inflicted on the Havana revolutionary government in 1960 at least contributed to the Cubans' gradual slide toward Moscow. The "radicalization" of Sandinist Nicaragua cannot be explained solely by U.S. aggressiveness. Internal score-settling, the total break with the business bourgeoisie, which had contributed to Somoza's fall, "Cuban-style" officering, and the first restrictions on freedom have seriously damaged the very favorable climate created by the Sandinist regime's cautious pragmatism in the first few months.

But the abrupt suspension of the conditional aid granted by the Carter administration, the warnings issued virtually every day, the thinly veiled threats of intervention, either direct or via commando groups formed from former Somoza guards installed in Honduras, are obviously pushing Sandinist Nicaragua to anchor itself even more firmly in the camp of Washington's adversaries. For once history is not stammering. It is repeating itself. Washington has just vetoed a $[illegible] million loan from the Inter-American Development Bank which Managua was anxiously awaiting. Nicaraguan Defense Minister Ortega has gone to Moscow. Foreign Minister Father d'Escoto, who kept up a dialogue of the deaf with Mr Alexander Haig during the OAS conference in Saint Lucia, is also expected in the Soviet capital.

Nicaraguan pilots are apparently training in Bulgaria. A reliable source reports Cuban and East German advisers on Nicaragua's Atlantic coast. In Managua Soviet and Libyan propaganda, and that of other countries, is displayed.

The United States lost Cuba. It is busy losing Nicaragua. It could lose El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala tomorrow. And in Panama the leaders are condemning with increasing vigor -- they have just "complained" to the OAS in Saint Lucia -- the United States' failure to respect the Carter-Torrijos treaty on the Canal Zone. In Panama the U.S. regional military high command watches over the U.S. strategic network in Latin America. The main concern is the Central American dominoes between the canal and the Mexican border. One pawn only has to collapse for all the other to be threatened. This theory is not completely wrong but it is incomplete.

Badly Extinguished Fires

In the sixties, the Cuban example and Havana's assistance fed the ardor -- frequently disorganized -- of many armed insurrectional movements in Latin America. This was the case until the death of "Che" Guevara in October 1967 in a ravine in eastern Bolivia. The Sandinists' victory over the Somoza clan in Managua in July 1979 revived the hopes and determination of the extreme leftwing insurrectional groups in El Salvador, which had hitherto been harrassing the relatively powerful local oligarchy without much success. The extension of the Salvadoran underground and its undeniable success have directly encouraged a major revival of guerrilla movements in Guatemala, which have accumulated disasters and glorious deeds for the past 25 years since the fall of the progressive and nationalist government of Col Arbenz Guzman, "put to death" by the United States.

It is true that the fire is spreading. But there is no deliberately started fire in Central America. There are just fires which had been badly extinguished. Everywhere or virtually everywhere socioeconomic conditions bordering on caricature encourage revolts, stir up hatred and inflame the courage of the most determined people. And for a good 50 years the struggle against the established social disorder has, as far as militant vanguard fighters are concerned, depended on challenging the visible and threatening U.S. imperialism. Cuba is now no longer the "beacon" it was in the early years. Its alignment with the Soviet Union, probably vital to the regime's survival but unconditional, is not supported by all. Cuba is still a refuge, a center of political and material assistance, a link with possible foreign aid supplied by the Soviet Union, the socialist countries or the revolutionary Third World countries. It is no longer the only nor perhaps even the most important turntable [plaque tournante] in the region.

Other countries have played or are continuing to play an essential role in this complex chess game in which world peace is also at stake. Mexico resolutely aids Central American insurrectional movements. Venezuela is an up-and-coming oil power and is Mexico's rival in winning a Caribbean and Central American sphere of influence, and its present Christian Democratic government rigorously and paradoxically applies the Betancourt doctrine: No to all totalitarianisms. Panama was such a country up until the tragic death of Omar Torrijos, its "strongman" who "helped" the revolutionary leaders of Central America more than anybody else and in an effective way. Torrijos, whose death will have effects on an as yet unsuspected scale because he was the only man who could talk, and hence negotiate, with the United States, the Cubans, the Mexicans, the Venezuelans and the leaders of the various armed movements. His secret but decisive "interventions" are missed.

Finally Europe is more present and active than it has ever been. The German SPD is closely following the evolution of its Nicaraguan and Salvadoran "proteges." The Spanish Socialist Workers Party: Mr Felipe Gonzalez is a real expert on the Central American situation. The French Socialist government, together with Mexico, took a "political" stance which was criticized by several Latin American countries but which has the merit, among others, of doing something to disrupt a "game" which the United States wants and proclaims to be simple, too simple.

Indeed, on each occasion the U.S. leaders are expressing surprise at "setbacks" whose underlying causes they apparently refuse to see or accept.

To start with they are disregarding what must be termed their "moral" debt toward small countries like Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, where their word has virtually been law since the start of this century and where they have virtually always supported the most corrupt and authoritarian regimes or dictators. The "psychological" factor is rarely taken into account in the State Department's analyses. Nonetheless, it is considerable.

Under Batista Havana was the United States' brothel, a floating brothel moored off Miami -- a lurid and disgusting symbol of uncontrolled and unlimited dependence. You only have to reread Fidel Castro's first speeches to understand the importance of this humiliation in fomenting his revolt. Against all the odds, the United States kept the Somoza family -- "Somoza, our son of a bitch," to quote a U.S. President -- in Nicaragua for almost 50 years, a family so greedy and impudent that it eventually produced an alliance between Marxist revolutionaries and liberal bourgeois.

The U.S. leaders -- Republicans and Democrats alike -- ascribe the increasing perils to international communism's subversive action. To "contain" the "red tide," Foster Dulles authorized a punitive expedition against Guatemala in 1954. Before calling off the operation in April 1961, Kennedy had given U.S. naval and air support to the anti-Castroists who attacked the Cuban coast. It was the Democrat Johnson who sent 40,000 crack soldiers into the Dominican Republic in 1965 to halt a military and civilian uprising in which the CIA had detected "53 Communists." Back in spring 1980 Mr Reagan's advisers on Latin America drafted the Santa Fe document, which states that "a liberation war should be launched against Cuba if propaganda is not enough." The USSR is not absent from Central America any more than it is from other theaters of East-West confrontation. But it has acted cautiously in a sector rightly regarded as a U.S. "preserve." Moscow only took real risks once, in Cuba in 1962, sparking the missile crisis which brought the world to the brink of nuclear war. The modus vivendi reached between Moscow and Washington (no American intervention in Cuba, no Soviet offensive weapons in Cuba) is likely at any time to be called into question on both sides by the current tension.

Mexico's Warning

Mr Reagan's and Mr Haig's belligerent language is reminiscent of Foster Dulles' during the Cold War. Determination prevails over "nuances." Mr Haig repeats that he rules out "no hypothesis" and Mr Meese, one of the President's close adviers, has just confirmed that "Mr Reagan does not rule out a blockade or other use of force to stop the flow of arms to El Salvador." A U.S. base is apparently being constructed in the Gulf of Fonesca, on the Nicaraguan border. The White House has just sent all governments a report which accuses Cuba of "wishing to control Nicaragua and planning the overthrow of the Salvadoran and Guatemalan Governments."

"We are not a paper tiger," Mr Meese also said. The Reagan administration clearly wants to do "something" to reverse the trend, to strike at the head. If possible Washington would like to avoid acting alone. But all the Latin American countries so far "sounded out" have declined or, like the Mexicans, have warned Mr Reagan against "a disastrous historical error." Washington's "verbal" offensive has already had an effect in El Salvador. As the opposition front leaders themselves admit, it strengthens the "extremist and pro-Soviet elements" at the expense of the moderates "supported by the Socialist International." From Mexico to Brasilia, leaders who fear U.S. intervention are looking toward Warsaw. They know that a Soviet intervention in Poland could spark an American operation in Nicaragua and possibly in Cuba....

LEADERS EXPRESS CONCERN OVER POLISH SITUATION

[Text] Rome, 13 Dec (ANSA) -- The Italian Government and the nation's political parties have been closely following the unfolding of events in Poland, where the leader of the Polish Communist Party (?and) government on Saturday night announced a series of repressive measures, declared a state of siege, and arrested the leading members of Poland's Solidarity union.

Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini on Sunday maintained constant contact with Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo. The two men also put together the terms of the position which Italy will take on the Polish crisis this afternoon in London during an informal meeting of the EEC foreign ministers. Concerning this position, Spadolini Sunday released a communique stating that Italy will tend to avoid "that more serious consequences evolve out of the dramatic shift imposed in Poland by the repressive military measures."

Spadolini also consulted with the secretaries of the parties in his coalition on Sunday. After contacting the leadership of their respective parties, representatives of the coalition partners distributed communiques asking for the restitution of civil liberties in Poland and warning about the use of foreign military intervention. The Communist Party announced also that it would present a motion in the lower house today, expressing "condemnation" for the exceptional measures adopted by the Polish authorities. The Communist Party motion will also define as "inadmissible" any "foreign intervention" and ask for a resumption of dialogue between the government and the social forces.

Colombo Summons Polish Envoy

[Excerpts] Rome, 14 Dec (ANSA) -- The situation in Poland, where a state of siege has been declared by Polish head of state Gen Wojciech Jaruzelski, was the subject of inquiries by Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, who today summoned Polish Ambassador to Rome Emil Wojtaszek to the Foreign Ministry here to ask for clarifications on the intentions of his government.

Colombo, in his meeting with the Polish ambassador to Italy, also expressed the deep concern of the Italian Government for the measures adopted by the Polish Government, which interrupted the dialogue set in motion between the authorities and the Polish labor movement, introducing into the Polish situation serious elements of tension which cannot but be felt in the European context, given the deep ties existing between the people on the continent, informed sources said.

In another development, it was announced on Sunday that the Italian Foreign Ministry was able to make radio contact on Sunday afternoon with the Italian Embassy in Warsaw. From the embassy there, it was confirmed that the Polish Foreign Ministry had summoned the Italian ambassador to Poland, Marco Favale, to their headquarters. The Italian Foreign Ministry is awaiting further notice on the outcome of that meeting.

In the meantime, Colombo was reported keeping a close eye on all the elements of information on the Polish situation. Besides telephone conversations with European foreign ministers Lord Carrington from Great Britain, Claude Cheysson from France and Hans-Dietrich Genscher from West Germany, Colombo also had a conversation with American Secretary of State Alexander Haig.

It was reported that information was exchanged between the foreign secretaries on the situation in Poland, and agreements made to maintain constant contact to examine further developments in the crisis.

Columbo, Pope Discuss Poland

AU140854 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 14 Dec 81

[Text] Vatican City, 14 Dec (ANSA) -- The situation in Poland, where Polish head of state Wojciech Jaruzelski declared a state of siege late Saturday night, announcing the institution of a "military council for national safety," temporary suspension of civil liberties, and a series of exceptional military measures, including the arrests of leaders of the Solidarity union, was discussed informally on Sunday evening by Pope John Paul II and Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, who met in a Roman Catholic church in a residential area of Rome.

At the conclusion of the meeting, Colombo told members of the press here that "on this day, which is certainly one of great concern for the holy father, for Italy and for all the nations of the world because of the situation in Poland, I came to convey to the pope the sentiments of solidarity of the people and the Government of Italy.

Further commenting on the crisis situation in the Eastern European nation, reportedly precipitated by decisions emerging at the conclusion of a national convention of the Solidarity union in Danzig where labor leaders had agreed on resorting to a general strike in the Soviet bloc nation if necessary, Colombo said that "Italy, Europe, Weestern nations and all men who believe in liberty are concerned over what has happened in Poland." The gradual process of democracy in the country, the minister continued, seems like it could be interrupted. Therefore, the concern is very great. "All of this seems to show that in Poland, there is no longer any area for following up on this process. We hope that every initiative remains open to the Polish people without interference."

Answering journalists' questions about Polish Pope John Paul II's feeling for the crisis in his homeland, Colombo said that "the pope is following the situation with great attention and concern, but also with calm." In answer to whether the pope had any direct information about Poland, the Rome diplomatic chief said "he certainly has information, as we have also, but the situation is very difficult because communications are interrupted."

At the conclusion of the visit which the pope was paying to the local Rome parish, the occasion for his meeting with Colombo, the Polish pontiff told newsmen that "my country has not had an easy history in these last two centuries, but even a tortured history produces something good. This moment is (difficult) one," the pope continued, "and because of that, much prayer and solidarity is needed to maintain a just equilibrium".

According to the newsmen present, the pope also revealed the extent to which he was moved during the brief encounter with the press when a young man voiced an expression of solidarity on the part of all those present for the Polish people. Pope John Paul II confirmed just a few weeks ago his intention of paying another visit to his native Poland next August for the 600th centennial celebration of the patron saint of that nation. The present situation, and fears for more dramatic developments in the future, observers, noted, now put that visit in question.

Appeal to Polish Pilgrims

[Pope John Paul II appeal to Polish pilgrims in St Peters Square 13 December -- recorded]

[Text] The events of the last few hours prompt me to appeal once more to everyone on matters pertaining to our common motherland and with a request for prayer.

I repeat what I said in September: Polish blood must not be shed because too much of it has been shed already, especially during the last war. Everything possible must be done to build the future of the country in peace. With the forthcoming 600th anniversary of the Jasna Gora shrine, I entrust Poland and all my countrymen to her who has given to our nation for our protection.

COMMUNIST PARTY CONDEMNS NEW POLISH ACTIONS

AU140846 Rome ANSA in English 0817 GMT 14 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 14 Dec (ANSA) -- The Italian Communist Party had harsh words of condemnation for the actions of the Polish Communist Party government [as received], which declared a state of siege in Poland on Saturday night, clamping repressive measures on the population, and arresting leaders of the Solidarity union. A communique released at the conclusion of a meeting of the party's leadership here on Sunday evening asked for "the immediate restitution of civil liberties and union rights in Poland."

Appealing to "the sense of responsibility of the government, the communists, the workers and the Polish citizens, whatever their political position, to avoid the danger of moves which could be catastrophic for that country ahd its repercussions in all of Europe," the communique affirmed that "democracy and socialism must be considered indivisible."

Reiterating the Italian Communist Party position on Poland, the communique stated that they have always "affirmed the necessity for any new action to be founded on an open debate to reach a (?national movement) without resorting to acts of force, and by isolating extremist and irresponsible tendencies in every camp, rejecting every (?mental) pressure from outside interference."

Trade Unions' Denunciation

[Text] Rome, 14 Dec (ANSA) -- Leaders of the three big Italian federated trade unions have asked for the liberation of the leaders of the Polish Solidarity union arrested late Saturday night in Poland in a harsh crackdown on civil liberties in that nation begun with the announcement by the government of interim military rule and other represssive measures, Saturday night.

Labor leaders of the CISL [Italian Confederation of Workers Trade Unions] CGIL and UIL [Italian Labor Uion] [words indistinct] formally requested the release of the Solidarity leaders during a meeting on Sunday afternoon with Polish ambassador to Rome, Emil Wojtaszek. At the conclusion of the meeting, CISL leader Pierre Carniti told members of the press that "the Polish ambassador assured us that he will convey the protest of the Italian unions to his government."

The Italian union representatives met with the Polish ambassador after a joint meeting of the three union leaderships in which they decided to ask Italian workers to participate in work stoppages and factory assemblies in the major cities to express their solidarity with the Polish workers and their opposition to the acts of power of the Polish Government.

A declaration from the Italian Catholic Workers Action Group, also released on Sunday, maintained that "the recourse to force on the art of the Policy Government cannot resolve any problem, and aggravates all of them."

GOVERNMENT SURVIVES 10 DEC CONFIDENCE VOTE

AU110838 Rome ANSA in English 0805 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 11 Dec (ANSA) -- For the second time in a week, the Italian Government has resorted to the use of the confidence vote to overcome opposition to the figures outlined in its financial package for the coming year, presently under the examination of the Senate.

In voting late last night on a provision of the new financial law, the coalition composed of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals, and Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini's own Republican Party tallied 168 votes in favor of confidence in the government and 100 against. Votes in favor came from the coalition parties, and the opposition included the formidable Communist Party, the nation's second largest grouping occupying the opposition benches, the smaller parties to the left of it, and the rightwing parties.

Political observers here note that this repetition of the confidence vote measure, which allows the passage of a provision it is attached to without any added amendments of motions, is a sign of a weakening in the government. The open ballot used for confidence is a sure way, the observers point out, to avoid the "renegade" voting of members of the majority coalition which have led past governments down the path to crisis.

The voting took place on article 45 of the financial laws, outlined by Spadolini and his cabinet to pick up Italy's sagging economy and slow down a galloping inflation rate, and concerned an added tax for Italy's socialized health program users. According to the observers, members of the majority coalition parties opposed the surcharge on medical care, joining the strong opposition of the Communist Party. It was when this opposition became apparent that Spadolini decided to effect some small changes in the text of the article, and attach it to a confidence vote. Undecided members of the coalition parties, faced with the choice of causing a government crisis, decided in favor of voting for confidence.

ENI CHIEF DISCUSSES SOVIET, ALGERIAN GAS IMPORTS

[Excerpts] Rome, 11 Dec (ANSA) -- The Italian State Petroleum Agency intends to confront the national energy needs by stepping up the importation of national [as received] gas, ENI's president Alberto Grandi told the lower house industry commission here. Speaking before the commission members on Thursday, Grandi maintained that his agency will fully implement the agreements on the importation of Algerian natural gas, and open other channels for the energy supply, including the controversial negotiations now under way for the construction of gas pipelines between Siberia, in the Soviet Union, and European nations, including Italy.

Beginning in 1985, Grandi said, "Italy must resort to sources outside the country to satisfy its energy needs for 7.5 to 9.5 billion cubic meters of natural gas a year more than the present supply." Grandi specified that at the end of this decade, natural gas should cover 19 percent of Italy's energy needs.

The ENI head also informed the commission that the "the negotiations with the Algerians for the price of gas and with the Soviet Union for the construction of gas lines present many difficulties." However, he noted "in the long experience already sustained in the sector of energy imports, the Soviet Union has shown itself to be a trustworthy partner in contractual terms." Speaking in favor of the gas imports from the Soviet Union, Grandi maintained that they would supply the necessary diversification to harmonize the composition of gas imports, which presently appear unbalanced in North Africa's favor. Backing up this statement, Grandi claimed that in 1985 gas imports will be provided for by North Africa for more than 50 percent of Italy's needs, without this hoped-for diversification.

Concerning the financial aspect of the negotiated agreement with the Soveit Union, Grandi emphasized that ENI is following the explicit indications of the Rome government, and added that the conditions which would be "financially acceptable" to Italy are also those practiced by the other European nations interested in the Soviet Union gas.

RAMALHO EANES, FRENCH PRESIDENT HOLD TALKS

Eanes Speech Reported

LD120246 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Excerpt] French President Francois Mitterrand arrived in Lisbon this afternoon, accompanied by Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson, Andre Chandernagor, minister delegate to the Ministry of External Relations for European affairs, and Minister of Women's Rights Yvette Roudy.

This afternoon, the French head of state held talks with Ramalho Eanes in Belem Palace which lasted for 1 and 1/2 hours. The two presidents discussed, among other subjects, the issues of southern Africa, Portugal's integration into the EEC, the Middle East and the situation of Portuguese emigrants in France. Tonight, the French president was the guest of honor at a banquet hosted by Ramalho Eanes at Ajuda Palace. Here is a report by Joao Paulo Diniz:

[Begin recording] The speech delivered by President Eanes at the banquet has just come to an end. We strive for a world imbued with a spirit of greater solidarity where man may gain his universal dimension, free from poverty, violence and oppression. We shall therefore contribute to the building of such a world. With these words, President Ramalho Eanes addressed himself to his French counterpart at a banquet in his honor here in Ajuda Palace tonight.

In another part of his speech, the president said that Europe is the key region for the preservation of world peace which is built on the basic foundations of the geopolitical balances and on the maintenance of geostrategic balances. In this context, Eanes said, Europe is not a passive entity, a stage for movements and operations where others can impose the words on the actors and restrict, in simplistic and exclusive terms, the staging of alternatives. Europe, the president concluded, has an identity of its own and a specific power which ensure an autonomous role in the system of international balances.

That was significant passage of President Ramalho Eanes's speech. The president also referred to NATO, the EEC and the new international economic order, pointing out that it would be deceptive to believe that the latter can emerge by means of a mere signing of agreements. In his speech, Ramalho Eanes also mentioned the Portuguese emigrants in France, underlining in this connection the political guarantees given by the French Government and by Francois Mitterrand himself. [end recording]

Mitterrand Responds

[Excerpts] French President Francois Mitterrand was tonight the guest of honor at a banquet hosted by President Ramalho Eanes. For a report on Mitterrand's impromptu speech, here is Gabriel Correia:

[Begin recording] We have no contentious issues with Portugal, nor past problems to settle -- to how many countries can we say the same? With this sentence, President Mitterrand sought to sum up the present state of relations between France and Portugal and, on the other hand, the spirit in which his visit is taking place. Mitterrand's 50-minute impromptu speech was extremely poetic and philosophic, but also very deep. He paid tribute to the Portuguese emigrants in France and their exemplary conduct as citizens and workers, and also reviewed other matters pertaining to bilateral relations.

He spoke about the African experience, of the colonial experience of both Portugal and France, stressing that at this moment both countries are committed to a new type of relations with their former colonies. Nearly at the end of his speech, Mitterrand again reiterated France's support for Portugal's accession to the EEC.

Examine Tripartite Cooperation

LD120416 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0100 GMT 12 Dec 81

[Text] The possibility of tripartite cooperation between Portugal, France and the Portuguese-speaking African countries was examined in Lisbon by Presidents Ramalho Eanes and Francois Mitterrand, the Portuguese news agency ANOP learned from diplomatic sources. The problem, the same source said, had already been discussed this year by Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Leonardo Matias, first in Paris and then in Maputo. This tripartite cooperation would entail French financial aid and the putting into practice of Portugal's experience in Africa. Such cooperation, the sources added, is already being effected by some private firms in the spheres of metallurgy, agriculture and livestock undertakings.

The same sources also said that Presidents Eanes and Mitterrand have examined the activities carried out in Lisbon and Paris by the movements opposed to the present regimes in Angola and Mozambique which culminated with the trip made by Jonas Savimbi, leader of the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, to Washington where he was received by President Reagan.

French Support for EEC Entry

[Excerpts] France's renewed support for Portugal's bid for EEC membership and the possibility of tripartite cooperation with the Portuguese-speaking African countries are the most palpable results of the visit that President Francois Mitterrand has just paid to our country.

During the 2 days of his official visit, Mitterrand had talks with President Ramalho Eanes, Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao and Foreign Minister Goncalves Pereira. He implicitly accepted Portugal's contention that our bid for EEC membership cannot be dealt jointly with Spain's. In effect, speaking yesterday at a dinner given in his honor by Eanes, Mitterrand stated that, unlike Spain's case, Portugal's entry into the EEC would not pose major economic problems to the community.

Pinto Balsemao, who had voiced concern on this score earlier in the week after his London talks with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, stated today that in the light of Mitterrand's speech it can be admitted that Portugal's entry into the EEC may take place in keeping with the set schedule. The matter was also raised at talks between Goncalves Pereira and his French opposite number Claude Cheysson, which were also attended by Finance Minister Joao Salgueiro.

Apart from his official contacts, Francois Mitterrand had breakfast today with the secretary general of the Socialist Party, Mario Soares. The two Socialist leaders took the opportunity for an exchange of views on the political situation in France and Portugal.

CALVO-SOTELO DEFENDS CABINET RESHUFFLE

PM111137 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 5 Dec 81 pp 3-4

[Juan M. Saez report on Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo's 4 December press conference in Madrid]

[Excerpts] Madrid — At his first press conference following the formation of the new government and the Council of Ministers meeting, Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo urged us all to forget the shadow of 23 February "as a cause of worry and anxiety," stating clearly that he does not intend to call an election before the scheduled date in 1983 and rejecting the socialist proposal of forming a government of national concentration, "because the fact that we are all involved in building democracy does not mean that we should do so in a confused manner." In his opening remarks the prime minister was keen to give an impression of tranquillity, confidence and strength on the government's part, as he explained the results of the latest cabinet reshuffle.

Socialist Offer: "Together But Not Muddled"

During the question and answer session, lasting over an hour, Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo reiterated several times the ideas already expressed in his opening address, always in a confident tone, with the intention of demonstrating a climate of normality and of aiming for sure solutions in the political near future.

[Question] What is your opinion of the socialist party's offer to form a government of concentration?

[Answer] First, the socialist party secretary general's remarks embodied a dramatic tone which I do not agree with: Spain's situation is one of normality amid difficult times. Second, there was a hasty appraisal of the government and, as is natural from an opposition leader, this appraisal is not positive. Third, there was an offer less clear than the one made 9 months ago -- but there was no offer of a coalition or government of concentration composed of several parties to deal with the situation: I have already said that, although times are hard, they do not justify the adoption of emergency measures. The times immediately following 23 February were even harder, and it was said then that such measures were inadvisable. My opinion now is still the same. To say that we must all build democracy together does not mean forming a muddled government in which various people defend differing interests. We would be creating a worse situation than the one we are trying to resolve.

UCD: "No More Loss of Votes"

[Question] It has been asserted that the formation of this government stemmed more from the desire to resolve your party's internal problems than from the country's general interests. Could you deny that or at least comment on whether the Suarez and "moderate platform" groups are likely to leave the UCD? Moreover, Fernandez Ordonez has said that this is a weak government.... If all this were true, would it not be a good reason for holding early elections?

[Answer] With regard to the first assertion, I would like to deny it quite categorically and very vigorously. I have sought the most capable people. It is natural for a single party government to draw from that party when a new government is formed: It would be illogical for the government to turn its back on the party which supports it. What is needed is harmony between them. It is true that I asked Oscar Alzaga and Miguel Herrero Rodriguez de Minon to join the government: personal, not political, reasons made them turn down my offer. The former told me of his desire to cooperate with the government's policy, which is why today I appointed him my adviser.

No Early Elections

I do not believe that there will be any future losses of votes in parliament. The UCD crisis is on the way to being resolved once and for all, and following the decisions that have been made I hope that no situation will occur that leaves the government in a minority and necessitates the calling of early elections. I am certain that no UCD member wants early elections, just as the opposition does not. Be that as it may, the constitution grants powers to the prime minister which I retain intact, but I confirm my determination not to use them. As for Mr Fernandez Ordonez' remarks, this is not a weak government; and the argument of the authority of remarks coming from Mr Fernandez Ordonez is not enough to prove the contrary. This is a government that will govern until the next elections, in 1983. As for the fact that Mr Fernandez Ordonez considers a government not including him weak or weaker than a government that does include him, that is another matter.

Trial Following 23 February: Slight Delay

[Question] Could you comment on what state of mind exists in the barracks and could you disclose when the trial of those accused of responsibility for the 23 February events will be?

[Answer] I have already said that we are living in difficult times, but I do not believe that we are living under threat of a military coup. We must all dispel this obsessive shadow of 23 February. There are no objective reasons to justify this anxiety, and I hope that the trial will take place as soon as possible, though, as is known, in Spain the civilian authorities are separate from the judicial authorities. Therefore the trial is not in the government's hands. If it were, I could give you a date for the trial right now -- and keep it. It is true that it will be somewhat later than expected, due to the slow progress in the latest investigations, but not much longer. It will be a few weeks late: If it was scheduled for January, it will be in February. It will create some inconvenience and I therefore ask everyone -- especially the media -- to cooperate in reducing this inconvenience.

Events in Corunna

[Question] Might the events in Corunna facilitate a sharper distinction between the military authorities and civilian society?

[Answer] I do not believe that a distinction between the military and civilians is a proper way to look at the situation in Spain. The events in Corunna are part of isolated events that occur in a normal society. The fact that certain individuals misbehave does not mean what you implied in your question.

Talks on the Law Organizing the Harmonization of the Autonomy Progress

[Question] Will there be any changes in the field of territorial administration, or do you intend to alter the policy pursued hitherto with a view to a greater rapprochement with the stances of the Basque and Catalonian autonomous governments?

[Answer] It is the government's intention to maintain the best possible relations with the established autonomous communities. I hope that the new minister will be able to make a little more progress in this direction than his predecessor. It is true that his predecessor does retain some authority on this subject, though Mr Arias-Salgado is now in charge of implementing this policy of territorial administration. I believe that the problems discussed by the Madrid government with the Basque and Catalonian autonomous communities' executive bodies have been of lesser real importance and of greater psychological importance. This does not mean that I want to minimize them, because I know what a decisive influence psychological factors have in the political field, but since they have no major real substance, they can be resolved, and it is with this good intention that the present government is beginning its tasks.

As far as I am concerned, the agreements on autonomy reached in July with the socialist party are ones to which I adhere. We will abide by them strictly, and I do not believe that this rules out a rapprochement with the Basque Nationalist Party and convergence and union. This rapprochement has already begun -- as soon as we formed what you call the new government, but which I consider a continuation of the previous one, and I believe that in the new climate that has been created in these relations it really will be possible to resolve some of the difficulties that have recently made these relations difficult. Mr Martin Villa is responsible for coordinating government policy and for representing the prime minister. [answer ends]

Last, the prime minister answered further questions from newsmen concerning topics including the university autonomy bill: "The government has decided that this bill should follow its normal course and emerge as the parliamentary majority decides fit"; the date for entry into NATO: "I hope that Spain will be a full NATO member in 3 or 4 months' time"; Spain's entry into the Common Market: "Early in the new year I will make a tour of the countries of the 'Ten' to expedite Spain's entry"; and the constitutional provision that requires the formulation of a new electoral law: "It requires an agreement with the other political parties, and therefore I cannot specify any dates; I am willing to conduct a dialogue on the subject."

BRIEFS

RESEARCH ROCKET -- The first rocket for scientific research will be launched from the (Arenosillo) base in Huelva between 18 and 23 December. It was conceived, designed and built by the Andalusia Institute of Astrophysics in collaboration with the Canary Islands Institute of Astrophysics. The project has taken years to complete and has cost some 30 million pesetas. The flight will last some 5 minutes, and its mission will be to study nocturnal luminescence. There are only two launch sites of this kind in Europe -- one in Huelva and the other in Kiruna, Sweden. Some rockets of this kind have been launched recently from Huelva, but it has always been a question of foreign researchers and equipment, never Spanish. REPEAT ELECTIONS SHOW SWING TO LABOR PARTY

[Rolf Kluge dispatch]

[Text] Oslo -- The reelection in the Troms and Buskerud districts has led to the first defeat for the Conservative party since the Storting election in September. The party lost its seat in Buskerud to the Labor party. This means that the Conservative party is reduced to 53 seats in the Storting while the Labor party now has 66. However, the Storting still has a clear nonsocialist majority, and the election will not affect the government's position.

The reelection in the two districts was due to certain irregularities discovered in the count last September. The result had also been so close that the irregularities could have had an effect on which party had won the eventual seats in the districts. The turnout in the election was 20 percent below that of the Storting election, and in the view of psephologist Prof Henry Valen this primarily affected the Conservative party. It was the young voters who remained at home, and a large part of the Conservative party's support is to be found among young people.

COMMUNISTS POSTPONE LEADERSHIP ELECTION

PM111141 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 7 Dec 81 p 28

[Excerpt] The Norwegian Communist Party [NKP] 17th national congress closed yesterday evening without a decision being reached on who should form the party's top leadership in the next period. The national congress decided to postpone the election of a chairman, deputy chairman and editor of the members' paper FRIHETEN until after the new year.

The election of the top party leaders was last on the agenda on the NKP national congress held in Oslo on Friday, Saturday and Sunday [4-6 December]. After a closed meeting of the party's newly elected National Executive, sitting Chairman Martin Gunnar Knutsen announced that the executive had unanimously decided to postpone the elections. The reason given was that there had been such major changes in the National Executive that it was felt that more time was needed to heal the divisions caused by the leadership intrigues.

According to the resolution, Martin Gunnar Knutsen, Deputy Chairman Hans I. Kleven and FRIHETEN Editor Arne Joergensen will continue in their present positions until the executive implements new elections at the end of January.

KIPRIANOU RETURNS; SATISFIED WITH TRIP RESULTS

NC111502 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] President Kiprianou has announced that Greek Prime Minister Papandreou will definitely visit Cyprus on 7 January. President Kiprianou made this statement at Larnaca airport on his return from visits to Bulgaria, Romania [as heard], France, the United States and Greece.

The president said there was absolute and full unanimity during his talks with Prime Minister Papandreou. President Kiprianou stressed the fact that there is real coordination -- as never before -- between the efforts of the Greek and the Cyprus Governments for the promotion of the Cyprus problem. The President said that during his visit to Athens he had telephone contact with President Karamanlis -- who is ill -- and briefed him on the results of his various contacts. In general the President expressed full satisfaction over the results of his contacts in the various countries he visited. He said: I cannot predict what the developments will be. This depends on whether the Turkish attitude will change. The restrained optimism that has been voiced, President Kiprianou said, is due to the fact that now there is greater understanding of the Cyprus problem and more decisive support from the Greek Government.

DENKTAS SCORES PAPANDREOU'S REMARKS ON CYPRUS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has reiterated that the Cyprus problem was created by the Greek Cypriots' efforts to destroy the two ethnic communities in Cyprus and the common state established by the two ethnic communities. Denktas was commenting on the remarks made by Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, who said the Cyprus problem is not a problem between the two communities, but a problem between Lefkosa [Nicosia] and Turkey, and that it is Greece's great national cause. Papandreou also said there could be no agreement if the Turkish troops were not withdrawn from the island.

Denktas said the Cyprus problem was created by the Greek Cypriots' efforts to destroy the two ethnic communities and the common state established by the two communities and by the resistance of the Turkish Cypriot people, who tried to prevent this destruction. Denktas added: As a result of this resistance, the Turkish Cypriot people's rights were protected and consolidated in the north of the island in the form of a federated state. The Cyprus problem will be resolved within the framework of these realities. These realities, which were accepted by the late Makarios, are in the form of four principles. The negotiations must be based on these four principles and must lead to the establishment of a federal system whereby the Turkish Cypriots can live in their own autonomous system in the north and where they can be responsible for their own security.

Denktas pointed out that Papandreou was talking of a return to previous conditions, as if these realities did not exist. He added that Papandreou was acting with the belief that the Waldheim initiative would lead nowhere and that this was encouraging the Greek Cypriots to be intransigent. Denktas stressed that by doing that, Papandreou was trying to create strife between the two communities for his own temporary prestige. Denktas also said that Papandreou was trying to blackmail Turkey and turn the world opinion on Cyprus in his favor.

Denktas said: All his efforts will prove useless, because the Turkish Cypriot community will protect its rights, its freedom, its land and its cause, and, with the help of the motherland, it will continue to protect them. Mankind and the UN principles (?guard) this. Papandreou will understand this.

Denktas charged that "Greece's great national cause" as described by Papandreou was simply an effort to annex the island to Greece. He added that the Cyprus problem arose because of these efforts. He pointed out that regardless of its government, Greece had always tried to do what Papandreou was now trying to do, and always under the guise of "the great national cause." Denktas said these efforts had caused disaster in Cyprus and inflicted great wounds on the Greek Cypriot community. [Passage indistinct]

IOANNIDHIS VIEWS RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN TALKS

NC131038 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 13 Dec 81 p 1

[Text] Mr Yeoryios Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot representative at the inter-Cypriot talks, spoke last night at a dinner at the Akamas Lions Club of Polis about the Cyprus problem, and referred to the current Cyprus developments. Mr Ioannidhis stressed: The viewing of the Cyprus problem within the framework of recent development leads to the following conclusions:

1. A new policy has been introduced in connection with the position of the Cyprus problem within the foreign policy of the new Greek Government.

2. It is not certain that the UN secretary general's evaluation will lead to progress in the dialogue.

3. The Greek Cypriot side will do everything possible for progress in the dialogue.

4. If during the coming few months the dialogue fails to be productive, its perpetuation will not be considered advisable.

5. Without a change in Turkey's stand or policy, the prospects for progress in the dialogue will be unfavorable.

On our part, we must embark on serious thinking. We must assess the current facts and the new prospects, which are developing, and must study and plan our future actions and course. We are at a very crucial and delicate phase of the Cyprus problem, and each decision or action by us must be examined and studied most carefully and collectively. Every possible effort must be exerted for a planned and carefully charted course. There must be wise and well-prepared actions by everyone.

The Cyprus cause is not an easy question. Thus, it should be viewed calmly, and we should proceed with patriotic action and make the right decisions. To win peace and life, to safeguard independence, consolidate our existence as a state and defend our people's human rights, all of us must proceed responsibly and be above partisan interests.

ATHENIANS DEMONSTRATE OVER POLISH SITUATION

NC132253 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Text] About 2,000 persons gathered this afternoon at the university entrance in Athens and demonstrated their opposition to the situation in Poland. These persons marched down Sindagma and Panepistimiou, 3 September and Khalkokondhili streets and then dispersed.

Unknown persons unrelated to the gathering broke a window at the offices of the Polish airways in Sindagma and the window of a shop selling Soviet products at 32 Stournara Street. This evening a home-made bomb exploded at the building that houses the Soviet commercial mission at 11 Kronos Street at Paleo Faliron. Unknown persons threw the bomb into the front yard of the building. Damage was caused by the explosion.

FOREIGN MINISTER DESCRIBES GREEK ROLE AT NATO

[Text] The Greek Government secured its firm positions on its national defense interests through the interventions made by the Greek side during the 2-day conference of NATO foreign ministers in Brussels. This statement was made by Greek Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos, who returned from the Belgian capital yesterday.

Concerning the protocol on Spain's entry into NATO, Mr Kharalambopoulos said Greece has made it clear that in no way will it accept any change of the status and operational control in the eastern Mediterranean and the Aegean because of Spain's entry. At the same time it was stressed that the Greek Government will decide when the protocol will be presented at the Greek Chamber of Deputies for ratification, which will finalize Spain's entry into the alliance.

KKE-INTERIOR APPROVES GOVERNMENT POLICY ON NATO

NC112120 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] A KKE-Interior statement stresses that the government statement regarding the process of disassociating from the Rogers agreement is positive and that it is on the correct path, provided that it is followed steadily in breaking away from NATO's military wing. In relation to the Turkish claims against us, the KKE-Interior statement stresses that Greece, together with strengthening its defense capability, must also look for guarantees in international fields, not unilaterally from the United States, but guarantees that can stop any threats or pending issues.

KKE Issues Statement

NC121422 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 12 Dec 81

[Text] A statement issued today by the KKE Central Committee Politbureau refers to the results of the NATO defense ministers meeting. In the statement, among other things, the KKE leadership stresses that in this meeting the Greek Government put forth, with adequate resoluteness, critical problems of our country's national security. However, under the pressures that were exercised, some backing down occurred, even in positions in the policy statement. The government, the KKE statement says, restricted the issue of our country's relations with NATO basically to the guarantees of our eastern borders. However, these guarantees, even if ultimately given, have no real value because NATO itself opposes our national independence and democracy and is undermining the Cyprus cause.

The KKE statement mentions that the government's effort to justify Reagan's zero-based proposal for intermediate-range missiles, which in fact it presents as its own inspiration, is in any case negative. This proposal aims at the acquisition of nuclear superiority by the United States and NATO. Furthermore, despite its reservations, the Greek Government cosigned the resolution for Spain's integration into NATO contrary to its previous assurances and its position for the dissolution of the two blocs.

The KKE Central Committee Politbureau believes that it is imperative for government policy to proceed toward the direction of the mandate given by the people through their votes for withdrawal from NATO, removal of the U.S. bases, and implementation of a nationally independent foreign policy. The national consensus, the support of the people and of their progressive forces in the government, the KKE statement concludes, can be guaranteed toward this direction. The KKE will strive consistently for implementation of this policy on the road for a true change, and it will give its decisive contribution to the building of popular unity around these goals.

MAVROS SUPPORTS PAPANDREOU PRESS STATEMENT

NC111111 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0500 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] [Former Center Union leader] Yeoryios Mavros, referring to Papandreou's press statement, said the Greek people feel particular satisfaction because the national issues were presented by the prime minister himself in a clear and emphatic way at the NATO conference. Mavros added that an alliance that remains unmoved in the face of threats and attacks by one of its members against another member has lost its credibility, has no moral value and cannot argue that it can protect its members from any foreign threat. It is the duty of all of us to support the government for the success of its policy, which protects our national interests.

PAPANDREOU, KIPRIANOU 11 DEC STATEMENTS

NC111437 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] Cyprus President Kiprianou left shortly after midday for Nicosia. Earlier he had a meeting with Prime Minister Papandreou. The prime minister's talk with the Cypriot president was of special significance. ERT [Hellenic Radio Television] reporter Aris Xipolitidhis reports:

[Begin recording] Both Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou and Cyprus President Spiros Kiprianou expressed restrained optimism at the course of the Cyprus problem following their meeting at the Maximos Mansion at 1000 today. At first the two leaders had a private talk which lasted 1 hour and 45 minutes. This was followed by a conference attended by Cyprus Foreign Minister Rolandhis, Greek Deputy Foreign Minister Papoulias, Greek Ambassador in Nicosia Zakharakis and Cyprus Ambassador in Athens Khatzimiltis. Immediately after the conference Prime Minister Papandreou made the following statement:

[Papandreou] I personally, as well as my colleagues, have been particularly pleased to welcome again our dear president of the Republic of Cyprus, Mr Kiprianou. Our meeting today was of special significance because Mr Kiprianou is returning from a long trip -- a trip to Bulgaria, Hungary, Paris, New York and Washington. I myself have just returned from an important visit to Brussels. We exchanged information, and it is clear that this information coincides fully with the appraisals of the Cyprus problem -- in connection with the Cyprus problem, its current prospects, as well as the joint, coordinated strategy that will lead -- we hope -- to a fair and permanent Cyprus solution.

I must stress that during our trips we were in telephone contact -- both Paris, Washington or wherever Mr Kiprianou was. As you know, the discussions on the Waldheim ideas are continuing. We believe that now the procedure will be stepped up. It is clear that if these discussions, negotiations, fail to be productive, this does not mean the dialogue ends there. Our view is that there must be a concrete indication that the dialogue, after so many years, is beginning to lead to fruitful, productive results. If, or course, it becomes obvious — naturally within a short time -- that this is not possible, that the dialogue is not suitable any that the dialogue is not fruitful, then, of course, there will be other moves, such as a fresh recourse to the UN General Assembly.

I can say that at least my impression -- and I believe that of President Kiprianou as well -- is that there are somewhat more optimistic prospects now than in the past. But I wish to stress that this optimism is restrained, that we should not forget even for a moment our long-term goals for an independent, united Cyprus, for a Cyrpus where there will be freedom of settlement and freedom of movement for all -- for a Cyprus within the framework of which the refugee problem will be solved -- for a Cyprus primarily and mainly without foreign troops.

[Xipolitidhis] Addressing the president of the Republic of Cyprus, Mr Papandreou said:

[Papandreou] Mr President, I am particularly happy because today we had the opportunity to exchange views and I wish again to assure you that Greece is on the side of your struggle and that we will do everything possible to achieve our joint goal for a free, independent, nonaligned and united Cyprus.

[Xipolitidhis] The president of the Republic of Cyprus stated: [Kiprianou] I would like to express my great joy because I again had the opportunity to meet with my dear friend, the prime minister of Greece, Mr Andreas Papandreou, and to exchange information and views in connection with the recent contacts we both had abroad. Mr Papandreou has already referred to these contacts. I share his conclusions. What I would like to stress is the fact that at this moment there is, as never before, a coordinated, to a large extent, effort by the Cyprus Government and the Greek Government to promote a fair Cyprus solution. I believe these contacts have given a correct picture to the people we have talked with, both in connection with what we expect and what should be done with regard to Cyprus. We do not know what the results will be, but I share Mr Papendreou's view that restrained optimism for the future is justified.

As for the dialogue, the prime minister has already explained that the UN secretary general's evaluation which we discussed during our last meeting has not been accepted as a basis for negotiations, but simply for discussion, since we -- the Greek Cypriot side -- already put forward our views on its negative and positive elements during the dialogue. We will have a discussion in a new effort -- always based on the UN resolutions and the summit agreements -- to find out whether substantive progress is possible. So far there has been no progress in the dialogue. As the prime minister said, if, within a reasonable period of time, again there is no progress and if there were progress (?that is not) the result of any evaluation by the UN secretary general but the result of a change in the Turkish attitude, then definitely we cannot maintain forever an unproductive dialogue or an unproductive procedure.

With the recent contacts in New York, as well as during earlier contacts, we have already secured the possibility for a UN General Assembly debate on the Cyprus problem within the framework of this year's session, which will be reconvened for this purpose when we ask for it.

Moreover, both the Greek and the Cyprus Governments will continue -- with all the means at our disposal -- the effort for the internationalization of the Cyprus problem. In this way we can arrive at a point where Turkey will finally feel the pressure of international society and will abandon its policy.

I would like to stress again the fact that there is full unanimity and coordination between the two governments. Our personal contacts with the prime minister have so far had excellent results. We await him in Cyprus so we may continue today's conversation. I hope this will be very soon; in the beginning of the new year. And finally I would like to thank him for his friendship and his so-sincere cooperation.

[Papandreou] Thank you, Mr President. Good struggle and [words indistinct].

[Xipolitidhis] Immediately after the meeting and the talks he had with Prime Minister Papandreou, President Kiprianou left for Cyprus. [end recording]

ATHENS RADIO TO BEGIN BROADCASTS IN ARABIC

NC122120 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 12 Dec 81

[Text] ERT [Hellenic Radio-Television] will broadcast news in Arabic. Mr Maroudhas, deputy minister to the prime minister in charge of press affairs, has stated that Arabic will be added to the radio's foreign-language broadcasts in English, French and German. He said Arabic is one of the five official UN languages and is spoken by over 100 million people.

Mr Maroudhas further said that the news in Arabic will fill a considerable void which is becoming progressively more noticeable with the continuous expansion of Greek-Arab relations and exchanges as well as with the Arab countries' increasing role in international affairs. Moreover, the deputy press minister pointed out, in the last few years the number of Arab visitors to our country, both tourists and businessmen, has increased spectacularly.

TURKMEN RETURNS FROM BRUSSELS, RAPS GREEK MOVES

TA121639 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 12 Dec 81

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who has returned from the NATO Ministerial Council meeting in Brussels, has criticized Greece's attitude at the meetings, saying: We hope Papandreou will assess well the policy he is pursuing and will not make errors.

In a statement at Esenboga airport, Turkmen said the NATO Ministerial Council meetings were positive. He said one of the most significant aspects of the meetings was the acceptance of Spain's application for membership, adding that this should be considered an important development in the history of the alliance. Turkmen also noted that the issue of international terrorism was discussed at the meetings, and that a communique was issued on the subject. Regarding the NATO defense ministers meeting held prior to the Ministerial Council meeting, Turkmen said: Greece portrayed an irresponsible attitude concerning the whole of the alliance. Greece's attitude, which was irresponsible and detrimental from the viewpoint of NATO, persisted at the foreign ministers meeting as well. Although this attitude did not go as far as blocking the way to a communique, as was the case at the defense ministers conference, Greece did not refrain from manifesting this attitude which does not [words indistinct] against Turkey. It should be noted that Greece's attitude is not connected with Turkey; it is also (?contrary) to the basic political philosophy of the alliance.

In answer to a question, Turkmen said: The policy to be pursued in the face of a neighbor which does not want negotiations is clear. The honorable Papandreou should know that problems cannot be solved unilaterally and though faits accompli. We, in accordance with our policy, will force Greece to negotiations. To another question on the same issue, Turkmen answered: If Greece is able to live with the existing conflicts with Turkey, we can certainly live with them too, but they will bother us less.

Bayulken: No Concessions

TA122039 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 12 DUc 81

[Text] National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken has said that Turkey's peaceful, prudent attitude in accordance with international law does not signify that it will make concessions from its legal rights. Bayulken added that both friends and enemies should be aware of this fact.

Bayulken, who attended the NATO European group and Defense Planning Committee winter meetings in Brussels, and Deputy Chief of the General Staff Necdet Oztorun, who attended the Military Committee meetings, returned to Turkey this evening.

In a statement at Yesilkoy airport, Bayulken said Greek Prime Minister and Defense Minister Papandreou adopted an unnecessary attitude during the meetings, as if a Turkish-Greek issue existed: thus a Greek issue was created within NATO. Noting that Papandreou's attitude was regarded as strange by other NATO countries, Bayulken added that Turkey believes the problems should be solved through peaceful and constructive talks. Moreover, friends and foes should know that our peaceful and prudent attitude in accordance with international law does not signify that Turkey will ever make any concessions from its legal rights, he said.

Turkey believes the preservation of NATO, its harmony and its defense and deterrent power is important. This is how NATO has prevented a war in Europe and in the world. Therefore we want to eliminate actions -- regardless of who initiates them -- that weaken NATO. The fact that our neighbor and ally, Greece, thinks negatively does not change Turkey's views concerning NATO.

In conclusion, Bayulken said: We have no doubt that Papandreou -- as has been the case with previous Greek Governments -- will eventually realize that there is no way other than negotiations for the solution of the problems between our two countries. Therefore, we hope Greece will assess the situation and will not damage NATO's harmony further.

FOREIGN MINISTER ASSESSES DEVELOPMENTS IN POLAND

LD140810 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Text] A comment by Minister of Foreign Affairs Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb: The Belgian Government believes that the situation in Poland is unquestionably serious, and we have expressed our concern and anxiety. It is a Polish internal affair, and in our opinion the Poles should settle their problems through their own forces, without any external intervention. The minister went on to express his hope that the events which will unfold will respect human rights and the principles of the Helsinki Final Act. Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb said furthermore that he was beginning consultations today with our European and Western partners and that he has asked to meet with the Polish ambassador in Belgium. The minister of foreign affairs also advises those who wish to send food assistance to Poland to suspend any shipments for the moment, given the uncertainty that the recipients will receive it or that it will be distributed normally.

MALTA

HEAVY TURNOUT FOR GENERAL ELECTION REPORTED

NC131925 Valletta Radio Mediterran in English 1835 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Text] Valletta -- Counting of votes in Malta's general elections is continuing amid strict security at the former air force barracks at (?Halfa) and first indications [word indistinct] late today whether the ruling Labor Party under Dom Mintoff has held off a challenge from the Nationalist Party led by Eddie Fenech Adami. The opening of ballot boxes and counting of votes was delayed until 0800 due to security measures. Troops sealed off the (?Halfa) area and refused to let unauthorized people within 2 miles of the former barracks after the 706 ballot boxes arrived for the counting.

After fears of possible election violence, officials said there had been no incidents during the voting. All the signs point to a record poll as only a small percentage of the island's 230,378 registered voters were reported to have stayed away from the polls. Long queues formed outside many polling booths before they opened yesterday and voting continued [word indistinct] all day long until (?10) p.m. The counting, which is being supervised by members of the election committee and representatives of both parties, will go on around the clock until the last results on the Malta's proportional representation system is declared, possibly tomorrow. The election to the 65-seat parliament was contested by 228 candidates. Labor won 34 seats and the Nationalists 31 in the last elections in 1976.

COMMUNIST, SOCIALIST PARTIES COMMENT ON POLAND

[Text] Amsterdam, 14 Dec (AFP) -- The Dutch Communist and Socialist Parties today condemned the declaration of a state of siege in Poland. In a statement issued today, the Communist Party said that the declaration "demonstrates the bankruptcy of the Polish Communist Party which has now blocked the push for renewal expressed by the people and the unions." The statement charged the Polish Communist Party with "turning to the use of detestable military measures instead of following a path of political solutions achieved through democratic means." The party's spokesman said that the party would support all actions and demonstrations directed against the turn of events in Poland. Meanwhile, the Socialist Party, which is a member of Prime Minister Andreas van Agt's coalition government, was organizing a demonstration at the Polish Embassy in The Hague today to protest the military rule in Poland and the arrests of union leaders. Other Dutch parties have promised to support the action. "Fundamental liberties such as freedom to unionize and freedom of expression had been violated," party International Secretary Maarten van Traa said.

FOREIGN MINISTERS 'CONCERNED' ABOUT POLAND

[Text] Common Market foreign ministers are "concerned" at the crisis in Poland, according to a statement issued by them in London today. But the statement on behalf of the 10 major West European powers struck observers as mild. Without naming the Soviet Union, it said ministers looked to countries that had signed the Helsinki agreement to refrain from interfering in Poland's internal affairs. Mr Nicholas Fenn, the chief British Foreign Office spokesman, said after the ministers' meeting at Lancaster House that the statement was "unanimous."

In expressing concern, it also mentioned "the imposition of martial law and the detention of trade unionists," but Mr Fenn was unable to say why the foreign ministers did not call for the release of the trade unionists. Also, it did not refer to West European aid to Poland. In contrast, the USA has already announced that it is suspending future food aid. Mr Fenn said a great deal of West European aid was still in the pipeline, and he knew of no policy changes. The full text of the statement was:

"The foriegn ministers of the member states of the European Community are concerned at the development of the situation in Poland and the imposition of martial law and the detention of the trade unionists. They have profound sympathy for the Polish people in this tense and difficult time. They look to all signatory states of the Helsinki Final Act to refrain from any interference in the internal affairs of the Polish People's Republic. They look to Poland to solve these problems herself, and without the use of force, so that the process of reform and renewal can continue. Foreign ministers of the Ten are continuing to follow events in Poland with particular attention, and agree to remain in close consultation on this question."

ISRAELI DECISION ON GOLAN HEIGHTS DEPLORED

[Text] Common Market foreign ministers today "strongly deplored" Israel's decision to take over the Golan Heights, seized from Syria in the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. The ministers, who discussed the issue last night, issued a strongly worded statement after their meeting at Lancaster House, London, today. According to the statement, they "strongly deplore" the Israeli decision, which was described as "tantamount to annexation." It was "contrary to international law, therefore invalid in our eyes." The statement said the Israeli act prejudiced the possibility of implementing UN Resolution 242 on the Middle East, which has a section on "the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war." The action was also bound to complicate further the search for a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East, to which the ministers remained committed. The statement is likely to create new antagonism between the Israeli Government of Mr Begin and the West European powers. Relations between the EEC and Israel this year have not been comfortable, and the statement could have implications for the decision of four Common Market countries, Britain, France, Italy and Holland, to contribute troops to a Sinai peace-keeping force next year, when Israel withdraws from the area as part of the Camp David peace process. The full text of the statement reads:

"The foreign ministers of the member states of the European Community strongly deplore the decision of the government and Knesset of Israel to extend Israeli law, jurisdiction and administration to occupied Syrian territory in the Golan Heights. Such an extension, which is tantamount to annexation, is contrary to international law and therefore invalid in our eyes. This step prejudices the possibility of the implementation of Security Council Resolution 242, and is bound to complicate further the search for a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East to which we remain committed."

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON TALKS WITH HONECKER

DW141539 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1858 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Hans-Joachim Reiche interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on 13 December; place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Have German-German relations changed as a result of this visit?

[Answer] I think that in the course of the next months, next year we will see that it has had a positive influence both in the GDR and here. We will especially see this when Honecker will pay us a return visit in the not too distant future. I hope very much that the way we dealt with each other will influence many other Germans in leading positions in the governments and administrations of both sides, but I also hope it will influence public and published opinions.

[Question] In the scope of the present world-political situation the central topics discussed during this visit clearly were disarmament and human relations. Regarding the latter problem of human relations, aren't you leaving the GDR somewhat disappointed?

[Answer] No, on the contrary, I said earlier that I had no intention of concluding agreements and treaties. Let me remind you that the basic treaty which is the most important basis of relations between the two German states -- other bases are the four-power agreement and the Helsinki Final Act -- that the basic treaty was concluded roughly 2 years after the Erfurt and Kassel meetings.

[Question] So you also expect this visit to have effects on the sphere of human relations?

[Answer] Certainly after some time, yes.

[Question] The other major topic was disarmament. You agreed in your joint wish for peace, but disarmament itself was a much more difficult issue because you start from different positions. Mr Honecker thinks that there is a balance of military forces in Europe. You don't say this. You see a problem in the SS-20's. On the basis of such substantial differences, how can anything be done for disarmament which is a joint goal of both states?

[Answer] What is very important in my view is that both of us not only avow peace abstractly and theoretically and that each one believes that the other is serious about his efforts for peace but we both are also aware very concretely that the territory of our two states and the almost 80 million people living in our two states would be affected most of all by a war, if peace cannot be preserved. This legitimates the FRG and the Federal Government and me toward our Western allies as well as our Eastern neighbors to exert influences on the basis of our own existential interests. We do this. I am under the impression that Mr Honecker also brings his influence to bear. Neither of us is a negotiating power in Geneva or elsewhere where nuclear arms are discussed. We both are nonnuclear states, but we both signed the nonproliferation treaty. In this treaty we have bound ourselves not to acquire, produce, possess and proliferate nuclear weapons. This treaty entails a demand for both of us. In article 4 the nuclear powers for their part bind themselves to bring about a reduction and disarmament in the nuclear field. This demand is advocated by both of us. I do not have to report on the way Mr Honecker does this within the Warsaw Pact, but I am convinced that he does advocate it.

[Question] You extended an invitation. You anticipate consequent effects of this meeting. Doesn't the date of a visit by Mr Honecker to the Federal Republic necessarily depend on whether such effects have taken place? In other words, should the date for his visit be so soon?

[Answer] I wouldn't say it this way. But I will not disclose that I would be happy if Mr Honecker came after a year or so to northern Germany, to Hamburg perhaps, to the Saarland perhaps with a detour to the place where he was born, just as I went to Guestrow this time. I could well imagine this. No, I would not make it dependent on whether a number of new agreements are concluded prior to his visit. By the way, some of the things that have to be decided are decided autonomously or independently -- whatever you want to call it -- by the government of the respective state and do not require an agreement. But I would welcome it if at the next meeting some accords could be signed on the problems we broached here.

CHANCELLOR: NO EXTERNAL INTERFERENCE IN POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government is following events in Poland with interest "and great concern," Chancellor Helmut Schmidt told leading politicians of the SPD and FDP coalition parties on Monday. As Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told a press conference afterwards, Schmidt summed up the situation in Poland in three points: First, it is important that the crisis be kept under control; second, it is important that the reformist course in Poland be adhered to; third he expressed the wish that Poland resolve its problems itself, without the use of force and without external interference, on the basis of consensus through compromise.

The Federal Government will continue to maintain the policy of strict noninterference and hopes that all signatories of the Helsinki Final Act will behave likewise, Schmidt said. Current assessments of whether the Military Council of National Salvation will continue the reformist course are not available, since they are not "a matter to be summed up within hours," the government spokesman said.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH POLISH CHARGE D'AFFAIRES

LD141522 Hamburg DPA in German 1004 GMT 14 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government is following with "sympathy and concern" the developments in Poland. Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher explained this on Monday to Polish Charge d'Affaires Miroslaw Wojtokowski. The diplomat requested the conversation at the Foreign Ministry in order to explain the military council's measures and to stress their temporary nature.

The charge d'affaires asked the Federal Government for understanding of the fact that his country has had to act thus to overcome an internal crisis "and in the interests of international peace and security in Europe," relations with the FRG should continue unchanged. Genscher expressed the hope that Poland may resolve its problems without the use of force and without external interference.

ETHNIC GERMANS CONTINUING TO LEAVE POLAND

LD093215 Hamburg DPA in German 0818 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] Goettingen, 15 Dec (DPA) -- Even after the imposition of martial law, the Polish authorities are still allowing ethnic German or German resettlers to leave the People's Republic unhindered. The director of the Friedland transit camp, Albert Schulz, said today in response to questioning: "We have as yet had no indications of an exit ban." On Monday a total of 230 resettlers from Poland were registered in Friedland, the majority of whom had crossed the border by train only after the state of martial law was proclaimed. This morning, numerous individuals and groups were again on their way to the camp.

According to the camp director, travelers with visitors' visas, who had already been in the Federal Republic for several days, also arrived in Friedland yesterday.

Because of the uncertain situation in Poland they now wanted to be registered, said Schulz. According to the German Red Cross, of the 1.2 million Germans or ethnic Germans still living in Poland about 200,000 have requested permission to leave.

GENSCHER DISCUSSES SPAIN'S ENTRY INTO NATO

DW141337 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0647 GMT 11 Dec 81

["Excerpt" from correspondent Kroenig interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Brussels; date not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Is there a minor crisis in NATO, as some observers say? Would you be inclined to share this view?

[Answer] Definitely not. Let me take up the different subjects separately. What happened was that all member states welcomed Spain's application for membership. We believe that it is a good decision on democratic Spain's part to cooperate in an alliance which is particularly bound by the goal of outwardly securing the democratic liberties of its citizens.

[Question] This means only democratic Spain. A putsch by the military people makes this null and void.

[Answer] Quite generally we advocate the view that this alliance is not an alliance devoid of values. This does not, however, apply to Spain alone. This holds true for all states. This is also the reason why the member states urge Turkey to return to democratic conditions as soon as possible. I believe this to be a commitment which all member states must fulfill.

[Question] Still, the United States takes a somewhat different approach to this matter. While the European NATO members freeze some funds for Turkey in the EC the United States is doing the opposite.

[Answer] What we are doing in the European Community is a decision which we made as members of that community. What matters is not and cannot at all be payments by European NATO members because the members of the European Community also include, Ireland, for example, which is not affiliated with NATO. No, what we have here quite clearly is the determination of the countries which were present to actually approve Spain's application by signature, as it was done yesterday, because we believe that democratic Spain constitutes an enrichment to the Atlantic alliance as well.

[Question] But as I said, only democratic Spain.

[Answer] Well, had Spain not returned to democracy its application would have neither been filed nor accepted, I'm sure. But let me repeat: It would be wrong to see the commandment of democracy for Spain alone. It is applicable to all NATO member states. No special legal provision must be created for any one country.

[Question] The U.S. negotiator in Geneva who conducts the negotiations with the Soviets on the nuclear medium-range weapons in Europe has informed the NATO foreign ministers. Did you gain the impression that these negotiations are well on their way?

[Answer] I had suggested that Mr Nitze come here to Brussels because the negotiations with the Soviet Union on the medium-range missiles had also been prepared by the alliance as a whole. This makes it evident that we in the Western alliance consider these negotiations a matter concerning all member states even if the United States is the only one sitting at the negotiating table.

The report of the U.S. chief delegate corroborated our view that these negotiations definitely allow the assumption that they will lead to results.

In any event, what we derived from his report was that both sides, the United States as well as the Soviet Union, go to the negotiating table in earnest and also seriously tackle the subject matter of the negotiations. I believe that this is important indeed, and this meeting here on the whole has been marked very much by the efforts for cooperation, negotiations and arms control with the East at large and with the Soviet Union in particular.

This is illustrated by the broad room we accorded, beyond the discussions on the negotiations on medium-range missiles, the conference on security and cooperation in Europe where we, through the support of Austria's proposal, intend to make another start to achieve the convening of a European disarmament conference after all.

This also holds true, however, for the interest which we demonstrate in the U.S. proposals concerning the strategic weapons for the negotiations with the Soviet Union when they will begin next year, namely, not only fixing a ceiling for these weapons but, on the contrary, reducing the weapons on both sides -- U.S. and Soviet alike. And this holds true for the great interest devoted to the Vienna negotiations where the reduction of conventional forces is at stake.

So if you would ask me what the signal is that emanates from Brussels the answer can only be that it is a signal of readiness for constructive cooperation with the Soviet Union. This may also be the reason why so much interest was mustered for the meetings which we had in Bonn with Soviet General Secretary Brezhnev and Foreign Minister Gromyko. I reported on these meetings in great detail. Equally keen is the interest in the trip which the chancellor undertakes to the GDR today. It is understood among our allies here that we as Germans regard these talks with the GDR as our contribution toward European peace policy.

[Question] Isn't there some distrust -- speculations of that nature sometimes can be heard particularly from France -- that this might spell inter-German rapprochement at the expense of Western integration?

[Answer] No, definitely not. They know that we are a solid component of the Western alliance and of the European Community. But they also are aware that the Federal Republic of Germany has always had the goal of contributing toward stability in Europe through cooperation not only with the GDR but also with the other Warsaw Pact states including the Soviet Union.

[Question] Let me ask you another question about the Geneva negotiations. In addition to what you hear from the U.S. side, do you, as the Federal Government, plan to inquire with the Soviet about the state of the negotiations, following the motto: it is better to check?

[Answer] Well, I think that it is not in keeping with either the state of facts or our status just to prepare the mandate for negotiations. It is also true that the current state of the negotiations is being judged in the disarmament group of the alliance. We arenot the kind of people who ask others to make sure. During the visit by Mr Brezhnev, however, we made one thing plain: just as we, the chancellor and I, and the Federal Government at large mustered our whole influence on the Soviets, who said in late 1979 that they would not negotiate, to declare their readiness to negotiate after all in 1980, and just as we endeavored to have these Geneva negotiations materialize, we will do everything in our power also in the course of the negotiations to contribute on our part toward the attainment of the desired result of the negotiations, namely, the renunciation of medium-range missiles on both sides.

[Question] But this also means that you wish to be abreast of latest developments all the time, if possible.

[Answer] What matters is the information from the negotiations. We will obtain that as part of the Western disarmament group. What is important is the effort to make the Soviet Union perfectly aware of the seriousness of the Western will.

MILITARY COUNTERINTELLIGENCE RESHUFFLE PLANNED

[Article signed MS.]

[Text] Another reshuffle is forthcoming again at the top of the military counter-intelligence service (MAD) in Cologne. DIE WELT has learned that the incumbent head of this office, Brig Gen Klaus Vollmer, will leave on 1 February.

Under a decision by the Federal Defense Ministry, Vollmer is to be succeeded by naval Captain Schmaehling. Schmaehling (44) had been appointed chief of the department for current affairs [lage] and documentation in the MAD headquarters only a year ago. This is why staff members of the military counterintelligence service believe that the decision of the Hardthoehe had also been made under aspects of party politics. Incumbent office chief Vollmer, who will take command of a brigade in Koblenz, had taken charge of the Cologne office only in April 1980, succeeding General Komossa. Komossa had been preceded as chief of the military counterintelligence service until 19[illegible] by Brig Gen Albert Scherer.

PAPER VIEWS STRATEGIC SIGNIFICANCE OF SPAIN

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "What Spain's Membership Means for NATO"]

[Text] Brussels, 10 December -- With Spain's joining the Atlantic alliance a new geo-strategic power triangle has come about. If the entire Iberian Peninsula is incorporated into NATO, it would mean first that the land bridge to the Portuguese partner will have been established. Second, it would enlarge the alliance's maritime zone of influence. The NATO area would then include the Azores, Madeira and the Balearics. The strategic countercoast lies not only in the United States but also in Africa. Since the Spaniards follow their political tradition and maintain good relations with the Arab states, this partner can bring positive influence to bear on its Islamic neighbors to the advantage of NATO. Morocco as a conservative Muslim state comes closer to European policy.

Spain's incorporation into the Atlantic security system will upgrade the Portuguese partnership. With the Azores Portugal holds a strategic trump card. Lisbon permitted the United States in World War II to establish bases on the islands of Tercire and Santa Maria. Since 1951 Lajes is the great strategic basis of the U.S. Air Force. The Portuguese left it to the United States up to 1979 without asking any money for it. Now the United States pays $140 million annually for its use. In exchange for it, the Pentagon can fully use all installations.

Spain as a NATO ally does not add any more bases than it had so far as a bilateral partner of the United States. But it must be repeated: with membership in the alliance the Spanish-U.S. agreement achieves a European quality. With Torrejon, near Madrid, the greatest military air base of the old continent, the alliance as a unit will receive a base in the strategic depth which will be an ideal fallback area for all Atlantic air forces. Then Spain will add the Sanjurjo Airbase (near Madrid) to the alliance as well as Moron de la Frontera near Sevilla and the Rota naval and airbase near Cadiz.

The United States has used these bases since 1953. At that time one agreed on a "use time" of 20 years. The contracts had to be prolonged every 5 years. It had been outlined that the U.S. guests had to ask Spain if Washington planned to use the installations for military or political actions outside Europe. On 21 September 1981 the U.S.-Spanish treaties would have run out, but they have been prolonged for 8 months. Madrid and Washington believe that at that time NATO membership procedures will have been completed.

If Spain really became a member of the alliance prior to the 1982 spring conference, the special agreements on the limitation of common strategic interest zones outlined between Spain and the United States probably would be extended to include NATO. The two countries agreed in January 1976 on what naval and land areas common action could be planned. The first "interest zone" extends in the north up to the 23d degree of longitude and in the west to the 23d degree of latitude. It includes European as well as African spheres of interest. The second zone lies in the Mediterranean, extending from Gibraltar to the height of Sardinia. Spain appears here as a Mediterranean force with great interests in the operations of the U.S. 6th Fleet. Third, according to the treaties, the United States is directly involved in the protection of the Spanish mother country. This protection guarantee would be taken over immediately by NATO because the preamble says that an attack on the national territory of a member state must be considered an attack on the alliance.

It is still open as to how Spain will fit into NATO's military command structure. The alliance will meet the wishes of the new partner. It is already known that Spain will demand a "great high command" and that it will get it. This command will at once reflect the signficance of the newly created power triangle (Iberian Peninsula-the chain of islands-Norfolk, Virginia). But it will be also dominated by the difference in power. Portugal will play a subordinate role in the command scheme. Spain, with the greater land area, the stronger military power and the bastion giving the United States and NATO the most important bases, will occupy the post of commander in chief. But since Lisbon remains as the natural completion of the Iberian complex, and since the new pillar of the alliance would have no strategic effect without Portugal, it does not reduce the special role of the country. Portugal's close tie with Brazil means an extension of the Atlantic pact to the south Atlantic. This will also have an impact on the command structure of the new Iberian command.

The geostrategic significance of the Iberian Pensinsula must not obscure the view with regard to the military quality of the Portuguese and Spanish armies. Portugal's army has numerically decreased since the revolution. Along with the curtailment of armed forces an attempt was made to modernize the units. At present the Portuguese army has a strength of 27,000 men. Some 10,000 soldiers belong to the only mobile operative unit, the 1st Mixed Brigade. The other army troops are scattered over the whole country in brigades. They are only of limited use for military action because the units are poorly equipped. The small navy and the insufficient Portuguese Air Force are antiquated. If Portugal wants to bring more military and political influence to bear on Atlantic decisions, its general staff will have to radically change its way of thinking. In other words: Portugal must develop its navy and modernize its air force. The numerical strength of the army would have to be cut even more, and the military equipment supplied by the allies would have to be used more purposefully.

Spain will have to get its army accustomed to the Atlantic climate. After 1 year of colonial war, the Portuguese have an army showing amazing preparedness to become accustomed to the Atlantic systems of thinking. The Spanish Army, however, is a unit where only a small part of the officer corps has war experience, and this war experience is limited to civil war. As long as these memories still have an effect, it will be difficult to replace the political spirit of a civil war army with the Atlantic spirit. NATO officers must given priority to the military integration idea rather than a national approach. But most of all, NATO officers recognize the priority of politics. It is not yet clear how far the Spanish officers will be prepared to go to share this approach.

PRESS COMMENTS ON SCHMIDT-HONECKER TALKS, POLAND

'Grave Shadow'

DW141527 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 14 Dec 81 p 4

[Commentary signed DR.]

[Text] Only the fact that the Polish party and state leadership is trying for the time being to handle the conflicts in the country themselves, prevented the federal chancellor from deciding to make a premature end to the GDR visit.

Helmut Schmidt could withdraw to the formula of noninterference in other people's affairs. But even if the Warsaw Pact continued not to appear visibly, the Federal Republic cannot maintain that this was none of its business.

Developments in Poland have cast a grave shadow at the inner-German meeting at Werbellinsee and Doellnsee. They make relative Schmidt's remark that his talks with GDR Council of State Chairman Erich Honecker had created a piece of mutual predictability and confidence. Honecker is not directly responsible for developments in his Eastern neighbor country, but they bring influence to bear on his leeway of action. It is, therefore, even more unlikely than before that the GDR will soon be prepared to make concessions with regard to the compulsory exchange of currency or to travel. Schmidt's assessment was optimistic that one would have to reckon with a period of 12 months within which something could move.

And yet one cannot say that the meeting was superfluous or unfruitful. The frankness with which the chancellor talked in his toast about the need to have more things in common and more meetings beyond the border, was probably an encouragement for many GDR citizens who observed the visit through East and West television. Prerequisites have been improved for the Germans to profit from general East-West detente, although only in future.

'Tragic Crossroads'

[Harry Schleicher commentary: "Martial Law in Poland"]

[Text] Poland, which has been hit by history so often and so hard, again has arrived at a tragic crossroads of its development. Exactly 11 years ago the blood of the shipyard workers was flowing in the Baltic Sea towns, and now civil war is threatening the country again if the "Solidarity" leadership will implement what it had decided a day ago: general strike against emergency law legislation. A far more rigid form for solving the crisis has been picked now: the newly established "military council," the highest power organ, has imposed martial law on the country, banned the legal activities of the trade union for the time being, and arrested its leaders. For "Solidarity" it is a matter of to be or not to be.

Even if the words of the party chief in uniform, army Gen Wojciech Jaruzelski, sound differently, the phase of political renovation which was begun with so much hope in summer 1980 has come to an end now. For the first time in the history of communism the regime had to apply the means of military dictatorship to safeguard with sheer violence the rule over the working class announced by the party allegedly in the name of the proletariat. The further development of events will be very much characterized by whether the nation which has become politically self-confidence in the past 1 year and 6 months but increasingly tired due to chaotic developments, will be prepared to accept all this without resistance. Revolt and resignation are equally possible.

Although no secure prognosis can be made, it can be said that the Poles' tremendous striving for freedom together with their deep despise for the government, for which the incapable or corrupt leadership is solely responsible, has possibly suffered its most tragic setback. Now, since the Poles and the world are facing completed facts, it is almost futile to argue whether this development could have been avoided.

Developments in past months were characterized by an almost absolute erosion of every state authority, by the collapse of the economy, the deterioration of public morale and growing anarchist tendencies, making the regime consider the take over by the military as the last way out. Yet it must stated that the ruling and the ruled are responsible for it. The trade union leaders with a hot heart and not always a cool head occasionally have lost the sense for what was possible under existing geopolitical and political framework conditions. On the other hand, however, the ruling people were probably never honestly prepared, in contrast to the will of the people and despite tactical concessions, to share real power with the trade union. In view of this basic situation, confrontation was already mapped out.

Polish developments have brought up the great problem, not for the first time and probably not for the last, of whether communism can be reformed at all. The newest Polish lesson as well as the experiences of 1953, 1956, 1968 and 1970 seem to permit only a negative naswer. But social processes are of a more manifold character than they seem to be in moments of a national catastrophe. Despite the 1956 tragedy, Hungary recovered later on; and despite many setbacks the East bloc is no longer a structure of the late Stalinist epoch. Maybe Poland, too, will find its way at some time back to political and social normality. The thoroughness of the crisis and last but not least the bankruptcy of the country leave little hope for this being the case in this century -- with or without bloodshed.

NEW POLITICAL PARTY -- Frankfurt, 14 Dec (DPA) -- Dissatisfied former members of the SPD in Hessen want to form a new leftwing "Independent Social Democratic Party." Some 150 members of this grouping made this decision in Ruesselsheim on Sunday. Their spokesman, the former Frankfurt SPD local party chairman, Dieter Kellermann, said in Frankfurt on Monday a provisional executive with five spokesman, two secretaries and two treasurers had been elected and that it is to complete preparations for the final founding of the party by February. The group claims to have several thousand applications for membership in Hessen. [Excerpt] [Hamburg DPA in German 1012 GMT 14 Dec 81 LD]

TELEPHONE LINES TO GDR -- Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- One hundred twenty new telephone lines into the GDR and East Berlin will come into operation next Tuesday. The Federal Ministry of Post and Telecommunications said today that with this, the number of telephone lines between the FRG and the GDR would increase to 1,301, among them 938 for fully automated telephone traffic from West to East Berlin. At present over 91 percent of all calls to the GDR and East Berlin can be dialed by the subscriber. [Text] [Hamburg DPA in German 1258 GMT 14 Dec 81 LD]

CHEYSSON CLARIFIES REMARKS MADE IN JERUSALEM

[Text] Paris, 14 Dec (AFP) -- Any fresh Middle East peace initiative must come from the parties directly concerned and could not be imposed by European nations, French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson reaffirmed here today. The minister was speaking to a group of Arab journalists to "clear up" any misunderstandings over remarks he made in Jerusalem last week during a two-day visit to Israel. Mr Cheysson was reported then to have said that parts of the European Community's June 1980 "Venice Delcaration" on the Middle East were "absurd" because they took an anti-Camp David stance. The declaration (which called for Palestinian self-determination) has been hotly contested by Israel.

Today the French minister said Europe had never taken an initiative on the Middle East. It did not have the means to do so. It had, however, made a declaration of principle and was right to do so. He said there would be other Venice declarations which might go even further...but to pretend that Europe could take initiatives, that it could begin a peace process was not true, neither in the Middle East, Central America, nor in Africa. Mr Cheysson, who said he was to make a tour of several Gulf states in January, emphasised that France had never said that the Palestine Liberation Organisation was the sole representative of the Palestinian people. But it was essential to have dialogue with the PLO, he added. He said France disagreed with some of its European partners who said that the PLO should be asked to formally recognise Israel. However, Paris would like to see the PLO remove from its charter all phrases which called for the "disappearance" of Israel.

'New EEC Declaration' Foreseen

NC150700 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 0500 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] In Paris, Minister of State for External Affairs Claude Cheysson expressed his conviction that the EEC will issue a new declaration specifying its policy toward the Middle East expounding further on the Venice Declaration. He said that during his visit to Israel, he discussed the Palestinian issue and the issue of establishing a Palestinian state and that he was the first official to discuss this issue with Israeli officials. He said that he spoke about PLO leaders such as Yasir 'Arafat, Faruq Qaddumi and Na'im Khadr. He called on the parties concerned in the Middle East conflict to take the initiative to settle their own differences. After that comes the role of foreign forces to offer support and guarantees. He said that it is senseless to call on the PLO to recognize Israel because there is no Palestinian state. He stressed that his country will continue its contacts with the major countries in the Middle East.

ARMENIANS OCCUPY SWISSAIR OFFICE 15 DEC

GOVERNMENT, PARTIES WATCHING POLISH SITUATION

[Excerpt] The events in Poland continue to dominate the Italian political scene. Government, Parliament and the political parties have immediately and firmly condemned the threat to the process of democratic evolution that had been developing in Poland through the independent trade union. First Foreign Minister Colombo, in an address to the Senate foreign affairs committee, then Prime Minister Spadolini in the Chamber of Deputies, defined the government's position a position, Spadolini said, that can only, be one of regret, condemnation and concern over the deterioration of relations between Italy and Poland. Spadolini reaffirmed, that Italy is for a strict policy of noninterference in Poland's internal affairs and maintains that a solution to Poland's problems must be found by the Poles themselves. This does not prevent the Italian Government, he added, from expressing hope that a solution to the crisis may be found in an equitable settlement of the different issues. Colombo reported to the Senate committee along the same lines before leaving for an EEC meeting in London. President Pertini is also following Polish developments with apprehension and concern. This afternoon he had a long telephone conversation with Pope John Paul II, to whom he expressed his feelings of solidarity with the Polish people.

A unanimously negative assessment of the situation in Poland was expressed by all political parties, by the parties' youth organizations, by trade unions and employers' associations. Christian Democrats, Socialists and Social Democrats held special meetings of their leaderships. The Christian Democratic leadership passed a resolution submitted by Secretary Piccoli pledging the party to act in unison with the democratic and trade union forces for a mobilization aimed at the release of the trade unionists and other citizens who have been arrested and at the avoidance of any threat or danger of invasion, which could endanger world peace. A day of solidarity with the Polish people will be organized by the Christian Democratic Party and will be held simultaneously in several cities.

The Socialist leadership passed a resolution condemning the coup in Poland, denouncing police repression and asserting that the events of Saturday night risk political and civil chaos in the country and economic stagnation and extinguish the hope that the situation may be redressed by the people themselves or that a reform of the totalitarian communist system may occur. The Social Democratic Party leadership appeals to the country to condemn the coup by the Polish Government and communist party leadership and to express solidarity and support for Poland. Unions React [Excerpt] Rome, 15 Dec (ANSA) -- The leadership of Italy's big CGIL CISL UIL [as received] union federation called the situation in Poland very grave and pledged to do everything in its power to see to it that union liberties were restored there and the country put back on the road to democracy.

The three general secretaries of the federation, who Wednesday and Thursday will take part in a special session of the European Confederation of Unions (CES) in Brussels, were in full agreement as to what initiatives they would propose to the European body this week. The "CES" should move along two levels, in the view of the Italian union leaders: On the one hand, that of mass demonstrations, and on the other, pressure applied "on the governments of our countries" to make it perfectly clear how serious are the international consequences of events in Poland for the future of peace and detente.

Italian workers staged rallies up and down the peninsula Monday to protest the violation of political and union liberties in Poland and to show solidarity with Polish workers.

GOVERNMENT COMMUNIQUE VIEWS POLISH EMERGENCY

LD151014 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2330 GMT 14 Dec 81

[Text] The Council of Ministers held an extraordinary meeting today to discuss the developments in Poland. Afterwards Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa read a communique issued at the end of this meeting. Here he is reading the communique:

[Begin recording] The Council of Ministers, which takes the view that this is an international issue -- in that the developments in Poland are inseparable from the pressures which various Warsaw Pact countries have been exerting on Poland -- recalls that it has already conveyed directly to the Soviet Government the Portuguese Government's view that such interference in Poland's internal affairs in inadmissible. The Council of Ministers voices its concern over the possible development of events, recalling that two divisions of Soviet troops are stationed on Polish territory and that the Warsaw Pact forces had massed near that country's borders, which in itself was a form of pressure. Portugal will continue to follow the situation in close and constant touch with its partners in the Atlantic alliance and will participate in the formulation of any decision that the alliance may take. Finally, mindful of every people's right to self-determination, recognition of which is enshrined in the Portuguese Constitution, the Council of Ministers earnestly hopes that the heroic people of Poland will regain their freedom of expression and decision and will themselves resolve their problems and decide which political structures should rule their country. BA'TH PARTY DELEGATION ENDS VISIT; STATEMENT ISSUED

JN112044 Damascus Domestic Service in Arabic 1915 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] Damascus -- Comrade Zuhayr Mashariqah, assistant regional secretary of the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party, and his delegation returned to Damascus from Lisbon this evening following a visit of several days to Portugal at the invitation of the Portuguese Communist Party. A joint statement issued today on the outcome of this visit firmly condemned the aggressive military policy of U.S. imperialism and NATO reactionary forces which are plotting against the peoples struggling for their liberty and independence. The two sides condemned the Israeli decision to annex the occupied Arab city of Jerusalem and the Israeli practices in the Arab territories as well as the acts of oppression, suppression, violation of human rights and the establishment of settlements. The two sides condemned the strategic alliance between U.S. imperialism and Israel which constitutes a real danger to world peace in general and to Middle East peace and stability in particular. The two sides expressed their belief that raging war between Iraq and Iran contradicts the real interests of the Iraqi and Iranian peoples and their national liberation objectives. This war, the two sides believe, serves U.S. imperialist schemes to restore its control over the region. The two delegations also expressed their parties' solidarity with the valiant and daring struggle of the nationalist movement in Egypt. They condemned the imperialist provocative campaign against Libya and the imperialist onslaught on the revolutions of Iran and Afghanistan. The two sides voiced their solidarity with the progressive nationalist powers in Iraq and in the other Arab countries. They reconfirmed their support for the legitimate struggle of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America against imperialism, zionism, colonialism, fascism and racism. The two sides expressed their satisfaction with the promotion of relations of friendship and cooperation between their two parties. They stressed in this regard that they are determined to further bolster and develop these relations to serve their joint struggle and the interests of the Syrian and Portuguese peoples. Stemming from this, the agreement of cooperation between the two parties was renewed for the years 1982-83.

PRO-USSR PSUC MEMBERS SET UP PARALLEL LEADERSHIP

PM141139 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 6 Dec 81 p 23

[Text] Tension within the PSUC [Unified Socialist Party of Catalonia] seems to have reached the point of no return with the emergence of a "coordinating body" composed of prominent members of the "pro-Soviet" sector as an open challenge to the party's present leadership. The PSUC Executive Committee held an extraordinary meeting yesterday to discuss this event, which threatened an inevitable split in the party over its coming extraordinary congress.

Yesterday's extraordinary Executive Committee meeting was convened immediately after the news was heard that the "pro-Soviet" sector within the Central Committee -- "the 33," named after the group of members who have voted systematically against the majority line of the leadership -- had called a "mysterious" press conference of its own for tomorrow to formally denounce the party's coming extraordinary congress.

This step, however, follows from a number of recent meetings of the Valles Occidental and Baix Llobregat local committees at which an openly belligerent stance was adopted toward the party leadership and the sixth congress. The first of these meetings, which was attended by over 300 people, was chaired by Francisco Trives and addressed by Central Committee Member Felix Farre, recently penalized by the party for his polemical statements to the press. Andreu Claret described this meeting to newsmen as "completely irregular and out of order," condemning the attacks made by Trives and Farre on the policy of the PSUC leadership bodies.

In the Baix Llobregat party, Secretary General "Paco" Frutos himself was subjected to jeers and insults at a meeting chaired by Juan Muniz and Joan Ramos -- both PSUC Central and Executive Committee members -- who emphatically criticized the organization of the coming extraordinary congress. Apart from these events, mention should also be made of the debate recently organized by the Radio Obrera network, financed by the Catalonian National Workers Confederation, in which prominent party and Central Committee members, with Leopoldo Espuny as moderator, denounced the party leadership's policy line.

All these factors, which were presented to newsmen by Andreu Claret and examined by the Executive Committee, culminated in the formation of a parallel leadership body, which was condemned in very harsh terms yesterday by the PSUC secretary general himself, who claimed to have irrefutable documentary proof of the existence and fully organized functioning of this so-called "coordinating body," which he accused of trying to claim exclusive legitimacy on the basis of the fifth congress and of offering an alternative distinct from the political blueprint of the present party leadership.

"Coordinating Body"

According to information provided by Frutos, this "coordinating body" is composed of Pera Ardiaca -- who was elected chairman by the fifth congress -- and Josep ("Roman") Serradell as chairman and executive coordinator, respectively; Francesco Trives, organization chief; Santiago Dias and Felix Farre, finance chiefs; Chema Corral as propaganda chief; Maria Pera, municipal policy chief; Leopoldo Espuny, professional and intellectual relations chief; Alfred Clemente, workers movement chief; Joan Muniz, chief of relations with Baix Llobregat; and Joaquim Boix, Barcelona region chief. They are all Central Committee members and in some cases Executive Committee members too -- some of them prominent members of parliamentary committees and members of parliament, all of them identified with the party's "hardline" sector. Frutos described the event as a "serious violation of party rules" and "clear-cut splittist activity," sanctionable under party rules with the expulsion of those involved -- a measure which the Executive Committee will undoubtedly propose to the Central Committee at another extraordinary meeting scheduled for Wednesday. Xavier Foloch, who recently resigned from the Executive Committee, accompanied Frutos and other leadership members at the press conference given to explain the situation, as a demonstration of solidarity with the party's stance on the pre-congress campaign that has now been openly launched by the "pro-Soviet" sector.

PEACE MARCH TO USSR A POSSIBILITY FOR 1982

PM141339 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 1 Dec 81 p 34

[Text] A new peace march from the Nordic countries -- this time to Moscow -- might be possible as early as next year. So said Eva Nordland, lecturer at Oslo University and one of the people behind the peace march to Paris last summer. A couple of weeks ago Eva Nordland and a few other peace activists from Norway were in Moscow to discuss a possible peace march to the Soviet Union.

"In the course of a week we had talks with a couple of the largest peace movements in the Soviet Union?" Norland said. In her personal opinion the talks gave good results and the peace march was not the only alternative touched on. "We are also planning to hold congresses, seminars and other activities for peace together with the Soviet peace organizations," Nordland said. She was unwilling to make any statement about the date of a new peace march at present. Nordland is extremely hopeful that a march will take place. "The people who are the chairmen of the Soviet peace organization with whom we have been in contact are all members of the Supreme Soviet, and this would indicate that a march is possible," Nordland said.

FIRM CONCLUDES MAJOR CONTRACT WITH USSR

[Text] The Ostrobothnian firm of Oravais Hus will deliver a complete town for 4,000 inhabitants to the Astrakhan region near the Caspian Sea. The deal which was signed on Wednesday [2 December] is worth almost 200 million markkaa and will give Oravais Hus full employment for the next 2 years.

In the past Oravais Hus has been involved in three smaller contracts with the Soviet Union. The new project will undoubtedly be the largest in the company's history and will embrace town planning, architectural and heating, water and sanitation design as well as the supply of all the necessary materials. It is also expected that the project will shortly be widened to include the supervision of actual building work. The town in the Astrakhan region will consist of 55 buildings, including homes, schools and creches. Deliveries will be made during 1982 and 1983 and the size of the project will mean that Oravais Hus will have to take on an additional 25-30 employees.

BRIEFS

TRADE WITH POLAND -- During the first 10 months of this year, imports from Poland dropped by 20 percent, while Finnish exports to Poland dropped by 71 percent from last year's figures. Trade with Poland showed a deficit of 652 million markkaa for Finland. This year only 1.4 million tons of Polish coal have reached Finland, and supplementary deliveries are no longer possible at the end of the year. Polish authorities also informed Finland about a month ago that coal deliveries for next year will remain at this year's level. Finland does not have any big construction or other projects in Poland at present. [Text] [Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 14 Dec 81 LD]

POLITICIANS REACT TO FOREIGN MINISTER'S STATEMENT

[Morten Malmoe report: "117 Russian Aircraft Turned Away"]

[Excerpt] "Clarity and stability in foreign policy are important elements, so that Norway can be a reliable partner for its allies," Foreign Minister Svenn Stray said in the Storting yesterday.

Stray told the Storting that so far this year Norwegian aircraft have been obliged to intercept Soviet aircraft crossing Norway's borders 117 times. In his comments on Stray's first foreign policy statement Kaare Kristiansen (Christian People's Party) said that it was interesting and gave some clarity in respect of Norwegian security policy. In his statement the foreign minister placed major emphasis on disarmament and detente and pointed out that recently the West has shown restraint in its rearmament efforts, while the Soviet Union has been rearming. NATO's strategy has been that the West should offer not to deploy its missiles if the Russians in their turn dismantle theirs. This strategy has had some success. The Russians have now agreed to disarmament negotiations and it would be a mistake if NATO were forced to reconsider its modernization decision, the minister said, informing the Storting that so far this year Norwegian aircraft have had to take off 117 times in order to cut off Russian aircraft approaching too closely to Norwegian territorial waters. The foreign minister also said that the new government also attaches great importance to clarity and predicatability in foreign policy, so that Norway might be a reliable partner for our allies, neighbors and other states.

Labor Party leader Gro Harlem Brundtland said in a reaction that the foreign minister's statement did not contain any surprises. She pointed out that it is useful to note what the foreign minister did not include, and mentioned as examples the situation in Turkey and the Sakharov affair. However, it was Gro Harlem Brundtland's view that the foreign minister's foreign policy statement contained a number of pleasing elements. One of the things she stressed was that the foreign minister's account of the disarmament negotiations and the NATO dual decision gave a more subtle interpretation than had been given in the past.

"It was the clear goal of the previous government to bring about negotiations aiming at the nondeployment of the new medium-range arms. Now the foreign minister has indicated that the 1979 decision also presupposes a reassessment of deployment in the light of the actual results of the negotiations.

"There is also every reason to note that Foreign Minister Svenn Stray said that the debate in Europe has been of significance for the recent positive developments and for the formulation of the U.S. negotiating stance. This also seems to signify greater recognition on the part of the new government," Gro Harlem Brundtland said.

Christian People's Party Chairman Kaare Kristiansen, who is also chairman of the Storting foreign affairs committee, described the foreign minister's statement as interesting and said that it clarified some aspects of security policy.

"The lines Foreign Minister Stray drew up in his statement with regard to disarmament, defense readiness and the international problems raised in this context were clear and thorough. I think that it is extremely necessary for us to be given such clarification after all the uncertainty and confusion which have made themselves felt in this area in recent months," Kaare Kristiansen said, also pointing out that it would have been natural for the foreign minister to have devoted greater attention to the dissidents in the Soviet Union.

Liberal Party parliamentary leader Hans Hammond Rossbach said that the government should not put the plans for a nuclear-free zone in Europe on ice. Rossbach also said that the foreign minister was not clear enough about Norway's relationship with the EEC. Rossbach said that Stray should have attached greater importance to Norway's relations with the Third World than he actually did.

The Socialist Left Party's Stein Oernhoei directed the strongest criticism at Stray's statement, which he described as one-sided and lacking in new ideas. It was Oernhoei's view that the foreign minister's one-sidedness was shown most clearly in the description of the growing tension between the United States and the Soviet Union. In this connection Oernhoei accused Stray of having concealed the fact that the United States was unwilling to sign the SALT II agreement.

BARENTS SEA DEMARCATION TALKS WITH USSR RESUME

PM141237 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 8 Dec 81 p 3

[Text] On Monday (7 December) Norway and the Soviet Union opened a new round of negotiations on the demarcation line on the continental shelf in the Barents Sea. After the first day there was total silence surrounding the negotiations, which are being led by Ambassador Helge Vindenes on the Norwegian side and by Ambassador Boris Podserov for the Soviet Union. According to reports received by NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA, the negotiations opened with each side clarifying its position. This means that Norway is adhering to a solution based on the median-line principle, but is prepared to accept a certain amount of compromise. The Soviet stance is that the sector line should form the demarcation line in the Barents Sea.

SPLIT DEFENSE COMMITTEE PROPOSALS SUBMITTED

PM141459 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 2 Dec 81 p 7

[Text] Increased readiness, protection against nuclear arms and chemical weapons, a drastically improved health service for wartime and a new system of compensation for rises in running costs are the main points in the defence committee's recommendations. When the committee presented its final recommendations to the government on Tuesday [1 December] it was a divided committee which was taking action. The economic differences in the proposals from the Social Democrats, the Liberal and Center parties and the Moderate Coalition party are small, but behind the millions there are concealed deeper differences of opinion, especially with regard to the armed forces' future organization.

The moderates have followed the commander in chief's 5-year plan and therefore want to spend 16,980 million kronor in the period 1982-1987. However, primarily for economic reasons the Moderates dismissed the more costly plan, amounting to 17,420 million kronor, which the commander in chief had also investigated. The Social Democrats have proposed the lowest economic framework which the commander in chief studied -- 16,540 million kronor with additions for increased payments to conscripts. This additional money will be taken from the air force, the Social Democrats say, and want therefore to give less money to the air force than suggested in the commander in chief's study. The Social Democrats want to give the conscripts 30 kronor per day instead of the present level of 17 kronor. This will cost at least 100 million kronor per year. The other parties want to wait for the results of the commission on conscripts' pay which the government appointed recently.

The Liberal and Center pary members of the defense committee have proposed an economic framework of 16,635 million kronor. That is, considerably in excess of the commander in chief's cheapest alternative. Their reason is that the reduced defense budget at present in force for economic reasons, should be extended and adapted in the next 5-year defense plan. In addition to the commander in chief's cheapest alternative the Liberals and Centrists have proposed improvements in marine surveillande, more effective submarine hunting capacity and a fifth brigade for Norland. By removing the commander in chief's proposal for a ninth Viggen division for pursuit, the Moderates have been able to spend more money on the army and the navy than the commander in chief. This means that a further infantry brigade will be modernized, more transport aircraft will be bought and that priority will be given to bigger exercises and an expanded refresher training program. The navy will be given more minesweepers, more sea-to-sea missiles and improved submarine hunting capacity.

The nonsocialist parties are in agreement on aircraft replacements for the armed forces. They say the four Draken divisions will be retained up to 1995 and that eight divisions of pursuit Viggens will be gradually added to them. In 1992 the older divisions of attack Viggens must be replaced. Toward the end of the 1990's the Viggen surveillance divisions must be replaced. The nonsocialist committee members all support the proposal for a Swedish JAS [pursuit, attack and surveillance] aircraft which will be able to carry out pursuit, attack and surveillance missions with different arms and equipment. Such scope will be given in the development of the JAS that an acceptable defense capacity will be achieved which will last into the next century.

The Social Democrats have not said "no" to the JAS but state that further clarification is necessary before a final proposal for a new aircraft system can be made. Such an aircraft should have a defensive bias and be designed to fit our system of national service and our network of airbases. According to the Social Democrats, solutions which give the same defensive capacity for lesser total costs must be investigated. The parties are agreed that the importance of the armaments industry remains. Development, production and maintenance of adequate defense material is important for Sweden's security policy credibility.

The intelligence services must be further improved. The main reason is that an attack on Sweden could now be launched with a shorter warning period than in the past. Improved combat readiness to carry out combat missions prior to a general decision for mobilization should be developed. There is general agreement on a drastic improvement of wartime health care: The present allocations will be increased by 50 percent. Investments will be made in drugs and in the stockpiling of other materials. The civil defense will also be given increased funds for training and exercises.

Economic defenses will be given more money. Through the allocation of 30 million kronor the Social Democrats want to protect the textile and clothing industry. Within a 10-year period gas masks for the entire population will be bought. Protection against nuclear arms and chemical weapons will be achieved through an early warning system and local contingency plans. The role of the police in protection against coups will be increased through annual exercises. The telecommunications authority's protection and war preparations will be given increased funds.

CARRINGTON ADDRESSES LORDS ON POLISH SITUATION

[Text] Britain will maintain a policy of "strict non-intervention" over the Polish crisis, the foreign secretary, Lord Carrington, said today. But in a clear warning to the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies, he added: "We expect the same of all signatories of the Helsinki Final Act." Lord Carrington, who was making a statement to the lords, assured peers that there were no reports on danger to British people living in Poland. He recalled the assurances by the Polish leader, General Jaruzelski, that reforms would be continued, despite the imposition of martial law, and that the emergency measures were intended to be of short duration. "We regard these commitments as very important," said Lord Carrington.

Lord Carrington said in his statement: There are no reports of danger to the safety of members of the British community in Poland. "The British Embassy is in touch with British nationals and as a precautionary measure has advised them to stay at home. This advice has also been broadcast, at the government's request, on the BBC World Service." The British Government was following developments "with the closest attention and with great concern." He added that Britain was in close consultation with its EEC partner and its NATO allies. "The next few days would appear to be of critical importances to the future of Poland," said Lord Carrington. "We sincerely hope that the Polish Government and people will be able to resolve their problems without bloodshed by compromise and consensus. "We small observe a policy of strict non-intervention and we expect the same of all signatories of the Helsinki Final Act."

'CHEVALINE' NUCLEAR WARHEAD TRIALS SUCCESSFUL

[Excerpt] Britain's long-awaited Chevaline nuclear warhead system, secretly developed over a decade at a cost of 1,000 million pounds, will become operational before the end of next year Whitehall souces disclosed today. It will operate on board the Polaris submarine HMS Renown. Development of the weapon, designed to keep the nuclear deterrent effective into the 1990's when Trident comes into service and to fox anti-ballistic missile defenses around Moscow, is now being investigated by the Commons public accounts committee. The sources stressed that the Chevaline trials had been successful and any failure had been caused by component parts or the Polaris missile itself.

The concept itself has been proved 100 percent successful. Chevaline is a kind of space "bus" containing a computer which sows warheads and dummies -- known as "penetration aids" -- at pre-determined points in space. The warheads and dummies, which behave in exactly the same way as their lethal counterparts so as to confuse ground radars, can change course, speed and angle of re-entry into the atmosphere. The warheads, which have been made smaller to fit into the missile's "front end," have also been "hardened" to enable their sophisticated electronics to withstand electromagnetic pulses from nearby nuclear explosions in space triggered by the enemy defences.

After a long series of flight trials from Cape Canaveral, down the American South Atlantic missile range, the Royal Navy will embark on final test launches from submerged submarines in the next few months. Operational deployment of the new warhead system will come "before the end of next year." Continuous deployment of the new system, involving at least two submarines, will come quite soon, according to the sources.

PAPANDREOU ANNOUNCES FIRST ECONOMIC MEASURES

NC141140 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Statement by Prime Minister Papandreou -- live]

[Text] Good evening. Last week I had the opportunity to talk to you about our foreign policy. Today I want to speak to you on an equally serious matter -- the economic problem the country is facing and the measures, the policy, the government will follow.

The purpose of my short talk today is twofold: One, I want to give a very general picture of the country's economic problem; I would like to say of the economic crisis we are facing. Two, I will announce the first measures to deal with our current problems. We all know our economy is in a deep, serious crisis. This is becoming apparent in our daily life in various ways. The roots of this crisis, however, are less apparent. I would say the crisis we are going through has its roots in the following:

1. Amassing of economic and social problems which were overlooked during the entire postwar period -- education, health, unequal distribution of forces between the countryside and the city, unplanned expansion of the cities and many other things.

2. The international economic crisis which is of a long-term character and is characterized by stagnant inflation.

3. The policy naturally pursued during the last years by New Democracy. It is not my intention at this moment to go into a critique of New Democracy's policy. I do, however, have the duty to inform the Greek people that we took over an economy with empty coffers and in a state of advanced decomposition.

The conclusion to be drawn is that emergence from the crisis will be a difficult task that will require the total support of the entire Greek people. I want to be absolutely clear on this point. There is no easy solution. Available opportunities such as existed were squandered during the last few years. From now on the solution cannot be sought within the structure of the existing productive process. Emergence from the crisis requires structural changes, changes which will be the quintessence of our middle-term program for 1983-87. The course, however, from today's economic chaos toward a dynamic and just economy will of necessity pass through the narrows of the coming year, 1982. I much fear that the economic policy followed by New Democracy in 1981 considerably limits the margins for our initiatives.

The framework within which we are obliged to move is characterized primarily by 1) the trend of the current production process to create inflationary pressures; 2) the low levels of investment and productivity which have been characteristic of the Greek economy for years; and 3) the unequal and unjust distribution of the national income derived from the distribution of productive forces, specifically the abandonment of every effort to check the downward course of our economy in 1981, which resulted in the country being led into a deadend with the following characteristics: Inflation, which in the last few years has fluctuated around 25 percent, and this year's inflation would have reached 30 percent; measures were not adopted during the past year for the necessary price adjustment for public utilities and organizations; a steadily lesser rise in the gross national income, which will reach negative proportions. This is the rule. Results of this situation are: Continual decrease of investments during the past few years; a decrease in the people's purchasing power at lower wage levels as well as for the salaried employees from 1979 to date.

This decrease is due to the aforementioned developments: the policy of one-sided austerity, which hit the lower income levels, and a deficit in the current balance of payments which this year will reach a record level of $2.5 billion. All this is despite the leveling off which has been characteristic of the Greek economy in the past few years.

In conclusion there is also an unheard-of deficit in the public sector of some 350 billion drachma in 1981. This is the result of a lack of any effort this year by the previous government toward a wise public finance policy.

This, in a few words, is the situation we took over. As is natural, the consequences of the policy which led the country to this state of affairs are not going to be mended in 1981. They will, to a certain degree, follow us in the next period. Our immediate goal is to free ourselves as soon as possible from these consequences and set the country on an upward and socially just course.

It is clear that if this course is to start it is necessary to adopt brave measures. Always within the framework of our possibilities and with dynamic justice as the criterion, the measures being announced are aimed: At restoring the purchasing power of the lower income levels and at a more just distribution of the workers' income; at the adoption of a series of other measures for the workers and at coping with the problems of special categories of workers; at the solution of certain problems and the provision of credit facilities to the small and medium enterprises; at the settlement of state and business debts and, in conclusion, at the gradual adjustment of prices of certain public utilities and organizations for the purpose of cleansing them and, in conclusion, at the adjustment of liquid fuel prices.

In our economic policy for 1982 our primary goal is to protect the workers' income. In order to protect the workers' income against inflation and for the more just distribution of the national income, the government will implement two basic measures: automatic cost of living adjustment of wages and salaries and annual cost of living readjustment of the tax scale.

In reference to the automatic cost of living adjustment, the system to be applied as of 1 May 1982 will be based upon the following principles:

1. Restoration of the purchasing power which has been lost as a result of inflation.

2. Readjustment will be undertaken every 4 months.

3. Readjustment will be to the full percentage for incomes up to 35,000 drachma. In other words, these incomes will be increased on the basis of the whole percentage of increase in the cost of living index during the 4-month adjustment period. For income adjustments above this income level there will be scaled-down readjustment levels as follows: for incomes from 35,000 to 50,000 drachma the readjustment will be on the basis of 0.5 percent of the cost of living increase; for incomes from 55,000 to 80,000 drachma the readjustment will be on the basis of 0.25 percent of the cost of living increase; for incomes of over 80,000 drachma the percentage will be zero.

Selection of this sliding readjustment scale is dictated by the necessity to control inflation and, at the same time, to cut the gap between low and high incomes.

4. The readjustment will be undertaken on the basis of the current consumer price index until a new price index is prepared.

5. In order to prepare the new consumer price list and in order to supervise the implementation of the automatic cost of living adjustment, a special committee will be established. Representatives of the workers, employers and the state will form part of this committee.

6. Implementation of the automatic cost of living adjustment will start from nominal income levels as established on 1 January 1982.

For reasons of social justice the government resolved to strengthen low and medium incomes, but with particular emphasis on the lower incomes. The total monthly remuneration for the month of January 1982 will be established on the basis of the total monthly remuneration for December 1981 with the following increases:

For incomes up to 20,000 drachma the increase will be 5,000 drachma.
For incomes up to 25,000 drachma the increase will be 4,500 drachma.
For incomes up to 30,000 drachma the increase will be 4,000 drachma.
For incomes up to 35,000 drachma the increase will be 3,500 drachma.
For incomes up to 40,000 drachma the increase will be 3,000 drachma.
For incomes of 45,000 drachma the increase will be 2,500 drachma.
For incomes of 50,000 drachma the increase will be 2,000 drachma.

Similar adjustments, and this has a special importance, will be undertaken in respect to pensions.

Automatic adjustment of salaries and pensions established after the above increases which I just mentioned will be implemented as of 1 May 1982. The lowest levels of wages and salaries in the private sector will be established under the process of collective agreements which has already started. We truly hope collective agreements will move within the framework dictated by the current economic conditions.

Now we come to the annual cost of living readjustment of the tax scale. Nominal increases established for the purpose of implementing the automatic cost of living adjustment can be taxed with a higher tax factor. In such cases the result can be lower rather than an increase in true income. For this reason the cost of living readjustment of the tax scale is a basic measure against inflation for the protection of the workers' income. This readjustment will be implemented for incomes earned in 1982. The scales and factors will be readjusted for the purpose of more just distribution of the tax burden.

Now we come to certain tax measures for workers in respect to 1981 incomes. The tax on a private vehicle up to 8 HP is abolished; the income factor for private homes of up to 120,000 drachma, with the addition of 24,000 drachma for each child, is exempted; shares from provident funds of up to 4,000 drachma per month are exempted, provided the total income of the pensioner with children is not over 400,000 drachma. Taxation measures on incomes in 1982 have the following increases on the lowest tax-free limit: Exemption due to family obligations; increase of family allowances; exemption of rent up to a percentage from the taxable income, and exemption from tax on pensions up to a specified percentage. All these measures will be announced with the presentation of the budget in the Chamber of Deputies.

We now come to additional measures for the workers. In order to improve the position of the workers, the government also resolved to establish 4 weeks' vacation for all workers, to reduce working hours to 41 per week as of 1 January 1982 and to 40 hours per week as of 1 January 1983, to strengthen programs for employment of the handicapped, double leave of absence for the purpose of examination for working students with state subsidy, increase in allowances for a third child by 1,000 drachma, payment of a monthly education allowance to emigrants' children studying in Greece, equal remuneration for male and female workers and employees, increase in allocations for workers housing from 6.5 billion in 1981 to 16 billion in 1982. Sums due to the workers housing organization by the state will be paid in full.

For pensioners in more detail: First for the farmers the government will radically adjust their pension scales so that they can gradually acquire the same protection as other workers. As already announced in the policy statement the government will immediately proceed:

1. To the woman farmer, an independent and equal pension. This means the farmer's wife will have a pension equal to that of her husband, and not half the pension as is the practice today.

2. To increase current pensions for all qualified farmers -- men and women -- by 1,000 drachma. In this way a farmer-pensioner couple will receive 8,000 drachma per month.

3. Leave allowance in the same way that other pensioners are entitled to.

The government will proceed to the gradual readjustment of pensions for a series of other provident funds, merchants and so forth. For IKA, the Social Insurance Foundation, there will be a minimum pension increase where the lowest minimum level will be 11,000 drachma.

The above income policy measures, although considerably improving the position of the economically weaker classes, will be supplemented by the taxation and other arrangements to be announced soon so that there can be a decisive implementation of the government's policy for social justice as promised to the people.

I will now proceed to another vast and important matter for our country: measures for small and medium enterprises. The government considers the small and medium enterprises as the basic level for development so that the youth of our country can find employment, so the country's productivity potential is fully implemented, and so that the countryside, which is continually being isolated, can be developed. The first measures in this direction are the following:

1. Increase the amount of loans granted by banks, without approval of the subcommittees for crafts and industries, from 3 to 5 million drachma. These subcommittees will also be reorganized so they can function better.

2. State guarantees will amount to 100 percent for the first 2 million and 80 percent for amounts up to 5 million. From then on the state guarantee will cover about 60 percent of the loan.

3. The highest level of financing for commercial enterprises, which have a volume of business under 20 million drachma, is increased from 1 to 2 million. From a volume of business of 20-50 million drachma, the financing percentage is increased from 10 to 15 percent.

4. Radical reform and expansion of the technical development organization so it can provide better technical and other assistance to small and medium enterprises.

5. Special incentives will be implemented to promote the cooperative idea and the institution of cooperatives in small and medium enterprises.

6. There will be reform in the practice of commercial contracts for the purpose of achieving effective protection of business premises without, naturally, undermining the institution of private ownership.

There are various matters which affect the IKA and the state and its relations with the IKA. The question of debts by various businesses to the IKA has already taken on vast proportions. This undermines the economic foundations of the greatest social insurance organization in the country and at the same time has brought a huge number of enterprises into very difficult positions as a result of enforcement of payment procedures -- bankruptcy, auction sales and so forth.

For this reason, the following immediate measures will be enforced:

1. Settlement of amounts owed by these enterprises up to 31 October 1981. These amounts due will be paid in 48 monthly installments.

2. Amounts owed to export enterprises by the state, derived from returned interest and so forth, will be paid in full. On the basis of decision 1574 of the Moretary Committee, this measure will be combined with a compulsory amalgamation of these debts with amounts due to IKA and other benevolent funds, to the state and the banks.

It will, however, become imperative in 1982 also to readjust the price of certain services, such as the Greek Telecommunications Authority [OTE], the water utility and the price of liquid fuels and, perhaps, urban transportation. In the last few years the price of many utility services remained stagnant, while their cost is continually increased by inflation. As a result, vast deficits have been created and these are a burden on the public sector and are a permanent inflationary factor. This situation will be dealt with:

1. Through special readjustments of these organizations in order to cut down operational costs and cover these deficits to the greatest possible extent.

2. Through readjustment of prices for the services provided by these utilities.

Naturally these readjustments will be undertaken gradually and by stages in a way which will minimize the burden on the lower income classes. For these reasons the government resolved to increase the price of telecommunications services and the water company.

For OTE: 1) For up to 150 telephone calls the price will be 1.60 drachma per call. Over and above this, the price per call will be 2 drachma. 2) A fixed rate is established for every residence at 150 drachma for the first telephone, 500 for the second, and 1,000 for the third.

These measures will not only cut down the deficits but will also clean up the entire telecommunications system and will allow its expansion in order to meet a large number of pending connections.

Water supply: In an effort to avoid an excessive burden on the lower income brackets, the price for water for domestic use will be scaled as follows: up to 4 cubic meters, 15 drachma per cubic meter; between 4 and 15 cubic meters, 25 drachma per cubic meter; from 15 cubic meters and over, 40 drachma. For public buildings, municipalities and communes, philanthropic institutions, industrial and professional units the price will be 25 drachma per cubic meter.

The change of the drachma-to-dollar relationship created serious deficits in the liquid fuel sector, and this burdened the state budget. The fact that the drachma has been devalued in relation to the dollar means a greater cost in drachma. For this reason, it was resolved to increase the price of oil products as follows: Gasoline: ordinary and super by 3 drachma per liter; diesel by 1 drachma per liter; mazut by 0.85 drachma per kilo. The price of liquid gas remains unchanged for domestic use.

The above mentioned measures will be complemented by others in basic sectors, such as in the government's investment policy, price policy, credit policy, incentives policy and tax policy. The details of these measures will be announced by me very soon as a second group of measures.

Tonight, however, I think it is necessary to emphasize that these measures are aimed at:

1. Cleaning up the Greek economy, controlling inflation, bringing the economy out of stagnation through a productive investments policy.

2. Better distribution of the national income and the more just division of the tax burden. The program of state investments will play an important role in revitalization of the economy. This will include projects with a fast turnover and of social value. At the same time, the credit system will be streamlined in order to guarantee putting the people's savings into productive investments and not into profiteering activities. With this spirit we will seek solutions to the problem of certain enterprises which are today appearing as problematic. We all know that any measure regarding income policy cannot have the desired result if inflation is not checked. For this reason, the government and I once again stress that we will take measures to control prices and costs and will surpress the middlemen who reap vast profits.

For the purpose of insuring a more just distribution of the tax burden it is unacceptable that there should be citizens with high incomes who do not pay their share of the tax burden through tax evasion. In this direction our measures will provide for strict sanctions generally, and particularly for the large-scale tax evaders.

In the future I will again have the opportunity to speak to you and to present the supplementary measures which I mentioned and which will explain the structure that we aspire to give to the economy and the rules of the game, which all the productive classes must know so they can make their decisions. I will ask, I will appeal, that you all contribute according to your strength -- the workers, the nonprivileged classes, the businessmen -- that you all contribute toward overcoming the crisis, so that we can pass 1982, which has been overburdened with all the mistakes of the New Democracy government we have succeeded. I believe that if we manage to control inflation in 1982, as we hope, at a level under 20 percent, if we increase our national income by about 2.5 percent, if we once again put into motion the apparatus of productive investments, if we limit the deficit in the balance of payments, from then on we will open up a new horizon with a dynamic and just development of our economy. I thank you warmly for listening to me.

NEW DEMOCRACY CRITICIZES FIRST ECONOMIC MEASURES

NC132155 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 13 Dec 81

[Text] A statement issued this evening by a New Democracy representative criticizes the government's economic measures as not substantive because, he stated, they will neither bring about an economic revival nor will they strengthen demand [for goods]. The statement stressed that the announced cost of living adjustment was postponed for 1982.

'Arafat, Papandreou Remarks

[Text] Yasir 'Arafat arrived at the Pan-Athenaikon stadium by helicopter from Elevsis airport and was received by Prime Minister Papandreou, who said: With this visit, Yasir 'Arafat lays the foundations of relations between our fatherland, Greece, and the Palestinians. This visit will bear significant fruit for both peoples' future.

In reply to the prime minister, Yasir 'Arafat said: [Begin recording, in English with Greek translation superimposed] I am very glad and happy that I have the opportunity to be in this particular country, which is friendly to our people and the Arab nation. Specifically, the just cause of our struggle has been promoted by the invitation Mr Papandreou extended to me. It is a historic moment which signifies that once again this great country, this friendly country, Greece, is playing a historic role similar to what it played in ancient times. Greece is the link between the Arab nation and Europe. I therefore assure you that many things will change with this historic step. We all know the very important, very old, historic relations between the Greek people and our Arab nation, particularly with Palestine. I cannot forget that there are still in Palestine many towns and villages with Greek names. It is something that touches our hearts. We are grateful to you and your people and we will not forget it. [end recording]

Luncheon Speeches

[Text] Shortly after his arrival, Yasir 'Arafat attended a luncheon given in his honor by Prime Minister Papandreou. Addressing the PLO leader, the prime minister said:

[Begin recording] I feel a great human and political emotion, Dear Yasir 'Arafat, because of your presence. We welcome, through you and your close advisers, the great and noble struggle you are waging -- the struggle for your fatherland, the fatherland of the Palestinians, which is one of the noblest and most significant struggles of our era. You are struggling for the self-determination of all peoples; you are struggling for free expression, for the self-determination of all peoples. For our area, your struggle is of a determinative nature, but it also has a worldwide response of enormous dimensions. And since your struggle began, we all have had the feeling that it is worth being a human being.

This, Dear Brother Yasir 'Arafat, you have given to us. This is something we appreciate beyond any transient contribution to our own struggle, the struggle of the Greek people. And I should assure you that the Greek people tod have not ceased struggling. Since 1821 and thereafter -- when the Greek revolution started -- the Greek people have continued their struggle in many ways, with a multidimentional foreign policy to safeguard the people's interests, to attain their complete independence, their national independence, and to contribute to justice and peace among all peoples on a worldwide scale.

You, Brother Yasir 'Arafat, are the symbol of the most significant struggle of our era. We are near you: we are near the Palestinian people. Together we shall bring to an auspicious end the battle for victory and vindication and we shall play as much of a role as we can as a bridge between your struggle in the Middle East and Europe.

With great joy and with a feeling of honor I want to drink to your health, to the health of the PLO, to the health of the Palestinian people, to victory. [end recording]

In reply to the address by Prime Minister Papandreou, PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat said: [Begin recording, in Arabic with superimposed Greek translation] Your Excellency, my friend, friend of the Palestinian people and friend of all Arab peoples, our dear friend: At this moment I feel inside me your warm, brave and wise words which, at the same time, are principled words, and that through these words you have expressed, our people have most dynamically advanced their just struggle. By this you have not merely touched my heart but also those of my brothers. You are actually tolling the bells of this great history -- the history Greece traversed for a very long period, a history that united us for many years. You say history is being recharted from the beginning between our Arab nations and Europe through the Greek gate. This means that there are substantive and radical changes in this area. History and geography unite us. We are not struggling against anyone, but we are struggling for a just peace. We are struggling for a just peace in the area of the Mediterranean and this area. We struggle so that the coming generations and our children may live in glory, honor and without problems.

Allow me to thank you and your people, your noble people, who have always supported our people's struggle. Allow me to stress that the broad cooperation between our people will not only chart a joint road for us and Greece, but a road for Europe and for all the world. You are a man of principles and so are your brothers. And in any case, it is principles that survive. Let us drink to these principles, to this friendship, to this courage. [end recording]

At 2000 GMT Prime Minister Papandreou and Yasir 'Arafat had their first meeting at the political office. According to press reports, the discussion covered the upgrading of the Palestinian office in Athens and recent developments in the Middle East with Israel's intention to annex the Syrian Golan as the basis. The prime minister will meet the Palestinian leader again Wednesday, when the talks will be completed. Tomorrow Yasir 'Arafat will meet with Deputy Foreign Ministers Fotillas and Papoulias, while New Democracy Chairman Averof will visit him. In the afternoon Yasir 'Arafat met President of the Chamber of Deputies Alevras and exchanged warm remarks and presents with him.

KKE DELEGATION LEAVES FOR ETHIOPIA, YEMEN

NC141619 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 12 Dec 81 p 1

[Excerpts] A KKE delegation, headed by the party's secretary general, Comrade Kharilaos Florakis, departed yesterday for the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen and Ethiopia. The KKE delegation is visiting the two African countries at the official invitation of the ruling Socialist Party of Yemen and the council for organizing a workers' party, which is ruling Ethiopia.

Shortly before departing, Comrade Florakis made the following statement to RIZOSPASTIS: "Our delegation is going to the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen and to socialist Ethiopia at the invitation of the Socialist Party of Yemen and the Workers' Party of Ethiopia. Our visit lies within the framework of the bilateral meetings and the resolutions made by the 17 parties of the eastern Mediterranean, Near and Middle East and the Red Sea. I think the significance of such meetings for the exchange of views and coordination of action is obvious insofar as this area is currently one of the most dangerous areas of tension in the world. Furthermore, this is necessitated by the need for struggle in order to rid this area of nuclear weapons and turn the Mediterranean into a zone of peace."

ANKARA CONDEMNS ISRAEL'S MOVE ON GOLAN HEIGHTS

TA151028 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] It has been announced that Turkey does not recognize Israel's decision to annex the Golan Heights. A Foreign Ministry statement notes that Israel will be solely responsible for the tension and escalation that will increase in the region as a consequence of this unilateral decision. The statement, which notes that through its decision to annex the Golan Heights Israel has created another fait accompli in the Middle East, said:

The Turkish Government deplores this new fait accompli initiated by Israel in disregard of world opinion as a move that will hinder peace efforts in the Middle East and sow new seeds of conflict. Israel, which has been occupying Arab territories, including Jerusalem, since 1967 contrary to international law, and which has been establishing new settlements on these territories, has been perpetuating this attitude despite resolutions adopted at the United Nations and various international organizations to put an end to these measures.

Turkey has frequently declared that it does not recognize Israel's faits accomplis, which seriously threaten peace in the region. Our government does not in any way recognize Israel's decision to annex the Golan Heights and will not do so in the future. Israel will be solely responsible for the tension and escalation that will increase in the region as a result of this unilateral decision, which could create grave consequences.

FOREIGN MINISTRY FOLLOWING SITUATION IN POLAND

TA141612 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1530 GMT 14 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, 14 Dec (AA) -- Officials of the Foreign Ministry in Ankara say the Turkish Government maintains its view, expressed earlier, that Poland must solve its problems itself. Turkey followed developments in Poland closely, the same sources said, and hoped they would not disrupt East-West relations. Turkish authorities, like those of several NATO countries, had "no difficulty in understanding" the concern of the U.S. administration over the Polish developments, the Foreign Ministry sources added.

IRANIAN GUARDS 'KIDNAP' 17 TURKISH CITIZENS

JN111017 Baghdad INA in Arabic 1600 GMT 11 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, 11 Dec (INA) -- It was revealed here today that 17 Turkish citizens were recently kidnapped by the Khomeyni guards near the Turkish-Iranian borders. The newspaper HURRIYET points out that the abducted persons were practicing business across the borders in accordance with agreements signed between the administrative officials at the border. The paper says that the kidnapping operation took place in the wake of a ferocious battle between the Khomeyni guards and the Iranian Kurds near the border area. Scores of persons were killed in the battle.

The paper says the guards arrested 100 persons, including 17 Turkish citizens, who were carted off to the Province of Tabriz for trial. The paper, however, did not specify the steps which would be taken by the Turkish authorities on this issue.

PAPER CRITICIZES PAPANDREOU ON 'TURKISH THREAT'

NC142028 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 10 Dec 81 p 3

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "Andreas Again"]

[Text] It seems that Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou is gifted in talking nonsense. He has given this report to journalists regarding the speech he made at the NATO Planning Committee meeting: "I made a statement in which I maintained that our borders are being threatened by a member country and demanded that our borders be protected by NATO against this threat, which originates from the east. A period of partial de facto suspension of Greece's participation in the military wing of NATO has begun. That is, Greece is partially breaking away from agreements which could damage its security. We will not sign any agreement that would upset the status quo in the Aegean." One feels like saying, "God bless you, man," and asking: "When has Turkey threatened Greece?"

Anyone going through the pages of history could find out in a few minutes that no attack whatsoever has been directed from Turkey toward Greece since 1833, when it won its independence. And yet territory under Turkish sovereignty has been constantly subjected to attacks from Greece during the past 160 years. As a result of their aggressiveness, the Greeks got their last and major beating on the battlefield in 1922, and they were hurled into the sea in Izmir on 9 September.

This is not the time to start lecturing in history. But the entire world should take cognizance of the fact that if one of the two countries has been threatening the other, Greece has always been "the attacker" and Turkey "the attacked." Since this is the stark truth, can one not help but describe Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's reference to "the threat from Turkey" as utter nonsense?

Furthermore, it is Greece which has militarized the Aegean islands contrary to the international treaties of Lausanne and Paris in 1923 and 1947 respectively. If the Turkish Government were to say, "Either you dismantle those weapons and take them away or we know how to remove them," Greece could give no justified answer. Moreover, Turkey's legal position under such circumstances would certainly be incomparably stronger than that of the United States when it forced the removal of the missiles in Cuba in 1962 without any international rule of law, or that of Israel which, without any justification whatsoever, bombed Syrian missiles in Lebanon and the nuclear power station in Iraq.

But this is not what should be done. What should really be done is to explain certain facts to this man Papandreou in a "peaceful" manner. We should tell him, for instance, that his allegation, "Our participation in the military wing of NATO was the result of a fait accompli," is not compatible either with the honor of his nation nor with that of the previous rulers of Greece. He must also be told that the question of "demilitarization of the islands" as well as "the continental shelf and airpsace control" are intended not to upset the status quo in the Aegean but to "protect" it.

The human brain that advocates "an independent, nonaligned state in Cyprus" on one hand and described Turkey's intervention in the island on the strength of the treaty of guarantees as "a section of our national territory is under occupation" on the other, is definitely in need of medical treatment. Let us put it briefly: If there is anyone who would argue that a mind seeking "security" against its own ally is "healthy" let him come forward and say so.

AUSTRIA

POLAND SUGGESTS THAT AUSTRIANS IN POLAND LEAVE

AU141304 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 14 Dec 81 p 2

[Excerpt] Vienna -- For the time being Austria will not abolish visas for Polish citizens, but Foreign Minister Pahr and Interior Minister Lanc, by mutual agreement, issued two "liberal instructions": both the border organs and the diplomatic authorities abroad were instructed to display generosity toward Polish citizens. At the same time the foreign minister has confirmed that Warsaw introduced visas for Austrians -- a measure originally intended to go into effect on 21 December -- as of Sunday, 13 December. This measure is only of theoretical importance, however, since the borders are closed and all flights to and from Warsaw have been canceled.

Last night the Foreign Ministry received in a circuitous way the first report on the situation in Warsaw from the Austrian Embassy. Ambassador Zanetti, who had been asked to see Foreign Minister Czyrek, reported that the situation was quiet and that, contrary to expectations, no Polish citizens had turned to the embassy [for asylum]. Czyrek had told him, Zanetti, that the diplomats must not leave the Warsaw voivodship, and that Warsaw suggests that Austrians living in Poland should leave the country. Zanetti also took notice of the information that Polish passports are valid only with a new stamp.

As regards the first reactions to the Polish events by Austrian politicians, there is a striking difference between the assessments of government and opposition. While Foreign Minister Pahr and Interior Minister Lanc, like Chancellor Kreisky and Minister of Justice Broda, expressed the hope that the development would not amount to an end of the democratization, Peoples Party [OEVP] and Freedom Party [FPOE] politicians spoke of the "conclusion that in a communist country there is no latitude for freedom" (OEVP Chairman Mock), or of a "declaration of bankruptcy by the communist system" (FPOE foreign policy spokesman Frischenschlager).

KREISKY OUTLINES GOVERNMENT STANCE ON POLAND

AU151543 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1130 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Report on Chancellor Kreisky statements on the government's position on the Polish events at a press conference following today's cabinet meeting in Vienna -- recorded]

[Text] [Kreisky] At the beginning of this morning's cabinet meeting, the government discussed the Polish situation, and it expressed the hope -- I repeat this very clearly -- that the social forces in Poland will succeed even under the existing circumstances in finding solutions which will prevent clashes in Poland itself. And second, the government expresses the hope that the events in Poland will not give either side any cause to interfere in the events in Poland. And third, the government will, as in the past, observe the principles of the right to asylum as much as possible.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, do not the arrests of trade union functionaries prove that today any member of 'Solidarity' in Poland who leaves the country is actually entitled to be treated as a political refugee?

[Answer] We would handle it that way.

[Question] The presidium of the Austrian Trade Union Federation [OEGB] yesterday clearly described the arrest of trade union functionaries and the imposing of martial law as violations of human and trade union rights. Do you share this opinion?

[Answer] Yes. The government shares the view that the freedom of trade unions is a part of human rights, and that its absence and violation is a violation of human rights. That is why we appeal to all forces in Poland to avoid clashes, to overcome [words indistinct].

[Question] Mr Chancellor, do you have any information indicating that this step by the Polish military was actually necessary to forestall an invasion?

[Answer] We have no information of that kind, but I could imagine that at any rate the current military leadership of Poland might have been guided by this concern. If that is the case, then this current state leadership would have the opportunity to restore a situation permitting talks.

[Question] Are you in contact with our embassy in Warsaw?

[Answer] Yes, we are in contact with our embassy.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, in the present situation would you regard the use of the strike weapon by the Polish workers as justified and expedient?

[Answer] The Polish workers are of course entitled to any defense measure they consider expedient, working people are entitled to any defense -- any action that working people decide to take in such a situation will certainly have the sympathy of the workers movement.

Reactions to Polish Events

AU151700 [Editorial Report] All Vienna papers in German on 15 December 1981 give prominence to reaction to the Polish events and related developments.

WIENER ZEITUNG (page 1) reports that the Nationalrat deputies of all three political parties represented in parliament have published a "joint statement in which they declare that the suspension of essential basic rights in Poland constitutes a step which gives cause for the greatest concern." The statement says the foremost interest must be that Poland's problems can be solved "without forcible interference by other powers in internal developments." It calls for convening the Austrian Foreign Policy Council to deal with the situation that has developed through the events in Poland.

The communist VOLKSSTIMME publishes on page 1 a statement by the Austrian Communist Party [KPOE] Politburo on the situation in Poland, which calls, the proclamation of the state of emergency an "attempt to block the road to complete chaos" and "to create the prerequisites for the overcoming of the crisis by the Polish people themselves." The KPOE Politburo statement blames the development "primarily" on the "attitude of the 'Solidarity' leadership," in which the extremist wing had won the upper hand. The KPOE declares its solidarity "with all forces in Poland supporting the overcoming of old mistakes, a renewal of socialism and its defense," with "all those who, under the leadership of the PZPR, rally for a democratic, socialist solution to Poland's problems," the KPOE statement says.

ARBEITER-ZEITUNG (page 1) reports that the Austrian Trade Union Federation [OEGB] presidium in a statement condemned the seizure of power by the military, the proclamation of the state of emergency in Poland, and the arrest of all 'Solidarity' leaders as a "violation of human and trade union rights." The statement also demanded the immediate release of the trade union functionaries and the restoration of the democratic and trade union rights as laid down in the Gdansk agreement of 31 August 1980. The OEGB statement says that "the crisis can only be overcome in collaboration with the freely elected representatives of the Polish workers," and that "the use of force is acompletely unsuitable means to solve Poland's difficult crisis."

ARBEITER-ZEITUNG (page 1) reports that about 1,500 persons participated 14 December, in a protest march in Vienna against the Communist military dictatorship in Poland, moving from Mariahilferstrasse in Vienna's seventh district to St Stephan's Cathedral in the city center, chanting and displaying slogans such as "Socialism, yes -- Stalinism, no," "Down with the military dictatorship," and "Jaruzelski, no -- Solidarity, yes." According to the paper, a second demonstration of some 500 Polish asylum applicants from the Goetzendorf refugee camp was held in front of the Polish Embassy building in Vienna-Hietzing, which has been strongly guarded by police since Sunday. DIE PRESSE (page 12) says in its report that the demonstration ended at 2200 "without incident." The paper also notes that Vienna police headquarters, after learning about the events in Poland, immediately effected stricter security measures for Polish insitutions in Vienna -- in addition to the Polish Embassy, especially for the "Orbis-Lot" travel agency on Schwedenplatz, the Polish reading room on Schwindgasse and the Polish institute on Am Gestade.

ARBEITER-ZEITUNG (page 2) carries an APA dispatch from Warsaw stating that according to an Austrian Embassy spokesman, Austrian citizens in Poland will not have any difficulties: "Polish authorities have guaranteed the diplomatic mission that all Austrians can leave the country by public means of transport." By Sunday evening, seven Austrians reported to the embassy, but none of them had any difficulties. According to the dispatch, the postal service with Poland is still functioning, while telephone and teletype communications with Poland continue to be interrupted. Austrian post offices are at present accepting mail for Poland.

ARBEITER-ZEITUNG (page 3) reports that on Monday, 14 December, about 24 Austrians and 5 Poles arrived in Vienna on the "Chopin Express" from Poland. "One of the travelers declared that the trade union is on strike and that the coal mines are at a standstill," the paper says, adding that the border check of passengers lasted 3 hours.

OFFICIALS CITE 'CONCERN' OVER POLISH CRISIS

PM151437 Paris LE FIGARO in French 14 Dec 81 p 4

[Excerpt] The decisions made in Warsaw between Saturday night and Sunday morning "are arousing the government's gravest concern," [Premier] Pierre Mauroy said on television yesterday evening. The government chief, whose statement had of course been approved by the president, also stressed France's "refusal" to intervene in Polish affairs.

"There is no freedom-loving man in Europe, and particularly in France, who does not feel sympathy and concern for the Polish people's efforts to find an original way to freedom, justice and prosperity in complete freedom," Mr Mauroy said. "Moreover those were the sentiments which the government intended to express during the official visit I was to make to Poland 16-19 December. That visit was to provide an opportunity to welcome the democratization started more than 1 year ago by all the component parts of the Polish people.

"Naturally the government refrains from any interference in Polish affairs," Mr Mauroy added, "but the installation of a military administration in Poland last night, the arrest of many trade union and political leaders and the introduction of martial law have interrupted the democratic development. These decisions are arousing the government's gravest concern. We share the spontaneous emotion demonstrated by the French people and expressed by many organizations, especially trade unions. For the time being the government notes that the decisions made in Poland still fall within the framework of that country's internal sovereignty. It hopes for a resumption of dialogue among Poles and a return to civil and trade union freedoms.

"Everybody realizes that if the renewal movement started in Poland were to be smashed, it would have serious repercussions. French-Polish friendship grew when the great wind stirred up by the French revolution shook the old regime throughout Europe. That common fight for freedom was continued in Paris and Warsaw throughout the 19th century and then in the struggle against nazism. That common fight means that France feels particularly strongly about anything which affects and concerns Poland. The government is therefore anxious that Poland should find ways of achieving recovery and restoring freedoms via national accord and without any foreign interference."

The situation in Poland following the proclamation of martial law is being followed closely by Mr Francois Mitterrand. The president, who returned to Paris Saturday after a short official visit to Portugal, is being kept regularly informed of events in that country, the Elysee says.

At the Quai d'Orsay External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson also told radio stations yesterday: "We earnestly want Polish affairs to be tackled by the Poles. At present we see no sign of foreign intervention and we welcome that."

"The news of the past few days suggested that there might be a trial of strength," Mr Cheysson continued. "Nobody could have known that it would take place on such a scale. The postponement of the premier's visit, at the request of the Polish authorities, however, gave us an indication of the time when the Polish Government feared that it would have problems." Moreover, at Mr Claude Cheysson's request, the Polish ambassador was received at the External Relations Ministry at 1730 hours yesterday to provide him with additional information to that given the same morning by Polish Foreign Minister Jozef Czyrek to France's ambassador in Warsaw.

POLISH MARTIAL LAW SITUATION PREOCCUPIES PRESS

AU151604 Rome ANSA in English 1524 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Rome, 15 Dec (ANSA) -- Unfolding events in Poland, where martial law was imposed on Saturday together with the jailing of many leaders of the Solidarnosc labor movement continues to monopolize Italian newspaper coverage today, with all of the major dailies dedicating their front pages and supplementary inside pages to reportage, interviews and analysis on present and past events in Poland.

Editorial opinion across the board reveals a vivid concern for what the next few days events could mean for the East European nation, and the major dailies were also unanimous in their negative evaluation of Polish Government action, also expressed in comments from politicians, parliamentary members, and government and union representatives. "The military junta now in power in Warsaw is not unlike that instituted in Athens in 1967 or the one now reigning in Ankara," the conservative Milan daily IL GIORNO writes. "Moscow must put a good face on a situation which puts the communist party on the sidelines and expels it from power as if it were a useless superstructure."

The Italian Communist Party's official daily, L'UNITA, maintained that "the power assumed by the military is the result and the proof of the failure of an entire leadership division of the Polish society organized by the PZPR (Polish communist party)." The single fact that military power was resorted to in the name of a desperate urgency to save the nation from the abyss already reached is the most damming proof of this failure," L'UNITA continued. "The same party which yesterday held power appears today to be downgraded by the military," the Communist Party organ affirmed.

"This present self-occupation of Poland," the Turin daily LA STAMPA maintained, "no matter how painful and outrageous for the nation, could reaffirm the premise for a resumption of reforms and renewal augured by General Jaruzelski himself." The nation might have found itself buried forever with Kulikov (the Soviet Union general commandant of the Warsaw Pact troops)," LA STAMPA continued. "With similar motives in mind, Jaruzelski aims at becoming a Polish Kadar (Hungarian general who effected party purges in Hungary)."

Spadolini on Polish Events

AU151032 Rome ANSA in English 0831 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 15 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini told the Chamber of Deputies Monday that the military repression in Poland of a union movement enjoying wide popular consensus seemed, first of all, a break with the political structure and social dynamism of Western Europe. The Italian Government deplores the fact that once again East-West ties were violently wrenched apart by a sudden military intervention, even though exclusively internal, he said.

Spadolini warned that this break-off of political and cultural movements, with a force of expansion and contagion for all of Europe, constituted an extremely dangerous blow to peace and understanding among peoples.

The Italian Government deplores the latest developments in Warsaw because it objectively worsens relations between Europe and Poland and deeply lacerates the life of states, he said. In no way is Italy seeking to instrumentalize the situation for internal use, nor does it wish to interfere in the internal affairs of the Polish people (an interference which in no way would come from Italy), Spadolini stressed. According to Spadolini, the international problem posed by the events in Poland is that of a rupture of a constitutional process of popular, as well as state, recomposition which periodically occurs in Eastern Europe.

As to government action since martial law was imposed in Poland, Spadolini said that the first objective of his administration was to define a joint line of action within the framework of Atlantic solidarity and to keep in close contact with Italy's allies.

Spadolini concluded by invoking the Helsinki charter against foreign interference in the affairs of other nations. In this grave moment, the Italian Government reaffirms its solidarity with the Polish nation and urges all signatory nations of the Helsinki charter to recall their commitments and refrain from any interference in the internal affairs of Poland, Spadolini ended.

Berlinguer Urges Policy Change

[Text] Rome, 15 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer blamed the present situation in Poland on erroneous political and economic management of that nation by the Polish communist party and urged a revision of socialist policies in the Eastern bloc nations in a televised interview here this evening. Reiterating his party's condemnation for the introducation of martial law in Poland on Saturday, Berlinguer said: "Recent Polish events depend on economic errors and the political management of the Polish communist party which have provoked a rupture between the political power, the social classes and the working class."

Berlinguer also responded indirectly to past criticism from several Italian political parties concerning the Italian communists indecisive position in condemning "realistic socialism" in East Europe, and in particular, Soviet Union policy of blocking the way to democratization there. "What has happened in Poland," the leader of Western Europe's largest communist party said, "leads one to think that the capacity of the societies in the Eastern bloc, born from the revolution of October 1917 to move forward is gradually exhausting itself. A new phase must open now." Berlinguer continued, "in order to assure that Eastern European socialism follows a progressive development of democracy."

Berlinguer was also asked in the interview to give his views on the recent initiative of Pope John Paul II in sending delegations composed of Catholic scientists to the governments of the United States, the Soviet Union, France and Great Britain, as well as to the United Nations, to appeal for world peace. Berlinguer called the pope's ideas against rearmament "just words which will be listened to by millions and millions of believers."

Giving a positive assessment of the idea of sending delegations around the world to illustrate the realistic consequences of an atomic war, Berlinguer stated that "the pope has [word indistinct] valid concept, and European nations must understand and move closer to it. It is a concept which is not foreign to our own, even though we express it in a different manner."

COLOMBO ADDRESSES 'EUROPEAN BUSINESS FORUM'

AU121500 Rome ANSA in English 0854 GMT 12 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 12 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian labour leader Luciano Lama urged Europe to "impose limits on the (trade and monetary) aggressivity" of the United States and Japan during debates taking place here at the "European business forum" convention organized by the London economic daily THE FINANCIAL TIMES. In assuming a position opposite to that of the Italian Government, which views protectionist measures toward the two giant trade nations as "impossible to propose," the leader of Italy's most important union confederation organization maintained in his convention speech on Friday that Europe, at the same time as it imposes limits, "should diminish its protectionism toward the Third World."

Speaking before the assembly of economists and political figures of international fame, the communist secretary-general of the "General Italian Workers Confederation" (CGIL) suggested that the EEC "create a minimum of protectionism" toward America and Japan and quickly rebuild a European Monetary Fund supplied by its own resource and capable of circulating a realistic European currency for payments and reserve funding, like the ecu.

Lama added that, because of the absence of a common industrial policy in the world, the European Monetary Fund must be able to intervene to defend the exchange rates the ecu and the dollar. The communist labor leader also maintained, in his innovative views, that if the ecu becomes the currency used for payment of imports into Europe, it would permit the EEC to "extract a considerable quota of EEC foreign trade from the leadership of the dollar."

Adding his voice to the concern for American economic policy currently felt in Europe, Italian Foreign Trade Minister Nicola Capria noted during the convention debates that Reagan's monetary policy "has prolonged the wave of recession while amplifying inflationistic impulses in European countries." Capria also maintained that the United States should be involved in the rules of monetary behavior and deliberation which the European nations have agreed to through their membership in the European monetary system.

Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, who also took part in the convention, made references during his remarks to "dialectical relations" between Europe and the United States. "In the present state of tension," Colombo said, "Europe sees its own centrality reconfirmed, because it is always in Europe, in the last analysis, that the crises tend to find their resolution point." Colombo also remarked that the present "European missile limitation negotiations in Geneva opened in a "constructive" climate. Europe, he said, is looking at this dialogue with "faithful attention." Amplifying his remarks on the theme of defense, Colombo defined the Atlantic alliance as an "irreplacable pivot" in the political action of Western European countries. "I do not believe that one can speak in terms of antagonism between Atlantic solidarity and European integration," Columbo said.

The Rome diplomatic chief also noted that "European nations have responded to the Reagan administration policies of more firmness on the international level and different criticisms of the economic and budget management from Washington, by giving its own responsible contribution of reflections on the necessary answer from the alliance." Columbo defined this answer as "a contribution tendered to permit the common interests to emerge in equal dignity and autonomy from everyone's decision." "When necessary," Colombo added, "this can be accomplished also with a dialectic relation in line with the same logic of the alliance among states with marked individuality."

Colombo also said that the problem of nuclear armaments and disarmament occupies a "special" place in European-American relations. Reagan, he said, has understood the significance of the peace movement, (which Colombo defined as often "accompanied by manipulations and errors,") developing in Europe. With the "zero option", Colombo said, Reagan has "understood how to offer the Soviet Union the duty of a convincing response in the face of public opinion and also how to emphasize the ambiguity of a stance which aimed at manipulatively increasing the differences in Europe, playing on the ambiguities concerning the true origin of the threats."

SWEDEN

DEFENSE CHIEF URGES MORE SPENDING ON FORCES

PM150859 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 2 Dec 81 p 7

[Text] "I hope that the Riksdag decision next spring will mean a change of direction, so that the reduction in our defense capacity will be slowed down significantly," Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung said in a reaction to the defense committee's recommendations. The commander in chief said that while it is true that he sees a number of positive elements in the committee's proposals, the total economic framework does not allow the defense strength that will be needed in the eighties. General Ljung agreed with the defense committee's evaluation of Sweden's security situation but considers that the committee did not draw the correct conclusions from their arguments. According to the commander in chief, Sweden's military situation has deteriorated considerably in the last 5 or 6 years. The superpowers' interest in northern Europe and the Baltic has increased, and even though he does not see any immediate risk of war in Europe the commander in chief considers that the risk of our being drawn into a European war has grown.

The commander in chief is noticeably dissatisfied that the redistribution of resources within the total defense force framework has been at the expense of the military. Despite the current economic situation in Sweden he had been hoping for a strengthening of military defenses. "There can be no doubt that we have been going downhill in respect to our defense strength," General Ljung said. "It was a conscious policy on the part of the politicians to make cuts in defense in the period of international detente and now we can see the results of these cuts." However, the commander in chief takes a positive view of the party political unity within the defense committee for the retention of general conscription. He also thinks that it seems as if all parties are striving for an economic framework for the defense forces which could make the production of a Swedish JAS [pursuit, attack and surveillance] aircraft possible -- despite the hesitation on the part of the Social Democrats.

"It would be extremely advantagecus for Swedish security policy if we could have a unanimous Riksdag decision on the defense forces," the commander in chief said. "It would mean much for the confidence in and respect for us abroad." The commander in chief considers one of the positive elements in the recommendations to be the new system for compensation for rises in running costs. This will stop the gradual enfeebling of the armed forces and give them greater security with regard to their purchasing power and planning, he said.

TURKISH ALLEGATIONS OF LANDING IN CYPRUS DENIED

NC152052 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1900 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] The government spokesman has described as "false and invented" the report in the Turkish Cypriot newspaper BIRLIK which was carried by a foreign news agency and according to which Greek military forces recently landed in Cyprus. Not one soldier, not one bullet, the government spokesman stated, have been transported to Cyprus, either to Latzi port or to any other point. Obviously the report is aimed at creating confusion and covering up illegal Turkish acts, the result of which has been from 20 October to the present the transport to the Megalonisos of strong Turkish forces.

The Greek Government's policy, as expressed by Prime Minister Papandreou during the contacts he had in Brussels, is the complete withdrawal of Greek and Turkish military forces from Cyprus. Only when not one Turkish or Greek soldier remains in Cyprus will the two communities be able to solve all their problems peacefully.

On the contrary, the Turkish Government has been constantly strengthening its Cyprus occupation forces, both with men and materiel. According to press reports, from 20 October to the present there have been 11 LST runs and 2 troop carrier runs to the port of Famagusta. Turkish troops have also been airlifted by the Turkish Air Force, which has made 11 runs from Turkey to Tymbou airport, east of Nicosia. In the past only one C-130 plane had been noted flying into the occupied area of Cyprus.

PAPANDREOU CONDEMNS ANNEXATION OF GOLAN HEIGHTS

NC151854 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1800 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] The Greek Government condemns Israel's decision to annex the occupied Golan territory. Prime Minister Papandreou stated this to Hellenic Radio-Television at noon following his second meeting with Palestinian leader Yasir 'Arafat. Papandreou's statement reads as follows:

The Greek Government has learned with deep apprehension of the ratification by the Israeli parliament of the law extending the implementation of Israeli law to the occupied Golan territory. The Greek Government condemns this Israeli decision, which endangers peace in the area, and it wishes to stress that this decision on the illegal annexation of a territory that was occupied forcibly is contrary both to international law and to UN resolutions.

'ARAFAT MEETS WITH PAPANDREOU, PARTY LEADERS

[Text] A new round of talks was held at 1315 today between Prime Minister Papandreou and PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat. The talks were held at the political office and lasted for about 1 hour. At 1415 'Arafat returned to the Grande Bretagne Hotel, where in a special ceremony Athens Mayor Beis awarded the Palestinian leader the Athens Gold Medal. The ceremony was attended by Interior Minister Yennimatas, Public Order Minister Skoularikis, Deputy Foreign Minister Papoulias and other officials. This morning 'Arafat received successively official opposition leader Averof, Cypriot socialist EDEK party leader Lissaridhis, KKE spokesman Kaloudhis, KKE-Interior Secretary General Dhrakopoulos and Mr Glezos. The meetings were also attended by the organization's foreign minister, Mr Qaddumi. ERT [Helenic Radio-Television] reporter Aris Xipolitidhis reports:

[Begin recording] Palestinian leader Yasir 'Arafat had successive meetings at the Grande Bretagne Hotel this morning with representative of the country's political world to discuss the Palestinian problem. Yasir 'Arafat's first meeting was at 1030 with official opposition leader Evangelos Averof.

The meeting lasted about 50 minutes. After their talks, Mr Averof said the following in response to a question on his discussion with the Palestinian leader: [Averof] It was a very pleasant and interesting meeting. We discussed in general the relations between Greece and the Arab nations, and we also discussed the Palestinian problem. The discussion was very constructive. He enlightened me on many aspects of the Palestinian issue. With the foreign minister, who is present here, we also had a very interesting discussion. That was even better because he is a capable man.

[Xipolitidhis] Yasir 'Arafat was then visited by KKE parliamentary spokesman Kaloudhis who, coming out in the hall, stated: [Kaloudhis] I welcomed Chairman Yasir 'Arafat on behalf of the KKE Central Committee and I reiterated to him the KKE's assurance that it will continue to support the struggle of the Palestinian people with all its power. We particularly noted how conducive the efforts are here toward not only fully recognizing the PLO in Greece but also toward removing foreign bases and ensuring that our country's territory will not be used by either the Americans or NATO for intervention in the Middle East.

[Xipolitidhis] KKE-Interior Secretary General Drakopoulos, who also saw Yasir 'Arafat for talks, said: [Drakopoulos] We had a touching, substantive meeting because 'Arafat represents people who at this moment are struggling with weapons in their hands for self-determination and for their most fundamental rights -- that is, to set up their own state within the area of their country. He came here to our country to meet people -- representatives of parties -- our own people, who are also struggling today for the promotion of change, for securing independence and for social progress. We think that in this struggle the two peoples meet -- each with their own goals. We believe our country must be in firm solidarity with the Palestinian people and that this solidarity must constitute a basic (?fact) of its foreign policy, which will become stronger and stronger. We also believe this solidarity with the Palestinian people will help our struggle for freedom, independence and democracy in our country.

[Xipolitidhis] The next meeting the Palestinian leader had was with a representative of the United Democratic Left, Manolis Glezos, who stated: [Glezos] I think that, although it may sound a little apolitical, the most important thing 'Arafat told me was that when two fighters meet they encourage each other to carry on and to achieve their people's just rights.

[Xipolitidhis] EDEK Chairman Vasos Lissaridhis, who came to Athens for this very reason, also called on Yasir 'Arafat at the Grande Bretagne. Answering a question about the importance of his meeting with the Palestinian leader, Lissaridhis said: [Lissaridhis] It is well known that the Palestinian and Cyprus problems are connected. We believe there cannot be a solution of either the Middle East or the Cyprus problems unless both are solved properly -- which means that there should not be lost fatherlands, tutorship, intervention or refugees -- and unless the two peoples are given the opportunity to express how they wish to live. It is natural that during such meetings the Cyprus problem should constitute part of the basis of discussion and my presence here is in the sense that the Cyprus problem will be one of the focal points of discussion at this meeting which, I believe, will be historical not only for Palestine but also for the whole area, and for Cyprus in particular. [end recording]

MAJOR USSR TROOP BUILDUP ON EASTERN BORDER NOTED

[John Bulloch dispatch]

[Text] Van, eastern Turkey -- Turkey has warned America and its other NATO allies that the next confrontation with Russia is likely to come in the mountains of eastern Anatolia where the communist and Western worlds meet. Turkish political and intelligence analysts have noted a big build-up of Soviet forces on the border with Iran. Additional mechanised brigades have been moved into the area. They also report that third-rate garrison troops have been replaced with crack divisions apparently moved from the Chinese frontier.

Turkish officials had hoped to impress their fears on Mr Haig, American secretary of state, who was to have visited Ankara yesterday. He cancelled his trip because of the Polish crisis and attended the meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Brussels. The Turks have noted with apprehension the Soviet moves just across their border. But they are clear that the direct threat is not to Turkey but to Iran. They are asking that America and NATO should be prepared to counter any Soviet action.

Already some quiet preparations have been made. In Van, the biggest Turkish town on the Iranian border, which is also close to the Soviet Union, Turkish paratroops -- the elite force of the Turkish Army -- have moved in. With American help, military communications are being improved so the Turkish commanders in Van can control their vast army area. New equipment is being installed at the small Van airport so military jets can use it as a base. Dozens of lorries have been diverted from other work for use in improving the main road from Van to the Iranian border town of Saray. And Turkish security and intelligence men keep in close touch with the Kurdish villagers who move freely across the border over unmarked tracks and see much of what is going on.

Mr Haig and Mr Weinberger, American defence secretary who was in Ankara a week ago, accept the Turkish evaluation of the situation. They believe that when Ayatollah Khomeyni goes, civil war will break out in Iran. When that happens the Tudeh, the Iranian communist party, will ally itself with one of the other groups. And if they meet stiff opposition as expected, the Tudeh will ask for help from the Soviet Union. To counter this, America and Turkey want a far greater NATO presence in eastern Anatolia. Eventually they will send a mobile force from Allied Command Europe, to train in the border region. Such a force would include British units which carried out manoeuvres in Thrace last year, so a precedent exists for a deployment in Turkey. But this time the move will be meant -- and seen -- as a warning to Russia not to interfere in Iran.

Other steps are also being taken. A chain of radar and listening posts along the Soviet border is being improved and extended and more NATO technicians are now helping Turkish officers. America has agreed in principle to supply new weapons to Turkey and to improve and upgrade some existing arms. The Americans are also planning to establish stockpiles of arms and ammunition in the east of the country, ready for use if the Soviets should move into Iran. Turkish Foreign Ministry officials point out that Turkey has "correct" relations with Russia and wants to do nothing which could antagonise their powerful neighbor.

TURKMEN ON RUMORS OF GREEK TROOPS IN CYPRUS

TA151554 Ankara ANATOLIA in French 1545 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, 15 Dec (AA) -- In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga airport before leaving for an official visit to Beijing, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that the landing of Greek troops on Cyrpus would be in contradiction of existing agreements and international law and would constitute a source of tension.

The foreign minister recalled that Greece lost all its rights in the Cyprus issue by failing to fulfill its obligations as stipulated in the guarantee agreements. Turkmen added that nevertheless his ministry has not yet assessed the situation and his remarks would be pertinent if rumors that Greek troops had landed in Cyprus were confirmed.

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen departed Turkey today for an official visit to the PRC. In a statement before his departure, Turkmen said that deep-rooted and historic ties exist between Turkey and the PRC. Noting that the PRC is a country whose importance and responsibility is growing in world affairs, Turkmen said that that is why he attaches a special meaning to his talks to be held during his visit. Turkmen expressed his conviction that his visit would contribute to the promotion of relations, particularly in the economic field, between the two countries. Turkmen also said he has postponed his scheduled visit to Thailand as a result of the latest developments in the international situation and that he would make the trip later.

Answering a question by a correspondent on press reports to the effect that Greek troops have landed in Cyprus. Turkmen recalled that peace has reigned in Cyprus since 1974 and that there was no situation that would justify such a move. Turkmen continued: Greece has failed in the past to fulfill its commitments as stipulated in the guarantee agreements. It refused to act when the constitution was violated in Cyprus and its territorial integrity was threatened. On the contrary, it has exerted efforts in the opposite direction. As a result, Greece has lost its guarantee rights. The landing of Greek troops on Cyprus would contradict existing agreements and international law and would create a new source of tension. Turkmen said his ministry had no confirmation of Greek troops landing in Cyprus.

TCP STATEMENT ASSAILS CLOSER RELATIONS WITH U.S.

TA151243 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Turkish Communist Party Central Committee statement dated 13 December]

[Text] The outcome of the talks between U.S. war minister Weinberger and the junta has brought about a new development contrary to our country's national security and to peace in the region. U.S. imperialists are further increasing their pressure on our country to transform it into a base of aggression and a springboard against the national liberation movements in the region, and especially against the Soviet Union. This pressure is closely linked with U.S. moves to hinder detente, tip the military balance in its favor and deploy new nuclear missiles in Western Europe.

Through an organ called the joint defense group, which was formed following the talks between the junta administration and the U.S. war minister, and through the secret deal on the more extensive use of the U.S. bases, the U.S. imperialists have achieved a new and significant step toward these aims. Under the guise of acting together in possible crisis situations in the region, this group was established against the Soviet Union, Islamic countries and all the national liberation movements in the region. The junta is thus retreating from its long-standing statement that Turkey does not consent to actions outside NATO and, in practice, is joining a body in which Turkey will be included in aggressive actions by U.S. imperialists directed at the region. The establishment of this group is the implementation of the U.S. imperialist plan to extend NATO's sphere of influence outside NATO through bilateral agreements.

Through this agreement the junta is taking a dangerous step in favor of U.S. imperialism in its (?balanced) foreign policy full of contradictions. This step contradicts the junta's statements on establishing neighborly and friendly relations of cooperation with Islamic countries and the Soviet Union and socialist countries. The dangers recently have increased. The elimination of all basic democratic rights and freedoms by the reactionary military dictatorship and the economic policy favoring the monoplies is weakening our country's resistance in the face of imperialist pressure. The pressure on anti-imperialist forces by the reactionary junta administration and the continuous arrests of communists and all those in favor of democracy are helping the reactionary pro-American forces within and outside the army to strengthen their positions.

The releasing of fascist NAP ringleaders one after the other, the trials of Turkish Communist Party [TCP] and Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] members and Ecevit's arrest on the one hand and the recent pressure applied by the United States on the other, are not separate incidents. From the beginning the TCP said threats can be averted only if all national democratic forces unite. Everyone must draw the necessary conclusions from current developments.

No doubt, not all imperialist pressures have attained their goal. The goal to use Turkey as a base for the RDF has not yet been realized. The most open supporters of U.S. imperialism have not yet succeeded in ensuring the full ratification of imperialist plans. Moreover, the establishment of the so-called joint defense group is provoking public reaction. Broad circles are now aware of the threats this course of events will pose to our country. Hatred is rising against U.S. imperialism among the ranks of our working class, the toilers, patriotic intellectuals, officers and youths.

The following conclusion must be drawn: It is possible to prevent the deployment on our soil of the aggressive units called the RDF -- be it U.S.-stamped or NATO-stamped -- only through unity of the national democratic forces. Turkey's national security can be secured through the establishment of neighborly and friendly relations and cooperation with the socialist countries and Islamic countries, and not by serving as a tool for the adventurist plans of the U.S. imperialists. The TCP calls on everyone who loves his country to unite and struggle to disband the joint defense group and close our territories to the aggressive U.S. and NATO units, against the slavery agreements with the United States and the nuclear and spy bases.

ISRAELI DECISION ON GOLAN HEIGHTS DENOUNCED

NC151716 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] The Government of Cyprus has denounced Israel's decision to annex the Syrian Golan Heights. In a statement today, Foreign Minister Rolandhis said that such an action constitutes not only a flagrant violation of the principles of international law and the UN charter but also complicates the Middle East problem even more and undermines world peace and security. Mr Rolandhis added: The Cyprus Government believes that it is an urgent need for the Israeli parliament to revise its decision on the annexation of the Golan Heights and that Israel should not proceed with the implementation of this illegal decision.

Mr Rolandhis also stressed that Israeli troops should withdraw from the occupied lands without any further delay in full implementation of the UN resolutions. He reiterated that the Cyprus Government fully supports the restoration of Syria's territorial integrity and sovereignty. Mr Rolandhis stressed that the occupation of foreign territories constitutes a heinous action and that the annexation of another country's national territory constitutes an impious act.

RED CROSS TO TAKE 36 TONS OF SUPPLIES TO POLAND

[Excerpts] Kiel, 16 Dec (DPA) -- A ferry left Kiel for Gdynia this morning with 36 tons of supplies for Poland on board. Food for children and other foodstuffs, medicines as well as basic medical and sanitary goods, to the tune of almost DM500,000 were loaded onto 17 German Red Cross [DRK] trucks. The goods were financed by donations and funds of district organizations of the DRK. Thanks to its status, the Red Cross is still able to run its planned convoy despite the state of emergency imposed 3 days ago.

MINTOFF TO CONTINUE SOCIALIST GOVERNMENT POLICY

NC151902 Valetta Radio Mediterran in English 1835 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] Valetta -- Prime Minister Dom Mintoff last night, while claiming victory in last Saturday's elections, said that his Socialist government will continue with its program of reforms begun in 1971 while [word indistinct] democracy.

Mintoff spoke to journalists after being assured by officials that his Labor Party won 34 of the 65 seats in the single chamber parliament, retaining the 3-seat majority that will give him another 5 years in power in this strategic Mediterranean island. He said that he wanted to reassure the rival Nationalist Party of Edward Fenech-Adami that the Socialist government will fully respect the true spirit of democracy. He said that his government would not tolerate violence from whichever quarter it may come. Thousands of Maltese yesterday deserted their jobs and took to the streets in motorcades and boisterous marches since the early hours of the morning shouting victory slogans. Mintoff polled a record 10,469 votes in his native dockside district of (?Cosigua), from where he has drawn support for his Labor Party for the past 33 years.

PLANS TO REVAMP MILITARY HIERARCHY REPORTED

[Text] Madrid, 15 Dec (AFP) -- The Spanish Government plans to revamp the country's military hierarchy, making major changes in the joint chiefs of staff, well-informed sources here said today. The sources said the government planned to accelerate the changes, which were decided upon after the aborted coup attempt in February, following the publication on December 6 of a manifesto signed by 100 officers expressing their sympathy for the coup leaders. In recent days, there have been reports on friction between Defense Minister Alberto Oliart and the current military hierarchy. Reliable sources said that the government had categorically denied a demand by various generals that any nominations within the army be made by the army.

According to today's reports, land Army Chief of Staff Lt-Gen Jose Gabeiras is to be replaced either by Lt-Gen Ricardo Arozarena, who heads the Catalonia military region, or by Gen Jose Luis Aramburu Topete, who heads the Spanish Civil Guard and has been an outspoken supporter of constitutional monarchy. Last Saturday, King Juan Carlos met at length with the members of the joint chiefs, Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo and Defense Minister Oliart. Yesterday, the head of the Canary Islands military region, Lt-Gen Jesus Gonzalez del Yerro, who held unauthorized meetings last week with various political leaders, was recalled to Madrid by Lt-Gen Gabeiras.

ISRAELI ANNEXATION MOVE 'HARMFUL' TO PEACE

[Excerpt] Mrs Thatcher spoke tonight of her sorrow over the decision of the Israeli Government to annex the Golan Heights. She was addressing the board of deputies of British Jews at a dinner in London to mark the board's 220th anniversary. She said all members of the European Community were equally committed to the security of the state of Israel. "Our resolve that Israel should live in security and peace will not weaken. It is indispensible to our approach to the problems of the area. But if we demand these rights for one country and people we must be prepared to accord them to others, for justice and truth know no boundaries. It was with great concern that I learned last night of the decision of the government of Israel and the Knesset (parliament) to extend Israeli law, jurisdiction and administration to occupied Syrian territory in the Golan Heights."

Mrs Thatcher repeated what the EEC foreign ministers had said earlier today: "Such an extension is contrary to international law and therefore invalid in our eyes." She went on: "Therefore I say with the sorrow of a friend that this latest move is harmful to the search for peace. Real security can come only from a lasting peace recognized to be just and defended because it is just -- just to Israel, just to her neighbours and just to the Palestinians." Mrs Thatcher also attacked the Soviet Union over its harassment of Jews in that country, and spoke of her "concern and anxiety" over the situation in Poland.

KREISKY CRITICIZES ANNEXATION OF GOLAN HEIGHTS

AU161320 Vienna KURIER in German 16 Dec 81 p 2

[Report on press conference given by Chancellor Bruno Kreisky following 15 December cabinet meeting in Vienna]

[Excerpt] The annexation of the Golan Heights by the Israelis, carried out in the shadow of the Polish events, was assessed by Chancellor Kreisky on Tuesday very briefly but all the more sharply: "I consider this a violation of international law, like one of the many violations of international law that have been committed to date."

Defense Minister Roesch told KURIER in this context that there was no danger to the Austrian UN soldiers (about 500) stationed there, that there was no reason for withdrawing them. Roesch: "But, incidentally, that is a decision to be made by the UN secretary general. I hope that he will not do that -- he would make the same mistake as U Thant did in the past. When U Thant pulled UN soldiers out of the Gaza Strip, war broke out."

AUSTRIANS IN POLAND SAFE, WARSAW EMBASSY REPORTS

AU161133 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 16 Dec 81 p 4

[Text] According to a report from the Austrian Embassy in Poland, the Austrian citizens in Poland are all right. The access routes to the embassy are open, but there are virtually no visitors coming to the embassy. Obviously the Poles are reacting to a decree of the military council which has declared all passports without a special stamp as invalid. Hence it is completely irrelevant "whether anyone gets an Austrian visa or not," the report says. (The abolition of visas is at present being loudly demanded by the Austrian People's Party.)

The deputy leader of the so-called "Rural Solidarity," Antol, who is at present staying in Graz at the invitation of the Austrian People's Party farmers league, has declared that he wants to stay in Austria "to wait and see how things develop."

INTERIOR MINISTRY REPORTS ON POLISH REFUGEES

AU161111 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 16 Dec 81 p 8

[Summary] According to an Interior Ministry release, 81 Polish citizens seeking political asylum in Austria crossed the Austrian border between Sunday at 1700 and Monday at 1700. In the same period, 33 Poles were denied entry. On Monday, only 14 visas were issued at Austrian border checkpoints. Most of the Polish refugees came via the CSSR, Yugoslavia and Italy: 30 through Lower Austrian border checkpoints, 22 through Styrian and 11 through Carinthian border checkpoints. An Interior Ministry spokesman declared that only those Poles who arrived at checkpoints on the borders of Western neighbor countries were denied entry, in other words countries where they could also have requested political asylum without risking persecution. Moreover, none of these persons could produce any evidence qualifying them for political asylum, the spokesman said, adding that border control authorities are making their own decisions and consulting central police authorities only in complicated cases.

PAHR CRITICIZES PRC ATTITUDE TOWARD WALDHEIM

[Text] In a talk with DIE PRESSE, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr yesterday expressed his disappointment over China's attitude which brought down the renewed candidacy of Kurt Waldheim as UN secretary general.

This attitude was in contrast to the "original, friendly statements vis-a-vis Waldheim," Pahr said. Although there would be no deterioration of relations between Vienna and Beijing, China's attitude in the UN Security Council vote is "nevertheless a factor that will have to be considered in assessing future Chinese-Austrian relations," the foreign minister declared, adding that, in other words, it would be necessary in the future to take into consideration how much Chinese statements are worth.

KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON MIDEAST PROBLEMS

PM161411 Beirut AL-BAYRAQ in Arabic 5 Dec 81 pp 6, 7

[Milhim Karam interview with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky in Vienna -- date of interview not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] How are your relations with the Palestinians now, in the wake of the incident at Vienna airport, where some Palestinians were detained for possessing arms?

[Answer] The principle remains that the PLO is the official representative of the Palestinians. One might debate the methods and ways of self-expression -- like, for example, what happened after As-Sadat's assassination. Nevertheless, the principle that the PLO is the acknowledged legitimate representative of the Palestinian people still stands. We now have to solve the problems of representation between the Austrian Government and the PLO.

[Question] What about your relations with the Israeli Government?

[Answer] They are very straightforward but of course, to be frank, sometimes strained as a result of my comprehension of the truth about the Palestinian problem.

[Question] Do you believe that Europe can, alone and without liaison with the United States, take an initiative in favor of the Arab cause?

[Answer] Yes, because West Europe is economically linked with the Arab world. Geographically we are very close and we have longstanding ties and excellent economic relations. Europe is free to turn to the Arab countries without the United States. Having said this, I must add that, for a solution to be achieved, U.S. public opinion must be influenced and this makes it necessary to begin with the United States itself.

[Question] What is the state of your relations with communism and how do you assess Marxism?

[Answer] We have no relations with the communists. The Communist Party is practically nonexistent in Austria, representing less than two percent, which is a very difficult situation for the Marxists. Soviet Marxism in my opinion is a feeble structure. Naturally Marx was a very important man but it is impossible in this day and age to follow a policy inspired by his views.

[Question] You were the only West European leader to receive Yasir 'Arafat officially. How are your relations with the PLO chairman and what do you think of the Palestine problem?

[Answer] The Austrian Government has recognized Mr 'Arafat as the PLO chairman and has recognized the PLO as representative of the Palestinian people. Our relations have always been and will remain sound as long as the PLO maintains proper relations with Austria.

[Question] Would you advocate an international conference on the Middle East with Palestinian participation?

[Answer] Yes, naturally. We support the reconvening of the Geneva conference with Palestinian participation. We will certainly oppose such a conference if it is to be held without Palestinian participation.

[Question] Have you bought Mirage-50 fighters from France?

[Answer] No, we do not have sufficient funds.

SCHMIDT POSITIVE TO CABINET ON VISIT TO GDR

LD161634 Hamburg DPA in German 1453 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has expressed optimism at the possibility of reaching agreements with the GDR in various fields during the coming months. Addressing the federal cabinet, the chancellor, like SED General Secretary Erich Honecker in an interview in NEUES DEUTSCHLAND, again assessed the summit meeting in the GDR last weekend in a positive light.

Schmidt expressed the hope that Honecker would come to the FRG for his planned reciprocal visit within the year. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker went on to say, however, that no date had been fixed for the visit yet. In the intervening period, the chancellor believed, "a number of agreements" were possible.

Becker named as topics for discussion at the planned talks with the GDR, referring to reports from Ministers Egon Franke and Otto Graf Lambsdorff; a new formal agreement on the interest-free overdraft credit for the GDR, which for the time being has been extended until the end of June 1982, amounting to DM850 million a year, a skeleton economic agreement, (?making) West Berlin's waters free of pollution, and electrifying the rail link from Braunschweig through the GDR to West Berlin. After his talks with GDR Foreign Affairs Minister Oskar Fischer, Franke said in the cabinet session that he was confident that further progress would be achieved in improving human contacts.

Deputy Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher, in a summary of the lengthy cabinet debate on the GDR trip, according to Becker, described the summit as an important contribution to stabilizing East-West relations and to the development of intra-German relations. He drew attention to the fact that Schmidt's visit had been supported by the Western allies. Schmidt described his talks with Honecker as essentially difficult and with no possibilities of bridging the gap on the fundamental differences of opinion. He said while the tone of the talks was neighborly, relations were far from neighborly.

Becker said Schmidt emphasized his personal experience in visiting Guestrow cathedral. The rigid security measures in the town of Mecklenburg were, according to Becker, not discussed by the cabinet. The government spokesman announced that Schmidt, in his government statement on the summit to the Bundestag on Friday, would comment on Honecker's interview. Becker said his own impression was that all of Honecker's remarks had been fully in line with the Werbellinsee talks.

BRANDT ON SCHMIDT VISIT TO GDR, POLISH SITUATION

DW161115 Hamburg Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1108 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Interview by reporter Burchardt with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt; place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] The first intra-German meeting was on 19 March 1970. You personally were the first chancellor of the FRG to visit the GDR. Do you see a difference between your visit 11 years ago and the recent visit by Helmut Schmidt to Werbellinsee and Guestrow?

[Answer] I found that the Guestrow events were depressing as far as one could see. Actually I found it embarrassing. But that does not change anything about the fact that I assess the visit as a whole most positively.

I believe one will see in the next months, in the new year, that the development of de facto relations will be possible in a number of fields, and that the role of both German states in the European process of safeguarding peace will become clear.

[Question] What fields do you think will be recognizable next year with regard to progress?

[Answer] I believe one should not go into detail now, but economics always plays a great role. There are clear interests on both sides. Our side is clearly interested in improving travel possibilities and not jeopardizing them. I also believe some things can be achieved there.

[Question] You are a Berlin politician. It would be interesting to learn from you, as somebody who has been mayor of Berlin for many years, what you think of the different reactions of CDU/CSU politicians to the Schmidt visit. One hears considerably more moderate reactions from Berlin CDU/CSU politicians than from Strauss or Werner, for instance, who take a most negative view of this visit.

[Answer] What you call negative, I would term even more critically. I found what we have heard lately terribly immature. I found it highly interesting -- it has been almost ignored in the past few days -- that it turned out during Brezhnev's visit that Berlin will be involved in the natural gas deal, that important energy measure. That was different before. According to the earlier approach, West Berlin was not to be included in such an agreement between the Federal Republic and the USSR.

Second, as for the gentlemen of the CDU/CSU you mentioned, I find it quite natural that those who bear responsibility in Berlin remember earlier years very well, when one could not travel, not even from one part of the city to the other, and when people from West Berlin did not have a chance at all to visit the GDR. The West Germans always had such an opportunity, although it was limited. Those people have seen the positive changes. They also very much regretted the fact that the increased exchange rate had decreased the number of visitors, and they hope very much that no new restrictions will take place in this and other fields, but that there will be improvements serving meetings in Berlin and around Berlin.

[Question] A formula for the final Helsinki CSCE document plays an important role with regard to the intra-German meeting, a formula called confidence-building measures. This intra-German meeting is also considered by both sides as a confidence-building measure. In what context do you see all these meetings with a view to the further development of the CSCE process?

[Answer] I still believe -- if Polish developments will not hamper it -- that an agreement can be achieved on a special conference dealing with disarmament problems -- not with problems to be discussed between the world powers but with problems which can be handled by European states in the East and the West and by the neutrals. And if this is so, a most important role will be played by both German states. In this respect it made good sense that Chancellor Schmidt emphasized neighborly relations in his statements.

[Question] You have just used the key word "Poland" in your answer. When Helmut Schmidt was still a guest in the GDR, the first news arrived about Polish developments. Should Schmidt have broken off his visit?

[Answer] Certainly not. How would that have helped? I find individual comment in this connection terrible -- comment that was not very helpful and considerate with regard to our Polish neighbor. No, it was correct to continue the visit and not to make strong statements, pretending to be able to help those in a difficult situation.

[Question] Western governments particularly adhere to the noninterference principle. The question is how the Soviet Union will act and how the Warsaw Pact states will act. You have just indicated this. Do you consider it possible and desirable for Helmut Schmidt to use his revived contacts with Erich Honecker and Leonid Brezhnev to exert a moderating influence on East Berlin and Moscow?

[Answer] I am certain that this would not be anything new. One can assume that contacts have been made repeatedly lately, or that existing contacts have been used to point out to the various parties involved how important it is that Poland go its own way. It is certainly necessary to realize how important Poland is for general developments in Europe. But blaming those now who bear responsibility there does not help. It is certainly not acceptable to me that trade union leaders are being detained. I cannot approve of that. But on the other hand I find it terrible when somebody who bears a certain responsibility in the Bundestag, namely the CSU, says this is just another form of Russian intervention or occupation. That is an absolute misunderstanding of the facts. As one can gather from the statements by the primate of the Polish Church, it is a new and difficult attempt to prevent the break-up of the state and the further deterioration of the economy. Both are important for those directly involved as well as for their neighbors.

GOVERNMENT VOICES 'CONCERN' AT POLISH SITUATION

[Text] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government stressed its concern today at the situation in Poland. It is following developments with particular attention.

Following a session of the cabinet, Government Spokesman Kurt Becker said that the Federal Government fully endorses the statement by the EEC foreign ministers in London on Tuesday in which they expressed concern at the declaration of martial law in Poland and the arrest of trade unionists. The foreign ministers called on all signatories of the Helsinki Final Act to refrain from interfering in Poland's internal affairs.

Becker stressed to the press that, since it is exceptionally difficult at the moment to gather facts about the situation in Poland, the cabinet was very restrained in making a definitive assessment of the situation. The strict policy of noninterference pursued by Bonn also includes restraint in public assessments.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman reported that communications between the Foreign Ministry and the German Embassy in Warsaw are not disrupted at present. However, it is impossible for the embassy to report on the situation in the country in such a way as to enable the Federal Government to make a safe overall assessment. The embassy personnel are subjected to the same restrictions as the Polish population. If they want to move outside the Warsaw city precincts they must apply for permission. Embassy personnel have not left Warsaw since the state of emergency was imposed. This is due to various reasons, including the shortage of gasoline.

Aid to Warsaw Embassy Staff

LD161826 Hamburg DPA in German 1806 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA) -- The Bonn Foreign Ministry has "initiated steps" against the restrictions placed on the freedom of movement of West German Embassy personnel in Warsaw, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said tonight, without giving details. The personnel of foreign embassies in Warsaw are subject to the same restrictions under martial law as the local population, which includes a 2220-0600 curfew. Permission has to be sought for leaving the Warsaw city area. As telephone and telex links have been cut, the Bonn Foreign Ministry is in radio contact [with the embassy in Warsaw]. The spokesman said that radio traffic has not been disturbed.

BISHOPS VOICE CONCERN FOR POLAND IN STATEMENT

LD171127 Hamburg DPA in German 1003 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA) -- The German bishop's conference has stressed the right of the Polish people to self-determination.

A statement published today by the chairman of the bishops' conference, Cardinal Joseph Hoeffner, says that all attempts to break this right forcibly from within or without endanger world peace and the efforts for detente and disarmament.

Hoeffner said that the German bishops were deeply concerned at the distress of the Polish people and at the personal fate of so many individuals. The fresh tragedy brought them distress and great suffering. As a result of martial law thousands of people had been detained merely because they supported rights that we regarded as axiomatic. "In deep solidarity with the Polish people we pray to God that he may show the right path so that bloodshed may be avoided and the way to a peaceful development made possible." All the faithful ought to pray for the Polish people and for world peace.

The bishops' conference stressed its solidarity with the primate of Poland and the Polish clergy. It appealed to all people to keep up the assistance to Poland and expressed thanks for the aid rendered so far. This support was not only a contribution to the overcoming of the trouble but was also "a sign of solidarity, sympathy and compassion."

GOVERNMENT TO AID ETHNIC GERMANS IN POLAND

LD161816 Hamburg DPA in German 1706 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] Goettingen, 16 Dec (DPA) -- Andreas von Schoeler, parliamentary state secretary in the Federal Ministry of the Interior, told an advent meeting at the Friedland transit camp near Goettingen today that the Federal Government will continue to work for the departure of Germans and ethnic Germans who wish to leave the Polish People's Republic. At present it is not clear whether exit permits will be granted in the future. So far Poland has fulfilled its obligations under the Warsaw treaty to allow Germans to leave. This year almost 68,000 people have moved from Poland to the Federal Republic, the largest number since 1958. Von Schoeler told the 400 people present that the Federal Government has not forgotten the families these people left behind in Poland. Since 1950 about 680,000 resettlers from Poland have found a new home in the Federal Republic.

According to the camp management, there are at present about 1,000 resettlers and 164 Vietnamese refugees in the almost overcrowded camp. Since the imposition of martial law at the weekend 207 resettlers have been allowed to leave Poland.

DKP VOICES APPROVAL OF POLISH EMERGENCY LAW

LD161408 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1324 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] Duesseldorf, 16 Dec (ADN) -- The DKP Presidium has commented on the measures in Poland, saying: "Poland needs stability. Europe needs security." It was obvious that Poland was being driven to catastrophe by irresponsible elements. "They made no secret of their intention to undermine the foundations of the socialist system and finally to do away with socialism. The military council which has now been formed is pursuing with the measures it has taken the aim of preserving Poland from this disaster, of protecting the constitutional order." In view of these efforts, the DKP supports everything that serves to consolidate socialism in Poland and thus detente and security in Europe.

GENSCHER RECEIVES CSSR'S FOREIGN MINISTER

LD171410 Hamburg DPA in German 1250 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today received Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Bohuslav Chnoupek in Bonn for a 2-day exchange of views. In talks between the delegations and in private conversation, possibilities for intensifying mutual relations, and the international situation, including disarmament problems, East-West relations and North-South issues are to be discussed.

Chnoupek is the first member of a government of a Warsaw Pact state to visit a Western country since the outbreak of the Polish crisis. He will also be received by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn.

SCHEDULE OF SCHMIDT VISIT TO U.S. ANNOUNCED

LD161516 Hamburg DPA in German 1432 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is to meet U.S. President Ronald Reagan on 5 January in Washington. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker confirmed the date after the cabinet meeting in Bonn today. Schmidt will be returning from vacation in Florida at that time. In Washington the federal chancellor will also meet Vice President George Bush, Secretary of State Alexander Haig, and, according to Becker, probably other members of the U.S. administration. The federal chancellor is to spend just 2 days in Washington and will probably return to Bonn on 7 January. He starts his Florida vacation on 25 December.

GDR ATTEMPTS TO RECRUIT STUDENTS AS AGENTS

[Text] For several months the "GDR" has increasingly been hiring FRG pupils and students as agents, according to the Schleswig-Holstein Office for the Protection of the Constitution. The detention of numerous agents and the resultant withdrawal of other spies from the Federal Republic, according to information by this office, has "created large gaps" which the East Berlin Ministry of State Security has not been able to close. According to the findings of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution, the people recruiting the agents above all approach youths who have not graduated from school or terminated their vocational training. Apart from money, the youths are offered assistance during their training and help in getting a job. There are even cases where contact officers went from firm to firm in the Federal Republic to look for jobs, the Kiel Office for the Protection of the Constitution reported.

Among other things, the state security service used group tours by churches and school classes as well as day trips to East Berlin to contact the youths. Following a stay in East Berlin more than half the pupils of a Luebeck secondary school class had received personal letters with an invitation by a "work group for international economic and social politics" for a gratuitous 2-day stay during the Leipzig spring fair.

TIME 'RUNNING OUT' FOR SETTLEMENT IN POLAND

[Commentary by W. Hertz-Eichenrode: "Jaruzelski"]

[Text] So it is possible after all to cut off a whole country in the middle of Europe from the free flow of information. The communist military dictatorship in Poland provides proof. Uncensored news about the situation in Poland is as contradictory as it is scarce. But this much can be gathered: The military action has deprived "Solidarity" of a large number of its leaders, as well as of the leadership infrastructure. However, resistance still exists. It is natural that under existing circumstances the organization of underground resistance on a countrywide level needs time. This is exactly the time available to avoid the most extreme thing, namely a "Soviet solution." Against this background the Polish pope and the primate call for a "dialogue." Both still seem to consider it possible for the military regime and the trade union movement to reach agreement on the basis of the Polish national desire -- despite all confrontation -- to avoid Soviet intervention. Because of the proverbial hatred by the Poles for the Russians, such intervention would end in a blood bath. If the attempt to hold a "dialogue" fails, the decision would lie only between a "Soviet solution" -- even if it bore the name of a Polish politician or general -- and an open civil rights revolution. Time is running out. Everything probably depends now on how the following question is answered: Is General Jaruzelski a Polish nationalist or a Soviet communist, an agent of the Kremlin?

MITTERRAND DENOUNCES SITUATION IN POLAND

[Text] Pierre Beregovoy, Elysee secretary-general, has just read out a statement made by President Mitterrand at this morning's cabinet meeting. Dominique Souchier reports from the Elysee:

Whatever the result of external pressure or internal oppression may be, Francois Mitterrand said, the loss of public, collective and individual freedoms is in any case to be condemned and by reason of this should be clearly, vigorously and constantly denounced. Having noted that the freedoms of the trade unions and the freedom of expression, which were acquired in Poland only a short time ago, have been called into question, that an emergency regime has been installed, that numerous people have been arrested or are in one way or another being prevented from performing their activities and responsibilities which are nonetheless recognized in law, the government must demonstrate its disapproval of this state of affairs. It is indeed necessary for the Polish people to find in France's position a further reason for believing in their capacity to overcome the perils which are assailing them.

The president, after noting his complete agreement with the significance and import of the prime minister's statement on Sunday, said he believed that the latter should in an address to the National Assembly, inform the country on the one hand of the capability of France's disposal to go to the aid, morally and materially, of the just aspirations of the Polish people -- notably with a view to contribute to securing the release of the workers who are in prison today -- and on the other hand provide information which will allow as precise and full an appraisal of the international situation as possible.

That is the statement which Pierre Beregovoy has just this moment read out. I think Pierre Mauroy will make a statement in the National Assembly this afternoon.

At the Council of Ministers this morning the government also denounced the annexation of the Golan by Israel.

Premier Addresses Assembly

LD161530 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Pierre Mauroy has addressed the National Assembly, saying that France is concerned that Poland -- and I quote -- should find the paths of recovery and freedom through national entente and without any foreign interference for the moment. The events remain within the national framework, the premier continued, and we intend them to remain so. At a meeting of the cabinet, Francois Mitterrand instructed Pierre Mauroy to inform the country by addressing the National Assembly. The premier went on to say that France does not accept the serious measures decided on in Poland.

CHEVENEMENT VIEWS EUROPEAN MILITARY CENTER IDEA

PM161509 Paris LE MATIN in French 9 Dec 81 pp 4-5

[Guy Claisse, Robert Clarke and Jean-Pierre Mithois interview with Minister of Research and Technology Jean-Pierre Chevenement -- date and place not given]

[Excerpt] LE MATIN: In a speech to the West European Union a Socialist deputy advocated a "European military decisionmaking center." Does that strike you as desirable? Does that proposal not run counter to the principle of national independence which you hold dear?

Finally, does that idea express a majority opinion within the PS?

Jean-Pierre Chevenement: Allow me to remind you that we are committed to France's decisionmaking autonomy and, at the same time, to firm respect for our alliances. It is obvious that, given the French position in Europe -- between the FRG, Spain, Italy and Britain -- France has a European role. It cannot remain indifferent to what happens near its borders. On that basis a policy must be drawn up: Given its position, Europe is likely to be the theater for a future World War III. It may be limited but it will be a nuclear war. That has two consequences. The first is that every effort must be made to ensure that Europe remains a peaceful continent, and consequently that there is a reduction in the level of armaments piling up on it, on both sides of what is termed the Iron Curtain. The second consequence is that Europe needs to have its own nuclear capability. In the present situation only two countries have that capability: Britain and France. I welcome the decision taken by the president to launch a seventh nuclear submarine. I think that that is a step in the right direction. But nuclear weapons being what they are, I do not see how a European [international] political power could possess them.

LE MATIN: Have you detected a slide toward Atlanticism in the PS?

Chevenement: I observe that aside from the avowed solidarity between Europe and the United States, there is a certain difference of interests as regards the possibility of a limited nuclear war and hence a uniquely European awareness of the risks run in that connection. However, that European awareness does not necessarily go in the direction of Atlanticism. Let's take an example: The events in the FRG, the pacifist movement, would not be described by anybody as a sign of Atlanticism, on the contrary, they are a sign of distancing. At the same time they are a sign of Germany reappropriating its identity and its own short-term interests. It could be said to be an inadequate reappropriation. I personally think that is the case. But it is because Germany is in the front line and because it feels it is in danger of becoming the theater of a nuclear battle that this pacifist reaction is developing -- a reaction in which some people see the germ of a new nationalism. I do not think that is the right response but I observe the significance of that movement, which goes far beyond traditional pacifism. It is a national reaction.

LE FIGARO DISCUSSES FRENCH STRATEGIC FORCES

PM161421 Paris LE FIGARO in French 11 Dec pp 1, 6

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article]

[Text] The continuation of nuclear tests in the Pacific is obviously proof of the continuity of efforts to ensure that France has a credible national deterrent. In any case, it is consistent with a need shared by all nuclear powers -- new Soviet and U.S. tests following in the footsteps of hundreds of previous tests have regularly been announced without attracting notice. However, tests also indicate what strategic options have been determined -- they depend on the systems of arms which have been planned and on the doctrine of their utilization, and this is especially relevant to French strategy.

As we know, the aim of this strategy is to "deter" any aggressor by acquiring means capable of inflicting on him losses deemed unacceptable by him. In practice, it is a question of being able to destroy most of his industrial and demographic potential. What we are talking about, therefore, is a "countercity" strategy which aims at large-scale destruction.

It is a "sufficiency" strategy which does not aim to go very much beyond the means consistent with these objectives. The systems of arms chosen and the tests aimed at perfecting them must, therefore, be absolutely corollary.

The development of the M-4 missile has been a big step forward in recent years. As we know, 16 missiles of this type will be carried by the sixth missile-launching nuclear submarine, [SNLE] L'Inflexible, which will be commissioned in 1984-1985. Later, the four previously commissioned submarines will be in turn equipped with them. By the end of the present decade the first of these submarines -- L'Indomptable -- will become too old to warrant reequipment as well.

The technological "leap" from the M-20 -- the weapon with which the SNLE's are now equipped -- to the M-4 can be expressed through a comparison -- the M-20 missile carried a single one-megaton warhead while the M-4 missile has seven warheads -- in other words six nuclear charges and one dummy -- the charge being 150 kilotons. Indeed a very simple mathematical analysis shows that much greater destruction is caused with a multiplicity of small charges than with one bigger charge. But the M-4 will only fire "in cluster" and not "independently guided" nuclear warheads, as is the case with the U.S. or Soviet "MIRV'ed" missiles (a barbarism derived from the English expression Multiple Independently Targeted Reentry Vehicles).

The fact remains that the entry into service of submarines equipped with the M-4 will represent a real increase in the destructive capability of the naval component of the national deterrent force alone, to such an extent that it has been possible to say that a single submarine equipped in that way equals all the previous ones together from the viewpoint of nuclear fire-power.

A Crucial Stage

It is also during the past few years that French tests have made possible the development of the medium-range air-to-surface [ASMP] missile which marks a crucial stage for the nuclear arsenal. That was also dictated by strategy; the aim was to develop an air-to-surface missile to extend the penetration capability of aircraft which, we know, will find it increasingly difficult to bomb "from above" owing the progress in air defense; and it was necessary for its destructive capability to correspond to the "countercity" missions given to our deterrent forces, the ASMP having, in fact, a 300-kiloton charge (around 20 times the size of the Hiroshima bomb). But the most significant characteristic of the new missile is that it has, to use the accepted expression, a "scanning head" [tete tournante], in other words it will move toward its target in accordance with data which its flight path "incorporates" as the target approaches.

The major achievment of the next few years will result from the advances represented by the M-4 and the ASMP. Indeed the M-5 will represent both a quantitative and qualitative change in the armament of the SNLEs, of which a new generation will then have to be started -- in the middle of the decade, as Defense Minister Hernu announced, probably in 1994. The M-5 will have 10 nuclear warheads (4 more than the M-4) which will be "scanning" like those on the ASMP. Its entry into service will therefore represent a major increase in the French nuclear forces' level of credibility.

Tests

However, the nuclear tests are not only devoted to advancing the major arms systems. It seems that tests are carried out each year on weapons already in service -- missiles on the one hand and nuclear charges on the other -- to check that they are still efficient. But the experiments primarily take a few main directions: the miniaturization of charges, which is of considerable importance for the French nuclear arsenal since it will always only have relatively limited number of vehicles; particle devices -- such as the particle beam gun -- whose development will determine the possibility of their use but which, for example, could be effective in destroying or "upsetting" satellites; the study of "collateral damage," which is essential to gauge the extent and nature of the effects of the explosion of a nuclear charge outside the radius of assured destruction.

Seeing the efforts being made for the modernization and credibility of the deterrent force, you could rightly be reassured as to its future and consequently the country's security. Nonetheless the rate of progress and the choices made by the government can legitimately be discussed. In any case the question is relevant to the seventh nuclear submarine. Back in July we announced in these columns that it would be constructed. The decision to do so was made last month.

But a few days ago Mr Hernu explained that it would be a submarine of an entirely new generation which would therefore only enter service in the middle of the next decade. Hence, it must be admitted that it will not be a "seventh" submarine since Le Redoutable, the first to enter service, will by then have been taken out of commission. It is true that at the same time a significant effort will have been made to reduce time in dock so that at least three submarines are permanently at sea. The M-4s which will equip five units and the M-5s which will equip the unit which becomes operational in 1994 will in any case give the strategic ocean force a destructive capability several times greater than it now has.

However the choice that has just been made is disputable. The last few defense council meetings in 1980 had leaned toward the construction of a seventh submarine 2 years after the completion of the sixth -- a submarine which would have been derived from the latter and would have replaced L'Indomptable pending the entry into service of the first example of the new generation of SNLEs in the mid-nineties. That option seemed to have great advantages. In any case the objective is still to have a new submarine by that date which could be a "silo submarine," in other words one which does not have 16 but possibly 40 missiles which would naturally be M-5 missiles with 10 nuclear warheads.

The Bounds of Possibility

There is no doubt here about the course which should be adopted: As far as it is possible to see, the submarine will remain the most invulnerable element of the nuclear force and the choices can be made now, whereas it is easy to understand the government's hesitation over the nature of the strategic mobile surface-to-surface missiles which will take over and compensate for the progressive vulnerability of the Albion Plateau missiles or over the possible replacement of the Mirage 4 aircraft.

Nontheless France cannot do everything and the priority rightly given to the deterrent forces must lead to a revision of the structures of the armed forces both to adapt them better to the missions which French strategy gives them and to take account of the means available.

PAPERS COMMENTS ON POLISH DEVELOPMENTS

Polish People's 'Last Choice'

PM151449 Paris LE FIGARO in French 14 Dec 81 p 1

[Serge Maffert editorial: "Last Choice"]

[Text] The Polish Army's intervention in a crisis which began 18 months ago is arousing deep and legitimate emotion in France and among Western opinion. This latest development was the virtually inevitable outcome of a process which Poland, bound by a tragic destiny, could not escape.

In these columns our newspaper has frequently expressed a pessimism about the development of the Polish situation which, unfortunately, has proved justified.

It was a positive revolution, first socioeconomic and then political, which began in August 1980, first in Gdansk and then throughout Poland.

The regime installed after the war, which was increasingly incompetent and partially corrupt, had failed: The country was plunged into a deep material and moral crisis in which the official values were overwhelmingly disputed, even within the party.

Any revolution, even the most "reasonable" one, is in a way obliged to follow itself through to the end. It was, therefore, logical that a liberation movement, reflecting a people's deepest aspirations, could not stop halfway. This was the case even if compelling reasons made it necessary to try to do so -- an attempt made by the most moderate people in the party and Solidarity, with the church's help.

It must not be forgotten that, for 200 years, Poland has never experienced a normal national life (even between 1919 and 1939) and has never experienced democratic life. Is it therefore any surprise that a people which is so proud and attached to its national identity and freedoms should suddenly have been inspired by the prospects opened up in 1980?

What is gradually surfacing after the disappointments, the fairly well-founded trade union impatience, the brutal reactions followed by the relinquishment of power [abandon du pouvoir], all in an atmosphere of general incoherence? The aspiration to radical change sweeping away all the constraints imposed on the Polish state. In particular the famous geopolitical constraints (obviously Poland's membership of the Soviet camp, of the USSR's strategic satellite zone) were pushed to the back of people's minds, perhaps with the feeling that the USSR is not in a material and political position to intervene with all its forces to "restore order in Warsaw."

The next few hours will be crucial for Poland's future. Given the point his country had reached, General Jaruzelski could not act differently than he did Saturday night/Sunday morning. It is independent Poland's last gamble.

If he fails we will have massive intervention by the Soviet Union, with its tragic consequences, even if it has to postpone its decision for as long as possible. If he succeeds Poland will have paid for its national existence and return to stability with some of its people's emerging freedoms. It is up to the Poles and them alone to make this terrible choice. It is the last choice they have.

'Helmeted Communism' Takes Over

PM151455 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 14 Dec 81 pp 1, 4

[Benoit Rayski editorial: "Helmeted Communism"]

[Text] The trial of strength has started in Poland. And yesterday it took the form of what has to be called a putsch. It is a putsch organized by a desperate communist party which -- acting on specific instructions from the USSR -- has launched its army and police against a people it could not control. It is a putsch which has turned Poland into a country under martial law and subject to all the rigors of martial law, including the death penalty for striking workers. It is a putsch which has already led to hundreds of arrests, that of leaders of the Solidarity trade union -- the Polish people's only true representatives. It is a putsch which has given Poland -- still drunk with its new freedoms won by strikes and demonstrations -- a strange and bastard government unparalleled anywhere else: that of a communist military dictatorship.

Thus all the elements exist for a new tragedy to erupt in Poland: Indeed nobody could imagine that such a combative and courageous people as the Polish people will accept the rule of terror without responding and will allow themselves to be gagged without reacting. All the elements exist bar one: that of the constantly predicted and brandished threat of a Soviet intervention -- an intervention which is moreover completely pointless since in this case it was obvious from the start that the repression would be carried out by the Polish Army and police, acting on Moscow's behalf and on its orders.

This shows the astonishing, naive and incongruous (to say the least) nature of the remarks made by Claude Cheysson, who deemed it fit to welcome the fact that there has been no foreign intervention in Warsaw and to express the view that France "will do absolutely nothing" because he regards the events in Poland as a "purely internal" affair. Fortunately for France other statements, like those made by PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin and Premier Pierre Mauroy, corrected the external relations minister's strange assessment and recalled that our country could not remain indifferent to the crushing of freedoms in Poland.

For our Freedom

The tragedy in Poland is, of course, not an "internal affair." The Soviet Union does not regard it as such and is exerting all the pressure it can on that country, seeking to strangle it using the Polish Army. Nor can France and the other Western countries regard it as such since, if they did not react, they would be guilty of failure to assist a people in danger.

It is not only to win their freedom that the Polish people have fought and are still fighting, but also to defend ours. Events in Poland have shown that freedom is definitely incompatible with the communist system. Moreover that was what Francois Mitterrand wrote back in September 1980 concerning the Polish strikes: "I consider that it is absolutely impossible for the Marxist-Leninist system to coexist with freedoms." That diagnosis is now being confirmed in Warsaw, where those people -- already very few -- who still believed in a humane communism, are now discovering helmeted communism....

POPE'S 16 DEC APPEAL FOR DIALOGUE IN POLAND

LD161634 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 1515 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Statement by Pope John Paul II at general audience 16 December -- recorded]

[Text] Praise be to Jesus Christ. Dear compatriots, the events of recent days have turned the eyes of the whole world on Poland. This shows clear concern and at the same time solidarity with our people. I thank everybody for the expressions of solidarity which are so often addressed to me personally.

This concern is well founded; it is enough to read the sermon delivered on Sunday evening by the primate of Poland in the church of Our Lady of Grace in Warsaw to experience the measure of the concern inside the country, which by the introduction of martial law has been cut off from normal contacts with the rest of the world. The primate said: The Church has received with sorrow the news of the breaking off of the dialogue which was so difficult to establish, and the entering onto the path of violence, which is the state of martial law. This cannot happen without the violation of fundamental civil rights. In many cases it entails the neglect of human dignity, the arrest of innocent people, the humiliation of men of culture and science, and brings [words indistinct].

In such conditions, my concern again turns toward the fatherland, toward the people whose son I am, toward the nation which, like every nation and country, has the right to the particular concern of the Church. At this time this concern embraces Poland and all Poles. As a nation they have the right to live their own lives and to resolve their internal problems according to spirit of their own convictions in conformity with their acquired culture and national traditions.

These matters, which without doubt are difficult ones, cannot be resolved through the use of force; whence my summons and request, which I direct to all sons of the fatherland: There must be a return to the road of renewal created by the method of dialogue and respect for the rights of every man and citizen, and special respect for the rights of the working man. That road was not an easy one for understandable reasons, but it is not impossible.

The strength and dignity of the authorities is expressed through (?such a) dialogue rather than through the use of force. As early as Sunday, at the first report of the declaration of martial law, I recalled the words spoken in September: It is impermissible to shed Polish blood. I repeat that today. With the whole Church, and in particular with the Church in Poland, I commend my whole fatherland, this beloved nation, which, not for the first time, is being tested by the struggle for the proper right to be itself, to Christ, the Lord of the age to come, and his mother of Jasna Gora. ROME MIDEAST CONFERENCE VIEWS GOLAN ISSUE

[Text] Rome, 17 Dec (ANSA) -- Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) leader Yasir 'Arafat compared Monday's decision by the Israeli parliament to annex Syria's Golan Heights, occupied by Israel since 1967, as "a declaration of war that threatens not only the Mideast but the entire world," in a message sent to participants here at the "international conference on Jerusalem."

Both Italian and Arab nation participants in the meeting, which opened here in a conference room of the headquarters of the Italian lower house on Wednesday, expressed forceful condemnation for the surprise move by Israel.

A message sent by Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Fahd and read to the congress by the Saudi representative to the conference, states that "the European nations must intervene in favor of Israeli withdrawal from all the occupied territories."

Fahd's message also acknowledged Europe for "having moved in that direction in positions taken on the Palestinian problem."

The conference officially opened with a speech by Italian-Arab Friendship Association President Rinaldo Ossola who told his audience of Arab nation ambassadors and Italian and world experts on the "Jerusalem question" that the "arbitrary decision" perpetrated by Israel with the annexation of Jerusalem and the "illegal act" in relation to the Golan Heights were "events of extreme seriousness."

Ossolo also expressed the solidarity of his association with the Syrians. "The civilized world," he added, "must reject this act contrary to peace."

Italian Treasury Under Secretary Carlo Fracanzani joined the chorus of criticism for Israel during an address in which he said that Israel's move "consecrates the death of the Camp David agreements."

Fracanzani, who is also the president of the Italian-Palestinian Friendship Committee, further explained that the annexation was against the spirit of the agreement itself, which has been so praised by Israel and the Americans.

According to PLO delegation head (Abu Dadi), Israel is trying to divide the Arab camp but it will never succeed in stopping the Palestinian people from creating their own state, with Jerusalem as its capital."

In another address from the representative of the Arab League, Hasan 'Attiyah, the Iraqi delegate urged the conference to go beyond a mere condemnation of Israel.

"We need to propose the basis for approaching a concrete solution to the problem of Jerusalem, which is also the major problem for the Palestinians," 'Attiyah said.

Crown Prince Fahd's address also warned that Israel will never be able to stop Jerusalem from becoming the capital of the future Palestinian state, stressed that Israel is seeking to impose a Jewish character on a city considered holy by the three different monotheistic faiths and warned that archeological excavations underway there by the Israelis are threatening sacred Muslim sites.

A message from Crown Prince Hasan of Jordan warned that "ruling Jerusalem by force of arms and terror is in no way an acceptable solution."

Messages of solidarity also arrived for the conference participants on the part of numerous political groups.

Italian Senate President Amintore Fanfani, unable to attend the talks because of a busy parliamentary schedule, sent a telegram promising to meet with delegates today.

TEXT OF CALVO-SOTELO REMARKS ON MANIFESTO OF 100

PM161511 Madrid ABC in Spanish 11 Dec 81 p 6

[Excerpts] Madrid -- Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo opened the parliamentary session yesterday afternoon to explain the cabinet reshuffle. In the first part of his speech the prime minister gave a detailed and purely technical account of the reasons which rendered advisable the changes and the reallocation of responsibilities. At no time did he mention the people to whom he has assigned the various portfolios or refer to the political reasons for the reshuffle. The second part of Mr Calvo-Sotelo's speech was devoted to the issue of the so-called "manifesto of the 100."

Support Failed

He said verbatim: But the government changes are not the only political event which has held your attention since the last plenary session. A document signed by 100 army officers and NCOs appeared in the morning press last Sunday, and I would be lacking in the respect I owe this chamber if I left the rostrum today without noting and assessing such a grave event.

I will summarize briefly the information which is already common knowledge. The method exmployed in drafting the document, collecting the 100 signatures and presenting it to the news media was described by the joint chiefs of staff as an act of indiscipline affecting the loyalty due to superiors. The document, according to the same body, reveals an absolute lack of consonance with constitutional principles and with the tasks assigned to the armed forces in Article 8 of the constitution.

The captain-general of the First Military Region immediately placed the signatories under preventive detention and appointed a special judge to investigate the facts, determine responsibilities and impose the punishments appropriate under the law. An attempt to gather written support for the initial document has been abortive. The military command will realize that any support is an extremely grave breach of discipline and a breaking of the chain of command. Initial proceedings have already established greater responsibility on the part of five captains, who are being transferred to compulsory reserve status [situacion de disponible forzoso] until the legal proceedings have been completed. The government respects the exercise of military jurisdiction in the strictly military sphere, in accordance with the law, but it does not forget that the constitution bestows on it the power to direct the military administration of the state, nor should this be forgotten by those who appear mistakenly to suppose that the armed forces constitute an autonomous power independent of the civil power.

Maximum Severity

The government does not and cannot accept any control or supervision other than the control and supervision of the Cortes, which holds the legitimate representation of the people -- the sole source of power in a democracy. As prime minister, I regard the document and its circumstances as unacceptable, I reiterate my firm determination to ensure that the armed forces continue to respect the constitution and obey the government of the nation, in accordance with the provisions of the constitution itself, and I pledge myself before the chamber, which made its opinion known unequivocally during yesterday's session, to defend unswervingly the supremacy of the civil power and to nip in the bud the deplorable initiative with the utmost severity toward those who prove to be responsible, and at the same time to give the utmost respect to the armed forces -- the vast majority of whom have behaved exemplarily during the stage of the transition, and therefore deserve, as such armed forces -- the respect and gratitude of the entire Spanish people. Rest assured that nobody will outdo the government I head in defending the constitution and guaranteeing freedoms. And share with me the hope, served vigorously by a determined political will, of a long life for this constitution, which has just completed its first 3 years.

SLOW PROGRESS IN GOVERNMENT FORMATION TALKS

[Lisbeth Knudsen report]

[Text] The first round of negotiations about the formation of a new government after the election indicates that it could be difficult to clarify the situation before the new Folketing meets 21 December. Yesterday one by one the parties met acting Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen, who is leading the negotiations. Anker Jorgensen put forward an 11-point Social Democratic proposal. The comments on the proposal from the eight other parties showed that it will be impossible to form a broadly based government involving the Social Democrats and one or more of the larger nonsocialist parties. This had been the wish of the Radical Liberals. Comments also revealed most clearly that there is no possibility of cooperation between the Social Democrats, the Socialist People's Party and the Radical Liberals. A desire for this has been expressed by the Social Democrats.

Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen is taking a break in the negotiations over the weekend, and he will not be calling the Socialist People's Party and the Radical Liberals to separate talks until Monday. Part of the reason given for the slow pace of negotiations is the EEC summit to be held in London on Monday and Tuesday [14 and 15 December] on the British budget problem. It is being stressed that Denmark must be represented at the meeting by a functioning government. The parliamentary group chairmen of the parties in the Folketing were briefed yesterday on this important EEC meeting by the acting prime minister and they gave their approval to the stance that will be adopted by Denmark at the meeting.

PAPERS DISCUSS FOLKETING ELECTION RESULTS

'Polarization Increased'

PM111313 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 9 Dec 81 p 2

[Editorial: "Vote Shift"]

[Text] The voters have voted and decided what the new Folketing is to look like -- and the politicians have been given a task which for the time being looks almost hopeless. We had an election shift. Not that the result was such that the balance of strength between the two blocs was altered, but that polarization increased. And the Social Democratic Party was weakened. The victors in the election were the Center Democrats and the Socialist People's Party. The Conservatives did not win the major victory they felt was coming their way, but they did realize their dreams of becoming a bigger party than the Liberals.

The election had to come because the Social Democratic government had been blocked in its policies. The election was an appeal to the voters to create the conditions for both action and cooperation in the Folketing. The voters did not produce the clarification for which everyone had been hoping. Now we are faced with new problems. Of course, the outcome could be that Anker Jorgensen will continue as head of government. However, a precondition for this is that a majority in the new Folketing points to him as prime minister. Another requirement is that the Social Democrats must also decide to continue to bear the burden of government -- having paid the price for the reform of the country's economy which everyone knows is on the way.

'Right People Lost'

[Editorial: "The Election"]

[Text] The right people lost, but the wrong people won. This is a simple interpretation of the election. The Social Democrats suffered the expected defeat, but the Conservative People's Party and the Liberal Party did not win the victory which would position them as the parties able to construct a possible alternative.

The trade union federation went to the polls with Anker Jorgensen and brought him defeat. The election was called because the parties in the Folketing which normally support the Social Democrats on economic policy would not agree to the policy which the Social Democrats had worked out together with the trade union movement. There is no guarantee that the trade union movement is as upset by this as the Social Democrats must be. For the Social Democrats' losses were balanced by gains for the Socialist People's party. The center of gravity has moved left and Anker Jorgensen's chances of pursuing centrist policies have been weakened.

The pattern of support for his minority government which Anker Jorgensen has built on in the last 2 years no longer exists. Both the Radical Liberals and the Christian People's Party suffered losses. However, the Center Democrats made fine gains, but since it was Erhard Jacobsen's rejection of Anker Jorgensen's policies which was the direct cause of the election, it is unlikely that he will immediately want to lead his party into a partnership with the Social Democrats.

The Conservative People's Party had a good election and can be happy that it has made progress in three Folketing elections in a row. The Conservatives have recaptured their position as a large stable party. However, for the Liberals the election must be a disappointment. They have gone back to the position they were in before Poul Hartling won the great victory for them. The two parties' partnership did not succeed in winning the voters over to another policy. Part of the explanation is undoubtedly to be found in the coarse campaign the Social Democrats and the trade union movement mounted against the full plan which the two parties had drawn up as a basis for their work in the Folketing. It was a plan which was not the best platform on which to enter an election.

It is an encouraging sign that the Progress party has once again suffered major losses. Does the party now have any chance at all of winning the great victory? Mogens Glistrup still has considerable support among the voters, but this can hardly last. It is also encouraging that the Communists did not succeed in gaining entry to the Folketing this time either and that the Left Socialist party had a hard job holding onto its representatives. The Single Tax Party has been out of day-to-day politics before, but it has also demonstrated its survival capacity.

The main result of the election must be that the Social Democrats, who have had successes in two elections, this time suffered the defeat they should have suffered 2 years ago. It is a defeat which must have an effect on the patterns of cooperation which will be built in the new Folketing.

FINLAND

FOREIGN MINISTER, CP CHIEF COMMENT ON POLAND

PM161305 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 14 Dec 81 p 5

[FINSKA NOTISBYRAN, Ab. report]

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen was unwilling to comment on the situation in Poland Sunday. However, Vayrynen told FINSKA NOTISBYRAN in Mikkeli Sunday that the government's foreign affairs committee will meet Monday to form a picture of the situation.

Vayrynen said that he was told of the situation in Poland Sunday morning. He stressed that the Foreign Ministry is following the situation in Poland very closely the whole time.

The measures taken by the Polish Government and the PZPR came as no surprise to Finnish Communist Party Chairman Aarne Saarinen. He said Sunday that Finnish Communists and People's Democrats had always hoped that the crisis in Poland might be overcome through rational reforms and compromises without any military measures. "Unfortunately extremist elements have made this impossible. We have once again been given proof that extremist elements feed each other and of where this leads sooner or later," Saarinen said. Chairman Saarinen stressed that the Polish Government and the PZPR have demonstrated a far-reaching willingness to negotiate and great patience. According to him the government and party leadership had no alternative to resort to other than the present measures. "Extremist elements seem never to have enough. However, I hope that bloodshed can be avoided and that things will be able to return to normal as soon as possible," Saarinen said.

NORWAY

USSR REFUSED TO BUDGE ON BARENTS SEA DEMARCATION

PM160919 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 12 Dec 81 p 11

[Ulf Andenaes report]

[Text] Completely without result. This was the outcome of last week's negotiations between Norway and the Soviet Union on the demarcation line in the Barents Sea. Norway repeated its desire for a compromise solution, as our negotiators have been doing now for more than 4 years. But the Russians were unwilling to budge an inch.

One conclusion that is not difficult to draw is that the Soviet Union has absolutely no desire to reach a clear demarcation solution with Norway in the northern waters -- at least not for a long time to come. By preserving unclear demarcation lines and conflicting demands in dealing with a small and weaker neighbor the Soviet Union has assured itself a good negotiating lever in other dealings with Norway. The apportionment of the continental shelf is only one aspect of the question -- there are in addition the questions of the fisheries gray zone, rights in waters off Spitsbergen and so on. In a confused situation there could be Soviet hopes of achieving increased influence on Norwegian policy. Observers have come increasingly to the conclusion that the Russians' only objective in the latest round of talks was to test the new Norwegian negotiators and foreign policy makers.

It might perhaps be expected that the Norwegian negotiators would feel disappointed about a week without results. But they did not really have any advance expectations of progress. It will be up to the Soviet Union to take the next step. The next round of talks will take place in Moscow. The Russians themselves will be able to decide when they think the time is right to send an invitation to the Norwegians. This could take quite a long time. This time the final communique, of record brevity, -- all of nine lines -- only said that the negotiations took place in a friendly atmosphere. Friendly, but sluggish, one might say.

The leading Norwegian negotiator, Ambassador Helge Vindenes, said that a large part of the time was taken up with going through the legal aspects of the conflict. The Russians made a case for the special circumstances which in their view justify why the demarcation line should not be drawn along the median line, which is the principal method of solving such conflicts under the terms of the Geneva convention, and why instead the sector line should be adopted, which is what they want.

First, the Russians claim that the shape of the coastline is such that Norway has unreasonable advantage through the use of the median line. The Norwegian response is that on the contrary the Soviet Union comes out of such an arrangement very well.

Second, the Soviet Union claims that the length of the coastline benefits Norway. The Norwegian response is that this plays no part, and that even if the median line is accepted we would only have 38 percent of the disputed sea area. Further, the Soviet Union claims that its larger population must be taken into account. Norway dismisses this as completely irrelevant.

The Soviet Union also points to geological considerations. The rock types on the seabed are such that they constitute more of an extension of the Soviet coast than of the Norwegian. Norway dismisses this as quite incorrect. Finally the Soviet Union points out that the continental shelf is of great economic and security policy significance for it. Norway responds that its significance is no less great for us in these respects.

The sector line, which is the solution supported by the Soviet Union, is also called "the Western boundary of the Soviet Union's polar possessions" by the Soviet negotiators. The Russians have not shown the least urgency in commencing exploratory oil drilling in the disputed waters. Nor have they any need to. That part of the Barents Sea which is undisputedly Russian is big enough for them to be able to test the technology they will need there for a long time to come. The Soviet Union perhaps feels satisfied with the turn things have taken after a decade's negotiations. Now the situation is such that if the Russians suddenly agree to a solution now, this would look like a generous Russian concession. But the Soviet Union has had at the same time to experience the firmness and the expert strength on the Norwegian side after its test round with our new negotiators.

SWEDEN

PAPERS ASSESS DEFENSE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

PM081053 [Editorial Report] Stockholm newspapers of 2 December carry editorials on the proposals presented by the Riksdag defense committee for the economic framework for defense spending in the 1982-1987 period. The general reaction is to deplore the lack of agreement between the various political parties represented on the committee and to stress the importance of adequate Swedish defenses in the changing international situation. The economic difficulties facing Sweden are also acknowledged.

DAGENS NYHETER in its page 2 Svante Nycander editorial expressed regret that the defense committee did not give any consideration to a proposal that significant savings could be made by abandoning the "sacred cow" of general conscription; a smaller number of men doing national service every year would mean considerable savings without impairing the armed forces' effectiveness. In the desire for a defense policy with as broad support as possible the paper calls on the Social Democrats, whose budget proposal was the lowest put forward, to join with the Center and Liberal parties. "We support the plea from STOCKHOLMS-TIDNINGEN (Social Democrat) to the Social Democrats to add the extra millions of kronor necessary for the party's agreement with the Center and Liberal parties. A broad defense policy, including the air force, would be of the greatest importance for our security policy, as well as improving the political climate in general. The distance between the three parties, in money terms, is so small that it cannot reasonably be allowed to stand in the way of a joint solution -- a defense alliance."

SVENSKA DAGBLADET in its page 2 editorial takes the line of nonsocialist cooperation and gives its support to the moderate coalition party proposal: "In SVENSKA DAGBLADET's view the Moderates' framework proposal should be taken as the point of departure for a nonsocialist solution, for there must be a dividing line between the nonsocialists and the Social Democrats who pat themselves on the back for undertaking a gradual but one-sided disarmament (in Denmark, for example, defense spending is rising by 2 percent and in Norway by 4 percent). It is impossible to make it seem likely that we will not get armed forces substantially more able to meet the demands placed on them for the 300 million kronor the Moderates want to add to the Centrist party's proposal."

"Therefore SVENSKA DAGBLADET only needs repeat its views of last Saturday -- it would be unreasonable and irresponsible not to show that nonsocialist Sweden is capable of uniting and taking joint responsibility for the defense forces."

PAPERS VIEW IMPOSITION OF MARTIAL LAW IN POLAND

'Free World' Must Condemn

PM141559 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 14 Dec 81 p 10

[Editorial: "Mailed Fist in Poland"]

[Text] General Jaruzelski's military coup against the Polish nation and its authentic representative, Solidarity, must be condemned by the whole of the Free World. It is a fateful act intended, according to all the indications, as the one remaining option before the last resort of invasion by the Russian Army. Yet it may well cause this very calamity by provoking general strikes and national resistance which Polish troops may be unable or unwilling to crush. General Jaruzelski, both as leader of the totally discredited Communist Party and of what was already an equally discredited de facto military government, has carried out a putsch by a Communist junta. He is taking this desperate gamble in the hope that his swoop will paralyse Solidarity and that the Polish workers will meekly tolerate the arrest of their leaders and the loss of their hard won democratic gains.

Both the Kremlin and General Jaruzelski are trading on his reputation, by the relative values of Soviet satellite states, of being a moderate and a patriot as well as dedicated Communist. He has promised that no blood will shed. Yet orders have been given that anyone who resists may be shot. The general patriotic respect for the Polish Army is being exploited to the full. Strategy is obviously being closely concerted with Moscow in order to avoid upsetting the European "peace" bandwagon by a fresh Russian aggression while the nuclear negotiations are in progress. Moscow is, of course, desperately anxious that Poland should appear to be "solving her own problems." At home Jaruzelski is being presented as the saviour of the nation, on the one hand from economic chaos and the supposed breakdown of law and order for which Solidarity is held responsible, on the other from a Russian invasion. This latter is the "catastrophe" to which he referred in his pronunciamento as being "a matter of hours rather than days." All reforms, he promised, will be continued. He is to be the guarantor of a new deal for Poland, including as much independence as possible in the circumstances. The arrest of one of his predecessors as party boss, Mr Gierek, as a scapegoat is too much in accordance with cynical communist tradition to carry much weight as proof of yet another "fresh start."

All this is unlikely to convince Solidarity, which for 16 months has been negotiating with successive Polish Governments without achieving even the institutionalisation of agreed rights. This obstruction, together with a mounting counter-offensive by Communist hard-liners, led to increased militancy by Solidarity. The movement's latest demand for genuine participation in running the economy and democratic local elections next year were the result of prolonged governmental helplessness while the country slid ever deeper into ruin, starvation and winter.

NATO governments must unreservedly condemn yet another brutal attempt to crush the efforts of the people of Soviet satellite country to achieve a modicum of freedom. The outcome is still very much in doubt. It remains to be seen whether Mr Walesa will agree to negotiate under duress and whether the Polish workers, their families and supporters will refrain from strike action in the meantime or accept the result of any such negotiations. Although, mercifully, so far no blood has been shed, Russia is as responsible for aggression as if the coup had been carried out by her own armies. The total bankruptcy of the Soviet ideological, political and economic system has been devastatingly demonstrated. So long as this system continues to be imposed on the recalcitrant Poles under Russian orders no titivations that might be offered by General Jaruzelski can solve Poland's crisis or significantly alleviate the hardships of her people.

No Solution by Military Means

PM141335 London MORNING STAR in English 14 Dec 81 p 1

[Editorial: "The Situation in Poland"]

[Text] The MORNING STAR has always expressed its full support for the process of democratic and socialist renewal on which the Polish people have now been engaged for more than 18 months.

This has involved the establishment of Solidarity, a trade union organisation independent of the state, with which negotiations and discussions aimed at solving the problems accumulated over many years have been held. The MORNING STAR fully supported this appraoch, and on that basis gave a welcome to the general principles embodied in the Gdansk agreements and in the more recent attempts to establish some sort of national accord. This remains our position today. It is for the Polish people to solve the problems they face. But this implies a lengthy political process. It cannot be achieved by military means. It is from that point of view that the MORNING STAR approaches the present critical situation.

Undoubtedly, over recent weeks there have been increasing signs of a developing confrontation between the government and Solidarity, all against the background of a continuing deterioration in the economic situation with its many damaging effects on Polish society as a whole. On the one hand, there has been the call for a ban on strikes from the government. Such a ban is incompatible with the rights of trade unions which are independent of the state, and the proposal must have played into the hands of those within Solidarity who are hostile to socialism itself. On the other hand Solidarity did not assist the search for compromise by its call for a national stoppage and demonstrations this coming week, and its talk of holding a referendum about establishing a provisional government can only be regarded as provocative.

The history of the past 18 months or so has been characterised by a succession of sharp confrontations between the government and Solidarity, but up to the present it has always been possible to find a way out by compromise and agreement. In large measure, the problems facing Poland have their roots in the accumulated mistakes of past years in the corruption involved, and in the deficiencies in the functioning of socialist democracy.

The process of overcoming these problems is therefore bound to be fraught with difficulties. Too many obstacles to be surmounted exclude the possibility of finding quick and easy solutions. For what is involved is a many sided and complex political process. As the British Communist Party said in the resolution passed at recent national congress: "The Polish people have to overcome both the efforts of those who seek to block change, and of those, including sections of Solidarity, who are motivated by anti-socialist and reactionary motives."

But as the resolution also indicated, the problems could only be overcome if the process was carried out in such a way as to encourage the creation of a "political partnership between the party, Solidarity, and other institutions." Difficult as the situation is today, this still remains the only basis for winning the popular consensus needed to involve the mass of the Polish people in solving the acute problem they are facing. The MORNING STAR therefore hopes that the present state of emergency will be brought to a speedy conclusion, and that negotiations will be pursued by all concerned in a spirit of responsibility and compromise.

KIPRIANOU SENDS MESSAGE TO AL-ASAD ON GOLAN

NC161157 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] President Kiprianou expressed to Syrian President al-Asad the full support and solidarity of the Cyprus Government and people, and condemned the annexation of the Syrian Golan Heights by Israel. In a message to the Syrian president, President Kiprianou condemed Israel's arbitrary action in annexing the Golan Heights, an undivided part of the Syrian Arab Republic's territory. This unjustified action, the president stressed, is unlawful and is contrary to international law and the UN charter and resolutions. It aggravates even more the already crucial situation in the Middle East and is a serious danger to international peace.

Turkish Cypriot Condemnation

[Text] TFSC Foreign Minister Kenan Atakol has said that Israel's decision to annex the Golan Heights could seriously threaten regional and world peace. In a statement today, Atakol said that through its recent move, Israel, which is always hindering efforts for a lasting peace in the Middle East by establishing settlements in the Arab territories it has been occupying, is undermining every effort for peace and will cause new tensions, the dimensions of which cannot yet be conceived.

Atakol added: I would like to state clearly that the TFSC does not recognize this decision by Israel and strongly condemns it. We hope Israel will not implement this decision and will retract it. Otherwise Israel itself will bear the responsibility for the possible tension and grave developments in the region.

AKEL BLAMES SOLIDARITY FOR POLAND SITUATION

NC171010 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] The AKEL Central Committee Political Bureau has issued a statement on the situation in Poland which says that the temporary measures the Polish Council of State was compelled to implement in the country for fundamental self-defense against subversive and antisocialist elements is an internal affair of the country and of no one else. AKEL places responsibility for the situation on counter revolutionary elements which dominated the Solidarity leadership and adds that AKEL will stand on the Polish people's side in the struggle for defense of their socialist achievements.

PAPER REVALS TURKISH PLAN TO OCCUPY ISLAND

NC170839 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 17 Dec 81 pp 1, 10

[Excerpts] According to authoritative reports received by O AGON, Turkey has prepared a plan for the occupation of all of Cyprus within 12 hours if the need arises. Within the framework of this Satanic plan, the Turkish troops were reinforced in recent months with new types of arms and tanks, which were taken to the occupied areas by warships through Famagusta harbor and by air through Tymbou airfield. Authoritative sources say the tanks were taken to the occupied areas inside big containers. In the meantime, the Turkish Cypriots on the confrontation line have been replaced by Turkish troops.

In Athens, it has been stressed that the raising by Turkey of the so-called question of the dispatch of Greek troops to Cyprus causes concern to Greek leaders, who see it is an effort for exploitation in the international field, as a result of which relations between the two countries -- relations which are already not good -- will become more acute. In the opinion of the government spokesman, these "reports" could come from Israeli "sources" in order to cause a deterioration in Greek-Turkish relations in reaction to Yasir 'Arafat's visit to Athens, or from Ankara, aiming at concealing the dispatch of Turkish forces to Cyprus.

'ARAFAT MAKES STATEMENT, LEAVES GREECE 16 DEC

NC161728 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1600 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Papandreou's talks with PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat concluded today. According to press reports, at today's meeting the two leaders summed up the results of their talks and discussed the Cyprus problem as well as the upgrading of the PLO office in Athens.

The PLO leader has already left Greece by plane from Elevsis airfield. Before boarding his plane, Mr 'Arafat made a last statement to our correspondent, Spiros Liatsos: Here in Greece you have touched my heart. (?Believe) me, I am very touched and I feel grateful to Greece. From the welcome accorded to me, I draw courage in order to carry on until final victory. I thank Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou, and I thank the Greek people.

Statements to Press

NC161954 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1800 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Aris Xipolitidhis report -- recorded]

[Excerpt] PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat concluded his 3-day official visit to Greece today and departed from Elevsis airport early this afternoon. At noon the Palestinian leader had a meeting at the Maximos Building with Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou, with whom he reviewed everything that had been discussed during 'Arafat's stay in Athens. Before their last talk, speaking to the press, the prime minister said:

[Papandreou] As you know, this is our last meeting with Yasir 'Arafat and his advisers. Honestly, 'Arafat's visit to our country is of decisive significance as the creator-founder of a closer brotherly bond between the Palestinian movement and the Greek people, between the Greek people and the peoples of the Arab nation. The emotion and joy with which the entire Greek people welcomed Yasir 'Arafat was truly impressive. We want to assure our friend and the Palestinian people that we will support them with all our forces in their struggle for freedom, self-determination and independence, so that they can recover their lost fatherland.

Symbolically, I wish to announce that the Greek Government is upgrading the Palestinian office, mission, in our country to a diplomatic mission, "mission diplomatique." This diplomatic mission will enjoy all the rights enjoyed by embassies in our country. The representative of the diplomatic mission -- this will be its precise title -- I believe will soon be installed in Greece. Of course this is an issue of the Palestinians and of Yasir 'Arafat to settle as to who will represent the Palestinians in our country. We believe that with this act we are truly opening Europe's gate, and we hope that shortly our example will be imitated by the other countries of the European continent.

Before leaving you, I would like to thank Yasir 'Arafat, his advisers and the PLO for their active support of the struggle of the Cypriot people, who are struggling for a free, independent, demilitarized and nonaligned Cyprus. Our hopes follow him on his trip, and despite the terribly difficult international juncture and the recent developments, we are sure the Palestinian people will be vindicated and will recover their fatherland.

[Xipolitdhis] Yasir 'Arafat also made a statement to the press, and said: Everything his excellency, Prime Minister Papandreou has said meets a very great response among the Palestinian people and the entire Arab world. I cannot but express my great satisfaction at the help being offered to our people. This means there is a point of strategic change in Greek-Palestinian relations. In any case, this is the result of the original positions in which you and the great, courageous Greek people have believed.

The prime minister has expressed the hope that other European countries follow the same courageous road you have followed. I recognize that this step taken by the Greek Government and the Greek people means that Greece is taking its position in the vanguard, whether political, traditional, historical or social. At the same time, this position will strengthen the Greek people's bonds with the Arab world at all levels. Mr Prime Minister, 'Arafat said in conclusion, I would like to thank you and have the opportunity to invite you to our fatherland, Palestine.

After his meeting with Prime Minister Papandreou, the Palestinian leader returned to the Grande Bretagne Hotel, where he gave a press interview to Greek and foreign reporters.

The deputy minister to the prime minister in charge of press affairs, Dhimitris Maroudhas, presented Yasir 'Arafat to the representatives of the information media, who had filled the hall to capacity for the interview. The leader of the Palestinian movement made a statement before the question-and-answer session.

In his opening statement, the Palestinian leader thanked the Greek people, the Greek Government and Prime Minister Papandreou for the warm reception they accorded him in Athens. We had, he said, a fruitful discussion of our positions on various issues. In our last meeting, a short while ago, the prime minister informed me of the right to upgrade our office in Athens to a diplomatic mission with all rights enjoyed by other delegations. This constitutes an important step in the promotion of our struggle and means much to us and to Greece.

Then Yasir 'Arafat replied to questions from reporters and, among other things, said:

The PLO supports a unitary, independent and nonaligned Cyprus.

Greek-Arab relations have entered a new road of development, and the Arab world especially appreciates Greece's position toward its problems.

The Palestinians expect an Israeli attack against southern Lebanon, on whose borders the Israelis are maintaining four divisions.

The participation of European forces in the Sinai peace force constitutes a hostile act aimed at the Arab peoples.

The annexation of the Golan Heights by Israel is due to the unlimited U.S. aid to Israel and runs counter to international law.

There will not be any solution of the Middle East problem unless the return of the Palestinian people to their lands and the self-determination of the Palestinian people is guaranteed.

Israel has about 25 atomic bombs.

Israel has designs on Cyprus and Crete, and there are documents to prove this.

The Palestinians are expecting a change in Egypt's position and base their hopes on the Egyptian people and armed forces.

Developments in Poland, although not discussed with Prime Minister Papandreou, constitute an issue that concerns the Polish people.

Details of Press Conference

JN161931 (Clandestine) Voice of Palestine in Arabic 1800 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Excerpt] In the course of his reply to journalists' questions on the level of relations linking the PLO and the Greek Government, Brother Abu 'Ammar said: As a result of this Greek stand, the Palestinians have diplomatic representation in Greece and have all the rights of the other diplomatic institutions.

He added that relations between the Palestinian and Greek peoples and between the PLO [as heard] are greater than the issue of diplomatic relations, since the Arabs and Greeks have always been linked by cultural and historical ties. Indeed, we view these relations from cultural and historical perspectives when we say Greece is the gateway to Europe. Thus, from the moment this new Greek stand was adopted, Palestinian-Greek and Arab-Greek relations entered a new state. There are many points and premises from which this assistance and cooperation between us and Greece can proceed. We know the position occupied by Greece in the Arab world, Mediterranean and Europe.

On Greece's role in the EEC following France's open policy toward Israel, Brother Abu 'Ammar said: Greece's role is becoming greater with the principled stand declared by our friend Papandreou. On the Cyprus issue, Brother Abu 'Ammar said: You know our principled stand toward the friendly Cypriot people. Indeed, in all our moves on various domestic and international levels we proceed from the premise of these relations, which are founded on the principles of Cyprus's independence, the unity of its territories and its neutrality. Brother Abu 'Ammar pointed out that he and, Prime Minister Papandreou discussed the Cyprus issue. He reminded the journalists of his close relationship with the late Archbishop Makarios and present President Kyprianou and the PLO's relations with the other Cyprus parties.

On his evaluation of the current situation in Lebanon and the possibility of a new Israeli attack against southern Lebanon, Brother Abu 'Ammar said: We expect an Israeli military attack, based on the information we have. There are some three or four Israeli divisions stationed on the northern borders of Palestine with Lebanon to carry out an attack against the Palestinian and Lebanese people. We know they have the most sophisticated U.S. weapons in the air, on land and at sea, including internationally banned weapons. At the same time, the Israeli occupation forces are practicing terrorism and oppression against our people in the occupied territories. You know that Gaza is besieged and that all contact with it is cut off. You also know that the number of new detainees in Gaza has reached 4,000, plus 3,000 in the West Bank, not to mention those who were previously detained.

On Europe's participation in the multinational force that will be stationed in the Sinai after the withdrawal of Israeli forces, Brother Abu 'Ammar said he considered the participation of European forces to be a hostile act to the Arab nation and to the Palestinian people. The issue they previously considered to be a cause is in fact a conspiracy against the Palestinian people and Arab nation because these forces do not fly the UN flag. It is a new occupation by these forces of the Sinai and Suez Canal areas.

On Israel's law to annex the Golan Heights, the brother commander in chief stressed that this is a new crime perpetrated by the Zionist military gang against world peace. We must remember that they also annexed Jerusalem. We should keep in mind that this has taken place as a result of unconditional U.S. assistance. This also proves that Israel is against any peace in the region and that it is placing obstacles to any solution in the region by carrying out more expansion. This is a basic objective of the Israeli Government and the Zionist movement. We must keep in mind their ambitions in Cyprus and Crete. There are uncontestable documents on their ambitions in Cyprus. Brother leader Abu 'Ammar announced that he is ready to produce comments on this subject, saying that Archbishop Makarios was forced to issue a special law blocking the Israelis' rush to purchase large areas of land in Cyprus. We must also keep in mind that the U.S.-Israeli strategic alliance has ambitions (?on lands) in Cyprus, particularly those used by the United States in the Mediterranean.

On Prince Fahd's plan, Brother Abu 'Ammar said he and Prime Minister Papandreou did not discuss this, since their discussion dealt with the Middle East problem in general.

In this regard, Brother Abu 'Ammar asserted that no peace, security or stability would be established in the Middle East if the national rights -- which include the Palestinian people's right to return, determine their fate and establish their own independent national state on their national soil -- are disregarded. He pointed out that adherence to these rights is not asking for the impossible but constitutes a demand for international legitimacy. Thus, he said, we welcomed Comrade President Brezhnev's initiative as a basis for solving this problem. We also welcomed Prince Fahd's plan for the same reason.

On the PLO stand on the events in Poland, Brother Abu 'Ammar said: Poland's events are purely domestic and we have nothing to do with them. I did not discuss these events with Prime Minister Papandreou. The Polish people must solve their own problem.

On the Iraq-Iran war, Brother Abu 'Ammar said: The PLO has made and will make special endeavors to stop this war. He stated that he and other Palestinian officials have often discussed this issue with the two countries' officials.

On President Mubarak's policy, Brother Abu 'Ammar said the PLO deals with politics and not people. Thus we have to await post-As-Sadat policy. However, we have great hopes for the Egyptian people and army.

Report on Joint Communique

JN161614 (Clandestine) Voice of Palestine in English 1500 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Excerpt] The joint communique states: During the PLO-Greek discussions there was an exchange of views on the Middle East situation and the problems connected with the area, and both parties stated their desire to continue contributing in a constructive manner to the promotion of just solutions.

While examining the Middle East issue, the Palestinian side expressed its appreciation for the support of the Greek Government of the struggle of the Palestinian people for the recognition of their inalienable rights, including the right of return to their homeland, self-determination and the establishment of an independent state on their own soil. Both sides condemned Israel's decision to annex the occupied Golan Heights and stressed that this action is contrary to international law and UN resolutions and constitutes a threat to peace in the region.

While examining the Cyprus issue, the Greek side praised the support the PLO is giving to the Cypriot people in their just struggle. Referring to the situation in the eastern Mediterranean, both sides underlined the need for a just solution of the Cyprus issue based on the withdrawal of foreign troops from the island as well as the need for securing Greece's sovereign rights according to international conventions and practices.

The Greek Government -- believing in the basic role the PLO plays in the process for the settlement of the Middle East issue and recognizing the organization as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people -- announced to Mr Yasir 'Arafat its decision to grant diplomatic status to the office of the organization currently operating in Athens. The chairman of the PLO Executive Committee expressed his satisfaction with this decision of the Greek Government. The talks were held in a cordial spirit of friendship and understanding.

'Arafat on Greece's Role

NC141738 Athens AVRIANI in Greek 14 Dec 81 p 8

[Excerpts] In his interview with ERT [Hellenic Radio-Television] Saturday, Yasir 'Arafat stated: "The Greek people, Greece, has once again become strong as a mediator between the Middle East and Europe."

In an interview with ERT and the Armed Forces Information Service television, 'Arafat, among other things, stressed:

-- My invitation to go to Greece by Prime Minister Papandreou is not "simply" an invitation to Palestine only; it is a new invitation between the Arabs and Greece.

-- Following the Venice "Declaration" I am afraid to say that what has been called the "European initiative" is on the wrong path with regard to the Palestinian issue.

-- The settlement by the Israelis in Gaza is part of the Camp David agreements, and this is an outright conspiracy against the Palestinian people.

-- We do not have any information on the results of Habib's mediation mission. But we were surprised at what has been said; that he came to talk about a cease-fire when the UN authorities are stating that there have been no violations by the PLO. The Israelis, on the other hand, are concentrating three to four detachments against the Lebanese people, against the Palestinian people in the south. We smell something very strange!

-- There are only two solutions for the PLO: Establishment of a democratic state, where all Muslims, Christians and Jews can coexist equally and justly, or an independent Palestinian state in any part of occupied Palestine after withdrawal of the Israelis. We ask only for implementation of the UN resolutions, namely the implementation of international law.

AGREEMENTS WITH ALBANIA ON POWER, TRADE, FLIGHTS

NC162108 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Commerce Minister Akritidhis, who has returned to Athens following a 3-day visit to Albania, has brought a personal message to Prime Minister Papandreou from Albanian Chairman Mehmet Shehu, who described Mr Papandreou as a figure of international distinction. Mr Shehu said this during his official meeting -- the first official meeting -- with a Greek minister.

In Tirana the two commerce ministers, Mr Hoxha and Mr Akritidhis, signed two agreements. The first provides for the import to Greece from Albania of 1 billion kw of electricity per year. With the second agreement, which refers to 1982, it is expected that trade exchanges between the two countries will be doubled. Finally, Albania asked for two flights between Athens and Tirana via Ioannina.

AVEROF WITHHOLDS CRITICISM ON NATO ISSUE

[Text] Official opposition leader Averof has made the following statement: I do not wish to make any criticism at this point in connection with the government handling of the question of our relations with NATO. We may disagree with the government both in connection with its foreign policy and with the method it has been following; however, I am of the opinion that it is inappropriate publicly to discuss complicated questions, such as those that refer to our relations with NATO, during a period when negotiations are underway.

I thank the prime minister for his proposal that I brief the Greek people over television on the New Democracy positions toward these questions. I will make use of his offer when I consider it advisable. In the meantime, we will watch the government's actions very closely and developments in general, and we will wait for the clarification of certain questions. New Democracy, both as government and as a party, will in no case embark on demagogy, as PASOK did when it was in the opposition; it will exercise constructive criticism and, whenever necessary, it will be unyielding and firm.

PASOK CONCERNED OVER DEVELOPMENTS IN POLAND

NC161142 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1100 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] The PASOK executive office has issued the following statement:

We express our deep concern over the dramatic developments of a repressive nature following the declaration of martial law in Poland. We hope the solution of Poland's political problem will result exclusively from internal procedures without any foreign intervention. We hope that, following a national agreement, freedom for individuals and trade unions will soon be restored in that country.

KKE ISSUES STATEMENT ON POLISH CRISIS 15 DEC

NC152352 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 15 Dec 81

[Text] In a statement on developments in Poland, the KKE says that in Poland the irresponsible actions of extremist antisocialist elements inside and outside Solidarity have undermined all efforts for a national understanding to save Poland from complete economic and political collapse and make changes on the socialist road. We hope, states the KKE, that with the new conditions the socialist and patriotic Polish forces will achieve their goal of avoiding a civil war and will create conditions for normalizing the situation and restoring the country to the socialist road through the participation of the working people.

We believe the working class and the Polish people will defend their socialist gains and that Polish society will find the necessary strength to emerge from its dramatic crisis. This is required both in the interest of international peace and Europe's security, concludes the KKE statement.

KKE-Interior Statement

NC160924 Athens I AVYI in Greek 15 Dec 81 p 1

[Text] The Executive Office of the KKE-Interior Central Committee has issued the following statement:

The decree of martial law in Poland, arrests, military courts and a ban on all trade union activities constitute a violent interruption of the country's process for democratization toward a socialism with democracy and freedom. We express our great concern over these developments and our undivided solidarity toward the workers' class and the communists who are struggling for democratic socialism. We ask for the immediate release of all arrested persons and the full restoration of the democratic and trade union freedoms. This will promote democratic procedures and the participation of the social forces aimed at resolving, with political means, the great problems of socialism in Poland. In these crucial and vital moments for detente and peace in Europe, the democratic developments in Poland acquire significant importance.

BRIEFS

OIL IMPORTS -- Greece will cover most of its 1982 oil needs with purchases of crude from Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Libya and the Soviet Union. Greece will buy 2.5 million tons from Saudi Arabia, 2 million from Iraq, 1.7 million from the Soviet Union and 1.5 million from Libya. Smaller amounts will be supplied by Algeria, Nigeria and Syria. Greece's domestic oil needs total around 10 million tons annually. Up to 13 percent should be covered in 1982 by production at the north Aegean offshore field, which went into operation last August. OFFICIALS COMMENT ON 'GREEK LANDING' IN CYPRUS

TA170539 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1520 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, 16 Dec (AA) -- Bekir Tumen, a member of the Consultative Assembly, said today that if the reports about Greek troops landing in Cyprus are true, then that is contrary to standing agreements and international law. Addressing the members Tumen said Turkey which is a peace-loving country with no ambition to gain territory, withdraws [as received] the attention of all the world's states, and especially of the NATO countries, to this dangerous escalation.

"The world is being pushed into a new crisis daily. To take advantage of the situation does not comply with reason. (This?) is the era of wisdom, science, reason, of law, order, justice and respect for others. All the nations should keep in mind that a spark to be shot [as received] off may destroy the whole world," he said. Stressing that Turkey will act with prudence and show respect to international law, "we hope Greek statesmen will act responsibly," he added.

Zekai Okte, speaking at the same session, said the Turkish Republic from the day of its foundation has shown respect for good neighbourly relations and for the national dignity and sovereignty of all states. "We have no ambition on others' territory and on others' rights. But we defend our soil and our rights. Everyone should know that as we want to preserve peace at home and secure it instantly, we are able to have and establish peace in our region."

TURKEY, HUNGARY SIGN TRANSPORTATION PROTOCOL

TA161511 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 16 Dec 81

[Text] The transit fee charged to Turkish International Highway Transport [TIR] trucks passing through Hungary will be reduced as of 1 February 1982. Under protocol signed in Ankara today at the end of the 3-day meeting of the joint Turkish-Hungarian highway transportation committee, Hungary will reduce the fee by 40 percent when the truck is empty and by 10 percent when loaded. In this way, the TIR fees charged by the two countries will be equal. Under the protocol, Hungary will grant easier terms to Turkish TIR trucks in line with tonnage limitations.

Dogan Aydin, Transportation Ministry director general for highway transportation, who signed the protocol on behalf of Turkey, said the protocol would further develop highway transportation between the two countries.

CARRINGTON DEMANDS RELEASE OF POLISH DETAINEES

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Strasbourg]

[Text] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington this afternoon demanded the release of detainees arrested by the military government in Poland. He described the events in Poland as a "man-made disaster on a colossal scale" and said there was an "ominous silence" about the fate of Solidarity leader Lech Walesa. He told the European Parliament in Strasbourg that only a resumption of negotiations and conciliation, including the release of detainees, could solve the country's problems. His remarks, on behalf of the ten EEC countries, are the toughest so far delivered from the community. They were agreed as a last minute addition to a speech by the foreign secretary in his role as president in office of the EEC.

Presenting his end of term report on the British presidency, Lord Carrington was due to limit his references to Poland to an expression of concern and sympathy coupled with the hope that the Polish people should solve their problems peacefully and without outside interference. But this afternoon Lord Carrington made it clear that Britain, as holder of the presidency of the EEC, was standing ready to arrange urgent consultation over the Polish situation if necessary. The addition to the text, following consultations between all ten countries, reflects growing worries in Europe about developments in Poland during the last few days.

Lord Carrington said: "In the 48 hours since the ten foreign ministers met in London, the Polish skies have continued to darken. We are only too familiar with natural disasters, but there in the heart of our continent is a man-made disaster on a colossal scale. Although news is censored and communications cut and diplomatic facilities suspended we read of arrests and detention and evictions."

He went on: "There has almost certainly been some loss of life. There is an ominous silence about the fate of Lech Walesa. I should not want to see the situation made more difficult by any words of mine. There is much that I could say but will leave unsaid, but two things seem clear to me. First and foremost, as had been said so often before, there must be no foreign interference whatsoever. Second, there must be an early resumption of the process of negotiation and conciliation including release of those in detention.

"This alone can produce a solution to Poland's problems," went on Lord Carrington. I note that assurances on this subject were given in Warsaw yesterday by what is called the Military Council of National Salvation. This parliament and the world will be watching to see how these assurances are put into effect."

The foreign secretary said: "The Ten will continue to follow events in Poland with particular attention, and we stand ready, as the president, to arrange urgent consultations if these should become necessary." Lord Carrington's statement follows a speech by the prime minister to the Strasbourg parliament yesterday, during which Mrs Thatcher said that the problems of Poland were for the Poles to solve. Mrs Thatcher expressed the hope that they would do so by a process of compromise and negotiation.

TRADE CREDIT AGREEMENT WITH GDR SIGNED IN BERLIN

LD171236 Hamburg DPA in German 1205 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Excerpt] East Berlin, 17 Dec (DPA) -- An agreement on the temporary extension of the interest-free overdraft credit in intra-German trade was signed in East Berlin today by the Federal Republic and the GDR. It was signed by Franz Roesch, head of the West Berlin Trust Agency for Industry and Commerce, which is controlled by the Federal Economics Ministry, and by Karl Keilholz, main department chief in the GDR Foreign Trade Ministry. The GDR can thus continue to avail itself of interest-free credits up to DM850 million until 30 June 1982. In the course of the next few months the two sides wish to negotiate a fresh agreement. The agreement signed at the end of 1974 was due to expire at the end of this year.

SCHMIDT, GENSCHER RECEIVE CSSR'S CHNOUPEK

[Excerpts] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Schmidt today received Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Chnoupek for an exchange of views. Federal Foreign Minister Genscher earlier had a private talk lasting nearly 3 hours with his Prague counterpart on the international situation. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said that the two foreign ministers had discussed German-Czechoslovak relations and East-West relations. Chancellor Schmidt and the Czechoslovak Foreign Minister expect that the Polish crisis will be resolved without outside interference. After their talk at the federal chancellor's office, which lasted about 60 minutes, it was announced that Schmidt and Chnoupek had declared themselves confident that Poland can settle its own affairs. During their exchange of views Schmidt and Chnoupek also discussed security and disarmament, the CSCE conference in Madrid and relations between the Federal Republic and Czechoslovakia. Much attention was devoted to the chancellor's talks in the GDR and Brezhnev's visit to Bonn.

Dinner for Chnoupek Given

[Excerpts] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Genscher in Bonn today once again told Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Chnoupek of the Federal Government's serious concern about developments in Poland. Chnoupek is the first foreign minister of a Warsaw Pact state to visit a Western capital after the proclamation of a state of emergency in Poland. At a dinner for the Czechoslovak guest in Godesberg, Genscher read out the text of the statement of the EEC foreign ministers in London on Tuesday and added: "Unfortunately I cannot say today that our concern has diminished since Tuesday. If anything, the opposite is true."

In his reply, Foreign Minister Chnoupek mentioned "old and new sources of tension" without, however, expressly mentioning Poland. He called for peaceful solutions while observing the principle of "noninterference in the internal affairs of these countries." As far as German-Czechoslovak relations were concerned Chnoupek saw possibilities for the development of economic cooperation, cultural exchanges and travel.

Tonight the Czechoslovak foreign minister was received for a 45-minute talk by Federal President Carstens. According to the president's office Carstens stressed that it is important especially now to conduct a dialogue between East and West in order to create an atmosphere of confidence. Concerning the situation in Poland, Carstens stressed that the country must resolve its problems by itself without the use of force. Carstens also spoke of the "difficult situation" of the civil rights champions in Czechoslovakia who invoke the Helsinki Final Act to assert their rights.

UNION DISCUSSES AID TO POLAND WITH MITTERRAND

LD171740 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Text] Andre Bergeron, member of the Force Ouvriere trade union, was received by the president this afternoon. The two men nacurally discussed Poland. Here is what Andre Bergeron said on leaving the Elysee:

[Begin recording] You know that we have started discussions on the issue of whether it is appropriate or not to halt economic aid to Poland so as to put pressure on its government. Mr Francois Mitterrand indicated that he did not intend to suspend food aid to Poland and I think he is perfectly right. Force Ouvriere for its part, has never asked for deliveries of foodstuffs to be interrupted, particularly in the dramatic situation which Poland is now experiencing. As for economic aid, no decision has yet been made but if events should worsen, if the turn of events takes on a more dramatic nature than at present, then the president will not rule out certain decisions by the government. [end recording]

MAUROY EXPRESSES CONCERN TO GDR OFFICIAL

PM181215 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Dec 81 p 6

[Text] After a meeting with Guenter Mittag, deputy chairman of the GDR Council of State, who is visiting France, [Premier] Mauroy stated Tuesday, 15 December: "I informed Mr Mittag of the government's concern at the human rights violations, arrests and the current situation in Poland." "I also informed him," he added, "of the government's view of these events and our hope that things will return to normal. We hope that dialogue will be resumed with all the political elements and that there will be a resumption of the democratic process which we had hailed." For his part, Mr Mittag merely stated that the talks had been "constructive and very satisfactory," that they had related mainly to trade between France and the GDR and that "some international problems of common interest" had been raised.

PREMIER NOTES MARCHAIS BACKS STANCE ON POLAND

[Excerpts] Montpellier -- Replying to questions, Mr Pierre Mauroy emphasized that the assessment of the Polish situation has caused "no difficulty" within the government between Socialists and Communists. "There has been no difference in the feelings of members of the government," he stated. "No problem has arisen at the government level. The statement which I have made expresses the attitude of the government as a whole."

After it was pointed out to him that Mr Georges Marchais' reaction had been more muted than that of the government, the premier stated: "Mr Marchais has made no government statement. He has made a statement on behalf of the Communist Party."

SEARCH FOR KIDNAPPED U.S. GENERAL UNSUCCESSFUL

PA180214 Madrid EFE in Spanish 0202 GMT 18 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 18 Dec (EFE) -- The massive police search launched in Verona and vicinity following the kidnapping of U.S. Gen James L. Dozier of the NATO forces has not yielded any results and it is belived that the terrorists who kidnapped him may have found a refuge.

Reports from the police in Verona are based on the results of the highway checkpoints, which have proven futile, and the delay with which the authorities learned of the kidnapping. The kidnappers had at least 2 or 3 hours to escape and the site of the kidnapping has quick access to both a freeway and a superhighway.

Responsibility for the kidnapping was claimed by the Red Brigades through an anonymous telephone call to the Italian ANSA new agency. General Dozier had been in Verona for 2 years.

Apparently four terrorists staged the kidnapping, two of whom entered the general's room. One armed with a machinegun was left posted outside and a fourth was behind the wheel of an idling vehicle that made off with the general. Reports that the general may have been wounded during the kidnapping have not been confirmed by the authorities.

BERLINGUER REPEATS 'CONDEMNATION' OF POLISH MOVE

[Text] Rome, 17 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer called for European withdrawal from the planned multinational peace force in the Sinai Peninsula and urged a higher European Economic Community profile in the "tensions and rivalry between the two superpowers" in his speech to the European Parliament in Strasbourg yesterday, according to the official text released by the party's press office here today.

According to the text, Berlinguer said it was "indispensable" for France, Britain, Italy and Holland to withdraw from their decision to send troops to the Sinai because it would represent "support" for Israel's recent annexation of the Golan Heights and be a "gesture of hostility towards to entire Arab world." On the annexation, Berlinguer added: "Than [as received] in the south of the world, people hope for an autonomous Europe, politically and economic active throughout the world, both in North-South and East-West relations."

On the Polish crisis, Berlinguer pointed out that the Italian communists are "contrary to any act harmful of the sovereignty of the states and the liberty of citizens anywhere in the world." "From this European Parliament," he added, "we renew our clear condemnation of the violation of the rights of liberty now being effected in Poland, and we voice our solidarity with the Polish people."

In other points, the Italian Communist Party leader urged the need for unity among the EEC ten. "Europe can no longer limit itself to insufficient attempts to contain the more dangerous effects coming from the tensions and rivalry of the superpowers," he warned. "Today, he added, "we are faced by an unleashing of centrifugal impulses, protectionisms and nationalisms."

According to Berlinguer, the major cause of this situation is the "short-sighted vision of the governments and the economically dominant classes." "But there are also certain responsibilities of the Western working class," Berlinguer added, saying that it is held back by "purely national visions of its interests and function."

USSR ENVOY SCORES CRITICISM OF POLISH EVENTS

LD171906 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Text] Statements made on the situation in Poland by [President of the Democratic Party] Piccoli, [Secretary of the Socialist Party] Craxi and [General Secretary of the Communist Party] Berlinguer drew comment from Soviet Ambassador Lunkov, who defined these statements as "not corresponding to the real situation in Poland."

The Soviet diplomat even said he was displeased with statements made on television by Enrico Berlinguer. However, the communists have reiterated their firm stance in an article in RINASCITA written by Pietro Ingrao, which says the military response to Solidarity's demands represents a defeat for socialism. Ingrao rejected the thesis that there was no other way in Poland to avoid Soviet intervention, because to accept this thesis -- means to accept the interpretation of the policy of blocs which actually eliminates the national sovereignty of countries belonging to blocs.

Further Remarks

[Text] Rome, 17 Dec (ANSA) -- Martial law was declared in Poland last Sunday morning because "extremists" within the Solidarity trade union were setting up "assault units" with the task of taking over radio and TV stations, "and then the factories," the Soviet ambassador in Rome, Nikolay Lunkov, charged here today. Speaking with a group of reporters during a reception at the Soviet Embassy in this capital, Lunkov said that "without the proclamation of martial law, Poland would have fallen into political catastrophe, into chaos."

"The choice was between the total destruction of the socialist state and laying the foundations for an operation that would enable saving the country," the diplomat asserted. "Between the two evils," Lunkov added, Prime Minister Wojciech Jaruzelski "chose the lesser one. He had no other way out. His was a step forced by an emergncy situation." "Now his first task is to normalize the situation, making the country work by counting on its healthy forces." The ambassador also argued that, even if there are "extremists" among the leaders of Solidarity, this does not mean "one can say that the ten million Poles belonging to the union are against socialism."

Lunkov also used all his talent as a diplomat to make marked criticisms of the stands taken by Italian Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer, Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi, and his Christian Democrat counterpart, Flaminio Piccoli, on the Polish situation. "As Soviet citizens," the diplomat said, "we are very sorry" about "some passages" in the televised interview in which Berlinguer declared that the Polish crisis marks the end of an historical era begun with the October revolution. "Our impression is that the three party leaders' assessment in no way coincided with the real state of affairs" in Poland, the diplomat added.

RETURNEES: SOLIDARITY PLANS NO ARMED RESISTANCE

AU171610 Rome ANSA in English 1550 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Rome, 17 Dec (ANSA) -- A temporary leadership committee of the Solidarnosc trade union in Poland does not intend to offer armed resistance to the introduction of martial law in that country, a regional delegation of the Italian union federation CISL told a news conference called here today to question the delegation, recently returned from Poland.

According to the information furnished by members of the Christian-Democrat oriented trade federation members, who had been in Poland since December 7 and returned to Italy by train via Austria, a flyer released by the Solidarnosc committee in Poland urged everyone to remain calm in order to avoid bloodshed.

PSOE LEADER ON 'FAILURE OF POLISH COMMUNISM'

PM180839 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 15 Dec 81 p 8

[EFE dispatch: "People Do Not Feel Attached to Regime"]

[Excerpt] Panama -- "The crisis in Poland demonstrates the failure of Polish communism and the fact that the people of that country do not feel attached to the regime," socialist Workers Party Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez told the EFE news agency Sunday. The socialist leader was in the Panamanian capital drafting a report on the situation in Central America, and was planning to visit Managua yesterday, (Monday).

"When the Polish Army must act against its own people, the fact is that the political experiment attempted in the country has failed, that the Polish communist blueprint has failed and that the Polish people do not identify with that blueprint," Felipe Gonzalez added. In the course of his statements the socialist leader asserted that the crisis in Poland is exacerbating the hotbeds of tension created by the two big superpowers, which wish to dominate entire areas of the world. "But in the presence of the two big powers' hegemonic aims, all the peoples of the world are struggling with increasing determination to assert their self-determination and the sovereignty," Felipe Gonzalez stated.

[Text] Madrid, 17 Dec (AFP) -- The head of a dissident group that split from the terrorist organization GRAPO was shot by police and arrested here last night, authorities said today.

He was identified as Angel Pisonero Alonso, head of a group called "the Committee of Salvation of the Reconstituted Spanish Communist Party."

NORWAY

GOVERNMENT TAKES 'SERIOUS VIEW' OF POLISH EVENTS

PM180881 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN In Norwegian 14 Dec 81 p 9

[Excerpt] The government takes a serious view of what has happened in Poland but has not found any reason to step up military readiness. Norway is prepared to accept Polish refugees if this should become necessary. Prime Minister Kaare Willoch made this statement after an emergency meeting at the Foreign Ministry Sunday morning. Apart from Willoch, Foreign Minister Svenn Stray, Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad, Defense chief Gen Sverre Hamre and other high-ranking representatives of the political and military leadership took part in the meeting.

Prime Minister Willoch stressed that Norway had hoped that Poland would find a way out of its difficulties without having to resort to special measures or the use of force on the part of the authorities. Willoch stressed that the government had noted with concern that there have been a number of arrests in Poland. The prime minister said that it is still the view of the government that the Polish people must be allowed to solve their own problems without interference from outside. He stressed that this is in line with the Polish people's own wishes and with the requests of the world's free nations that the democratization process must be allowed to continue.

After the meeting Willoch made it clear that there are continuous contacts between the governments of the Nordic countries and NATO countries, and said that there was great similarity in the views taken of the state of emergency in Poland. Foreign Minister Stray was able to report that all contacts between the Norwegian Embassy in Poland and the Norwegian Foreign Ministry had been broken, but that the Swedish Embassy had radio contact with Sweden. Stray also said that the Foreign Ministry had ascertained where the Norwegians in Poland are to be found and that the necessary steps have been taken to get them out of the country if this should become necessary.

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch informed the meeting that if large numbers of refugees come from Poland, Norway in accordance with its traditions is prepared to accept them. Any possible deterioration in relations between East and West is largely dependent on what the Soviet Union now does -- whether it demonstrates the necessary moderation — and it will of course also be dependent on continued developments in Poland itself, Willoch said, stressing: "The most important thing is whether there will be any halt in the democratization process or whether we are here seeing a more temporary setback. Continued democratization in Poland in accordance with the clear wishes of the Polish people is a very strong demand from all free nations."

Contingency Plans for Refugees

[Einer KR. Holtet report]

[Excerpt] "Norway will be able to accept at very short notice a large number of Polish refugees," Social Affairs Minister Leif Arne Heloee told AFTENPOSTEN. On Monday [14 December] a working group of civil servants from the Social Affairs Ministry and the Justice Ministry, among others, was set up to follow the situation in Poland with regard to possible future aid to refugees. "We do not want to dramatize things too strongly, but we are prepared to help if and when the situation dictates. In this event we must all put our backs into it," the social affairs minister said.

The authorities intend to be able to provide rapid aid if a stream of refugees were to come from crisis-torn Poland. According to information received by AFTENPOSTEN, transport facilities, provisions and the establishment of refugee camps will all be included in the contingency plans the government is working on. The government is prepared for the worst, but it is waiting before it draws conclusions from what is happening in Poland. It also intends to keep in close contact with the authorities in Sweden and Denmark, which will initially have to bear the main burden of possible refugees from the south.

SWEDEN

DEFENSE FORCES INCREASE READINESS, VIGILANCE

PM171613 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 14 Dec 81 p 8

[Excerpts] Swedish military readiness was stepped up Sunday. "We are following what is happening primarily outside Poland's borders in various ways," Armed Forces Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung told DAGENS NYHETER. The commander was unwilling to say in what ways and by what means Sweden has stepped up its readiness, but it affects intelligence bodies in the first instance. "We have increased surveillance and searches over and around the southern Baltic and we have stepped up readiness among headquarters staff in order to act swiftly should the need arise," the commander said. However, he stressed that what had happened is still an internal Polish concern. "This is not the buildup to a major European crisis. What we are seeing is an internal attempt to solve a very difficult problem."

In recent years the armed forces have moved toward greater flexibility concerning enhanced readiness. Instead of relying on alternative contingency plans prepared in advance, as was the case in the past, peacetime readiness is now adapted more closely and more often to changes in the rest of the world. "We speculated a great deal last year about the possible arrival of large numbers of refugees from Poland. Today we do not think this is likely. The weather makes it almost impossible to cross the Baltic in small boats, and Poland's territorial waters are being sealed off," Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung said.

In southern Sweden plans have been drawn up to enable the civilian and military authorities to cooperate in the event of a rapid influx of refugees into Sweden. No special measures have yet been adopted. The Swedish Armed Forces have three main ways of finding out what is happening inside and around Poland and in the southern Baltic. With the aid of radar and aircraft surveillance, traffic in and over the Baltic can be checked, and by listening to radio traffic, especially military communications, a great deal can be "seen." This is done by various installations which the Armed Forces' Radio Institute has scattered around Sweden.

The defense forces also have two passenger aircraft -- Caravelles -- with civil markings and filled with advanced electronic equipment. The Caravelles fly over international waters in the Baltic and can listen to radio traffic far inside the Soviet Union. Even though a great deal is transmitted in code and cannot be interpreted, it is possible to determine from traffic volume and so on whether anything special is happening and, in some cases, how individual military units are moving and behaving.

Polish Defectors

[Excerpt] Swinoujscie/Ystad -- Around 60 Poles in Skaane [Sweden's southernmost province] sought political asylum in Sweden Monday [14 December]. By the evening the police in Ystad had taken around 25 Poles into their care. The Poles had defected when Polish ferries docked in the Skaane town. On the morning ferry from Swinoujscie alone 13 Poles sought asylum in Sweden, these include two mothers with their children.

The Poles are being accommodated in an old senior citizens' home in Loderup, where they are looked after while they are questioned and their answers recorded. Two other sites have been prepared in case they should be needed. The refugees who are now arriving are those who succeed in getting on the ferries from Poland. Others requesting asylum are Poles already in Sweden with tourist visas but who are now asking to be allowed to stay because of their fears occasioned by the changed situation in Poland. It is hardly likely that there will be as many ferry refugees in the future. The ferry link with Ystad, which will soon be the Poles' only way out, is becoming less regular. Day trips have been suspended, and one of the passenger ferries has been taken out of service. However, train and truck ferry traffic is continuing as normal.

Among the 25 seeking asylum are 3 crewmen from one of the ferries and 3 people who hid from the police when the ferry entered the Polish port from Sweden Sunday and they were told that the army had taken over. However, Polish soldiers caught others who also hid on the ferry. They were taken ashore screaming. Polish ferries are considered Polish territory even when they are in Swedish ports.

"It is only in very special cases that Swedish police can go on board and act in Ystad," Police Chief Kaj Hansson said. Some of the Scandinavian passengers on board the ferry to Ystad Monday had been collected by the army or the police in various Polish cities and had more or less been driven out of the country with the threat that if they did not leave they would be arrested. In their raids the Polish authorities used the information about addresses which travelers to Poland must give. Several of the Swedes who were returning to Ystad had been distributing aid deliveries to several different Polish cities from Individual Humanitarian Aid and Save the Children. No one knows how such deliveries will be made in the future. They could be stopped in the very near future. In addition, eight Swedes making aid deliveries in Poland have been stranded there. The Swedish Foreign Ministry is now asking the Poles why this has happened. However, it is probable that the eight are already on their way home.

DENKTAS TAKING STEPS TO FORM NEW GOVERNMENT

TA171207 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Text] President Denktas has said that he would begin a third round of talks with political party leaders in an attempt to solve the present government problem in the federated state.

In a statement at the end of the meeting with the outgoing prime minister, Mr Cagatay, this morning, President Denktas said that he would be in a position to announce the prime minister-designate at the end of his separate talks with party leaders.

The prime minister, Mr Cagatay, said that he had informed the president of the details of his talks as the leader of the National Unity Party [NUP] with the leader of the Communal Liberation Party [CLP], Mr Durduran. He stated that his party wanted Mr Durduran to get a mandate to form a coalition government from the Executive Committee of the CLP, and not just an authority to hold discussions. He added that this decision had been communicated to Mr Durduran this morning.

Durduran described Mr Cagatay's statement as insincere and said that the decision to form a coalition lay with the NUP executive and not with his party.

GREECE'S CURRENT FOREIGN POLICY AIMS ANALYZED

NC180959 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 14 Dec 81 p 2

[First installment of article by retired Ambassador Muharrem Nuri Birgi: "Turkish-Greek Relations Under Papandreou"]

[Excerpts] As a nation, we do not intend to attack Greece. Neither do we harbor feelings of hatred toward the Greeks as a nation. Naturally those of us who experienced the tragedy of the war of independence do not cherish any feelings of sympathy toward the Greeks, but I do not believe that even we harbor any feelings of vengeance. Whenever Greece showed any signs of friendship, including the "olive branch" extended to us recently by Papandreou, we have immediately reacted quite positively. Even today there are people among us who are exploring ways of creating an air of normalization and a constructive mutual understanding in relations between the two countries. To put it more precisly, they are trying to find out whether anything can be done at all in this direction.

Unfortunately the tableau in Greece is totally different. There, through textbooks, literary works and lectures, children at a tender age are told that the Aegean is an entirely Greek sea, that the whole of Turkey, but mainly Istanbul, "should be returned to Greece." Ever since Greece won its independence, its relations with Turkey as well the political atmosphere have been either improving or deteriorating according to the extent that these Greek illusions lose or regain their effectiveness. Like the pendulum of a clock, they go from one side to another. Where is the pendulum now? I find it impossible to deny that it is bad and is tending to get worse. But it would be rash to say that it is impossible for this pendulum to be set right.

The world of politics has a characteristic that is valid in every country. This is the fact the promises made and the threats uttered before and during elections are subject to various measures of discount when the elections are over and responsibilities are confronted. Therefore I shall not dwell on what Papandreou said before and during the election campaign: I shall simply try to analyze what he has been saying and doing today. It appears that in his relations with the West, Papandreou's fundamental objective is to push Turkey in the direction of Greece's illusions, to which I have referred above. It is understood that to achieve this objective, he is determined to manipulate his position in NATO and the EEC, including threats to walk out in various ways. He may even be expected to threaten to close down the U.S. bases in Greece to secure the discontinuation, or at least the reduction, of U.S. aid to Turkey.

It would be appropriate not to lose sight of these two points in evaluating these threats: If Papandreou does not desire to lead his country to neutrality or to joining the Third World -- a policy that would serve the ambitions of the Soviet Union, then he can leave neither NATO nor the EEC. Even in the case of the U.S. bases, he may be expected to act cautiously, even if he chose stern measures. Threats and blackmail can be useful if they are used like the sword of Damocles, hanging in such a way that it might drop at any minute. But on many occasions if threats are made, not only do they lose their value, but they result in cutting the ground from under one's own feet. As to withdrawing only from the military wing of NATO, previous Greek Governments too tried this, but failed to achieve what they wanted and had to return after seeing that their action was against their own interests in that it had doubled Turkey's value from NATO's defense point of view.

The present situation indicates that the first result Papandreou is trying to obtain within NATO is to paralyze our military defense and to turn Turkey into an element of threat against Greece, just like the Soviet Union. That is why he has brought to the NATO defense ministers' conference the story that "Turkey would attack Greece militarily" -- a story that was made up during Karamanlis' time before Papandreou came to power.

Greek rulers before Karamanlis had assessed this story more mildly. Our allies, on the other hand, had shown a ridiculous inclination to establish a fixed ratio in the aid to be rendered both to Greece and Turkey in the hope that they might counter any imprudent action not only by Turkey but by Greece as well. Thus with their own means and with the encouragement of extremely pro-Greek countries like France, the Greeks managed to turn the balance in the air force strength in their favor.

Now Papandreou is playing this game rashly and openly. Why is he doing this? It is difficult to think that Papandreou believes the myth that Turkey is going to attack Greece. If he doesn't, then what is his aim? His first aim is clear: In face of the Middle East developments, Turkey's importance is enhanced in every way, particularly from the strategic point of view. This importance has increased because Greece under Papandreou is shrouded by clouds of incredibility. The natural outcome of this situation is to strengthen Turkey, both militarily and economically. This fact has been reinforced by U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger's visit and the information which has emerged since this visit. Papandreou's first objective is to counter this trend.

SOVIET UNION REJECTS CSCE DRAFT DOCUMENT

[Text] We have just received a report which says that the Soviet Union has refused to negotiate the drawing up of a final document for the Madrid conference on the basis of the proposal made officially yesterday by a group of neutral and nonaligned countries, according to statements today from Western delegates.

According to the experts, this attitude could mean the resounding failure of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe or its prolongation during the course of next year. After a day of moderate optimism with regard to the success of the moves made by the neutral and nonaligned countries to overcome the longstanding deadlock in the Madrid conference, the hopes for achieving this have almost completely disappeared, according to the same sources. According to these sources, Soviet representatives told their Western counterparts and the neutral countries who are negotiating the document that the text is almost wholly unacceptable.

KREISKY ANSWERS NEWSMEN'S QUESTIONS ON POLAND

AU181510 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1132 GMT 18 Dec 81

[Report on Chancellor Kreisky's press conference in Vienna 18 December]

[Excerpts] [Begin Kreisky recording] I am deeply convinced that if there should be military intervention in Poland this would be the death of the policy of detente, that it will be dead in a manner that many of us cannot even conceive of today. [end recording] [According to a recorded excerpt of the press conference carried by Vienna Domestic Television Service in German at 1335 GMT, Kreisky continued at this point: "Then everything will be dead -- Helsinki will be dead, disarmament will be dead. Then there will be no parliament in any democratic state in Europe that would not approve of all armament expenditures its government asks for. We will then be on the eve of a period of gigantic rearmament such as we have not experienced since World War II."]

In connection with Poland, Kreisky's assessment of the current world situation in reply to a question by the U.S. CBS television company, answered in English was: [Begin Kreisky recording, in English] The situation is more dangerous: there is no doubt about that. The situation is very, very dangerous. Today we have one of the most dangerous situations since World War II. Here in Europe because of Poland, in the Middle East because of the decision of the Israeli Knesset to annex the Golan, the situation in the war between Iraq and Iran, the tension as a consequence of the military occupation of, the military action against, Afghanistan -- all this has created a situation that is very, very dangerous.

Kreisky's assessment of a perhaps still more or less peaceful further development in Poland: [Begin recording] Since, as unfortunately could not be avoided, this conflict has now led to bloodshed, this regime which has now established itself I believe will find it very much more difficult to find some way to reconciliation again. There can be no question about that. The moment you have casualties, the conditions for an easing of the situation and a pacification change immediately. [end recording] And the assessment of the chancellor, the opinion of the chancellor, about an imminent danger of intervention in Poland: [Begin recording] I can only say what we said yesterday -- to express the hope that, as unpleasant and unfortunate the events in Poland are and as much as we condemn them, we still hope there will be no outside intervention from any side. [end recording]

The chancellor declared a few days ago that human rights were being violated in Poland. He expressed this opinion again today: [Begin recording] [Kreisky] From the human rights point of view it will not matter a bit to anyone imprisoned today who his torturers and his prison wardens are. Please accept that from one who has personally experienced such a situation, indeed twice.

[Question] [Words indistinct] anyone is tortured in Poland?

[Answer] I am of the opinion that in Poland people are being arrested and thrown into jail and that human rights are being disregarded. That is my opinion. No one will be able to deny my right to this opinion, considering my political principles. There can be no question about that. [end recording]

In reply to the question as to what attitude the Austrian Government will adopt toward the military regime in Poland once the situation has been stabilized, the chancellor replied: [Begin recording] The Kadar regime, for example, immediately after it came to power looked different from the way it looks today. No one can foresee what will come. I for my part can only say that I cannot imagine that such a situation as has now developed in Poland will not also completely alter the political prerequisites. There can be no question about that. [end recording]

SCHMIDT SPEAKS TO BUNDESTAG ON POLAND, GDR

DW181209 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1101 GMT 18 Dec 81

[Government statement delivered by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to the Bundestag -- live]

[Text] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen: This week developments in Poland, the imposition of martial law there, cause us great concern. We hear of many arrests, large internment camps, clashes and injured and dead people. Soldiers are shooting at workers, trade union members are placed under arrest. Solidarity is being smashed. With all my heart I am on the side of the workers. [applause]

All of us wish with all our hearts that the state of war in Poland be ended as soon as possible. [applause] Pope John Paul II has come out with an appeal that no Polish blood be shed since so much Polish blood has already been shed. In view of German-Polish history, every German politician cannot but endorse this appeal. [applause] No new wounds must be added to the deep sorrows of the Polish people.

Early this week in London, the foreign ministers of the EC member states stated jointly the feelings and expectations with which the governments and peoples are watching developments in Poland. The Federal Government seconds this clear statement clearly and fully. Above all I share the expectation that all signatory states of the Helsinki Final Act will abstain from any interference in the internal affairs of the Polish People's Republic, that the Poles themselves will solve their problems and without any further use of force [applause], and that the Polish Government itself will seriously fulfill its commitments resulting from the Helsinki Final Act, so that the process of reform and renewal may be resumed.

We stand by those who, like the pope, want to help prevent developments from possibly becoming fatally dangerous for the Poles and even for all of us. Our own policy toward the Polish People's Republic remains one of strict respect for the national independence of this state. Yet, it also is a policy which expresses our profound sympathy with the people in Poland. This is why, within the framework of the European Community, we propose to continue the foodstuffs aid to Poland. [applause] The manifold and spontaneous readiness to help by thousands of our fellow citizens confirms this course of the Federal Government. [applause]

I ask everyone not to slacken your active solidarity with the Polish people. [applause] After all, this solidarity is also an expression of our German will for peace and of our readiness for peace. The same will for peace is proved by the talks on which I am scheduled to report on today. On 3 December I reported to the Bundestag on the course and the results of our talks with the Soviet general secretary. Second, in this connection I stated that the beginning of U.S.-Soviet negotiations in Geneva has opened a gate which unblocks the road to progress toward making peace more safe in Europe and in the world. Third, I am in a position today to give an account to parliament on my meeting with the chairman of the GDR State Council, General Secretary Erich Honecker, which took place 11-13 December at Lakes Werbellin and Doelln in Uckermark region. All three events fit into the overall peace policy concept of the Federal Government.

The meeting between Mr Honecker and myself, the first on German soil since the meetings between Willy Brandt and Willi Stoph in Erfurt and Kassel a decade ago, even more than a decade ago, allows a similar judgment as that given for the beginning of the Geneva negotiations, namely, dual aspects: The meeting provided a contribution, an inter-German contribution, to the international safeguarding of peace. At the same time it meant a new start on the toilsome path toward good-neighborly relations between the two German states and their citizens. The opportunity for constructive movement in many fields has been opened.

Mr Honecker and I had planned this meeting for quite some time. Because of the invasion of Afghanistan and because an invasion of Poland that was threatening last summer, the meeting was postponed twice. Yet the people in the GDR as well as in our country anticipated some prospects for the future from such a meeting, and I wanted to encourage them in this respect. [applause]

Nearly 20 years ago, Marion Graefin Doenhoff, Theo Sommer and Rudolf Walter Leonhardt entitled a report on a GDR tour by journalists: "Trip to a Remote Country." Out of conviction and with passion the federal governments of the social-liberal coalition have been trying for the past 12 years to reduce this remoteness. We have in fact moved a bit closer together during these 12 years. Nevertheless, the hurdles caused by delimination are still very high, and for millions of Germans these hurdles are still insurmountable.

For this reason the meeting was necessary. After a period of setbacks, the relationship between the two German states needs a start toward new headway. [applause] The very long exchange of political opinions between Mr Honecker and myself -- lasting nearly 15 hours -- was very intensive and frank. It is one of the most intensive talks which I have so far conducted with another government in my capacity as chancellor. It proceeded in a friendly tone, by the way, and on the whole it led to more mutual understanding and to the increased ability to properly assess the other side's objectives and aspirations.

This mutual understanding is indispensable for a positive development. We are still far from good-neighborly relations. However, in very difficult but frank talks we gained greater clarity about each other's interests. We sought to dispose of matters of the past so as to be able to deal with each other more reasonably in the future. This was necessary for a long time. If the network of relations can be strengthened and enhanced, then it will benefit the people in both German states. [applause]

We sought this option, and we made use of it. I did so based on my convictions because the people over here as well as over there can expect any German chancellor to fulfill this commitment. It is certainly true that even after these talks the state of controversy will remain between the reality of the existence of two German states and the call on all the German people to complete the unity and freedom of Germany in free self-determination, as laid down in the preamble of our Basic Law. The controversial views on this issue and on other fundamental questions were not covered up at Werbellin and Doelln, and nobody harbored the illusion that he might be able to force the other to abandon his convictions.

We made our position clear with all frankness. This also holds true, and particularly so, as far as the national issue is concerned because it is my profound conviction that the idea of the nation, the identity of the nation, continues to be alive and present among us Germans without any change. [applause]

In the government statement delivered here on 3 December, I pointed out that it was intended for the talks and the dialogue between the two German states to be in the foreground at this meeting, and that there would not be any signing of new agreements on the occasion. I expressly came out against speculations, expectations, and over-ambitious hopes. Both sides did in fact enter into these talks without any preconditions. We clearly represented our affairs and this naturally also involves the minimum exchange regulation.

Federal Ministers Franke and Graf Lambsdorff contributed with personal and businesslike actions to this visit bearing fruit. I have the justified hope that next year movement will become visible with regard to the further development of relations in various fields between the FRG and the GDR.

It became evident during the talks that the GDR leadership is also interested in overcoming stagnation. I take it from an interview given on Wednesday by General Secretary Honecker to NEUES DEUTSCHLAND, an SED paper published in East Berlin, that he, too, wants to handle the practical political implementation of the results of the talks in the spirit of the meeting.

We ourselves have already begun to practically implement the initiatives resulting from the meeting, and agreement on a 6-month prolongation of the current swing [overdraft credit] scheduled for years to expire on 31 December this year was concluded yesterday. [shouts] Economic relations between us and the GDR can be developed. Both sides aim at developing them. A long-term framework agreement can contribute the impetus which will seriously express and promote the long-term character of German-German relations. [applause] Both sides want to take up talks on this matter in the near future. Agreement exists that existing agreements and procedures, particularly the 1951 Berlin agreement, should not be curtailed but complemented. Commercial agreements will be fully completed in future in the framework of the existing agreements, and the TSI [Treuhandstelle fuer Innerdeutschen Handel -- Clearing Office for Inter-German Trade] will continue its work unhindered as before as the clearing office for industry and trade, including all Berlin firms.

But there is also no doubt that economic and financial relations cannot be excluded from the overall framework of relations. We made it clear to the other side at this meeting that particularly the minimum exchange amount, travel and visit problems in both directions as well as humanitarian problems -- that all this belongs in the same political context, although individual decisions can be made only independently.

As expected, the GDR leadership maintained its basic demands. I do not want to enumerate them here once again. I pointed out that the Federal Government adheres and will continue to strictly adhere to the Basic Law and the stipulations of the basic treaty. A change of this principle is out. However, the Federal Government will try to do what is practically possible within this framework.

The GDR understands that German state citizenship is indispensable for us in adhering to the Basic Law. We realize that the GDR issued its own state citizenship law in 1967.

We should also not forget that not all GDR citizens -- I use the terminology of the Federal Constitutional Court here -- that not all GDR citizens coming to us want to claim the rights in our country to which every German is entitled. I have in mind, for example, representatives of institutions, factories or GDR media who work temporarily in the FRG.

I fail to see, for example, why they have received election notifications for general elections or why they are being registered by military recruiting offices. If we respect in this sense the GDR citizenship as it exists -- I repeat in this sense -- the framework outlined for us by law and by the Basic Law will certainly not be touched. The contrasts and antagonisms on matters of principle which cannot be eliminated must be reduced by a structure made up of what is possible and reasonable for both sides. Only in this way can reasonable relations between neighbors be achieved -- relations which can later be developed into good-neighborly relations [applause] so that later we will have real living together [miteinander]. [applause]

We expressed thanks for the pleasant hospitality of the GDR leadership. [shouts] The end of the meeting was overcast by a shadow due to the exaggerated police and party activity in Guestrow [applause], exaggerated police and party activity which deprived many Guestrow citizens of the opportunity to have direct contact with my aides and myself.

The contrast between the understanding in the talks between the delegations, on the one hand and this spectacle, on the other, demonstrates the difficulties which still exist for German-German meetings. [shouts] But, my interruptors, Guestrow also stands for another experience. Our common visit to the cathedral, the visit of -- I quote -- Marxist Erich Honecker and Christian Helmut Schmidt, also Bishop Heinrich Rathke addressed the two of us there, this visit and the TV picture of these three people next to each other in the choir banks [shouts] gave an important sign that there is something in common between the citizens of the GDR and the citizens of our country -- not only between the Christians among us. [prolonged applause, shouts]

A more important sign of the things in common, Deputy Marx, than toasts, communiques, resolutions or interruptions. [applause] I myself think back to the meeting in Guestrow Cathedral not without emotion.

The Land bishop had pointed out to Mr Honecker and myself that Barlach, the Guestrow Cathederal and the brick baroque of the Baltic Sea area are symbols of what we have in common, as he put it, a common past and memories, he said. I replied to him that this heritage could also mean a common future. [applause]

Federal Minister Franke and State Minister Huonker had laid wreaths in my name in the former concentration camp of Sachsenhausen and the soldiers' graveyard at Halbe, where Russian forced laborers are buried next to German soldiers. This, too, has made one aware of the common past, of the common historical background on which the efforts aimed at rapprochment and understanding gain their real clarity. This common historical background is as valid today as it was when the social-liberal coalition after 1969 initiated the change in German policy, creating the basis and the framework with the treaty work of the seventies for mutual relations of the two German states.

At that time this coalition took an active part in the detente process that had gotten going between the two world powers, and it used as well as intensified it simultaneously. Today the critical and dangerous problems between the East and the West offer a completely different chance, namely to achieve through peace policy efforts also better German-German relations.

Our talks were naturally part of the urgently needed dialogue between the West and the East. Naturally we have carefully discussed the situation in Europe, particularly discussing disarmament and arms control problems. In doing this, we have not covered up the antagonisms. We have talked to each other very clearly, very frankly. On the basis of the common Western positions of our Atlantic alliance and the European Community, I have naturally and equally unambiguously talked to Mr Honecker as I did 4 weeks earlier to Mr Brezhnev.

As Germans in the GDR and as Germans in the Federal Republic of Germany we bear common responsibility for it that our dealings with each other will not aggravate but mitigate tensions in Europe as far as possible. [applause] Our partners in the West as well as our neighbors in East Europe must and can rely on it -- as I said to the Bundestag on 9 April this year -- that no additional tensions will emanate in any case from developments in Germany. The communique of last Sunday says literally that no additional burdens will emanate from relations between the two German states for East-West relations. [applause] This is a significant element of this Federal Government's German policy. I do not doubt that concern for the preservation of peace plays a central role also in the thinking and policy of the GDR's political leaders. I do not doubt that the will for peace is as strong in the GDR as in our country. I agreed with General Secretary Honecker that it is a most urgent task to achieve concrete agreements on a stable balance of forces, of military forces in Europe on as low a level as possible. This agreement at a time when the central negotiations on medium-range weapons have just begun in Geneva is important and, I hope, helpful.

I consider it useful and necessary to continue this exchange of opinion on international affairs with the GDR, be it at subsequent meetings with General Secretary Honecker, be it in talks of the foreign ministers which took place repeatedly. Such exchange of opinion must and can help build confidence. I expressly agree with Federal Minister Genscher in stating that new ways must be found to safeguard the security of nations through balancing and interlocking their interests but not through striving for superiority or even ideological missioning. I am reiterating Genscher's words of German policy being European peace policy. [applause]

Better German-German relations can indeed contribute toward making the East-West relationship in Europe steadier and more reliable. The Bavarian minister president and several others advised me following the talks that in the light of Polish developments we should have broken off abruptly our talks with General Secretary Honecker and his delegation on Sunday morning.

I am asking myself what those who gave me such advice actually wanted to achieve. What people did they want to help? [applause] What people would have benefitted from it? And if you are telling me, Poland, I am answering you that an advance dramatization of Polish events by us, the Germans, of all people would in fact have benefitted neither the Poles nor the Germans. [applause]

Germans still must not see themselves as judges over Poland, not yet! [applause] On the contrary, it was right and it helped the international situation and the situation in the GDR that on Sunday morning I expressed the hope that the Poles would succeed in solving their internal conflicts on their own and among themselves. [applause]

On 3 December I said here that the CDU/CSU's appearance in peace and security policy was diffuse. I asked the opposition to make its course and intentions clear. This has not yet been done, and today everybody is seeing the same lack of direction again. [applause, commotion] The Berlin Mayor von Weizsaecker, CDU, for instance, said, applauded by a large gathering in Berlin, that nobody would have understood it if our visit to the GDR had been broken off abruptly because of events in Poland. On the contrary, this would have destroyed the new German-German contacts and confidence. [applause] I share Von Weizsaecker's opinion which, by the way, is in accordance with the specific interests of the city that he has to govern. [applause]

At the same time, Mr Minister President Spaeth, CDU, made a similar statement as Weizsaecker. Mr Khol, heading a joint CDU/CSU parliamentary party, this morning will have to decide between these two views. [applause] Dr Kohl, you will not like to make this decision, because we see that in the treacherous hope for a rapid change of chancellorship one forgets all too easily that every leadership claim can be founded only by clear objectives, efficiency and the power of decision. [applause] Those who do not want to run a risk cannot win anything. [applause] Those who in the complicated, difficult and dangerous situation in Central Europe refuse to talk to their neighbor or break off talks violate our interests. [appaluse] Those who use force in Europe violate human rights. [applause] Those who interfere in another country by force violate international law and peace. [applause] We have repeatedly experienced all this in the past 3 decades. Not only we Germans and not only the Poles fear that all this could be repeated. All Europeans are aware that their peace, too, could be jeopardized. Grave shadows could also be cast on German-German talks and relations.

The international climate is not created in East Berlin or Bonn. But Bonn must and will do everything in its power to reduce dangers and we will do everything in our power to avoid aggravations. [applause] In doing this we rely on the consent within our alliance. We contribute to this alliance through our preparedness for understanding as well as through our preparedness for defense and the performance of our Bundeswehr. We are guided by the dual realization that never again must a war emanate from German soil and that Germany must never again be devastated by a war. [applause]

This is the centerpiece and this was also the aim of my talks with Mr Honecker. In Guestrow and Luebeck, in Cologne and Magdeburg, in Dresden and Munich, everywhere the Germans expect us to do our duty which is based on common German history, our duty which is based on the common German history laden with guilt. [loud, prolonged applause]

MAUROY ADDRESSES NATIONAL ASSEMBLY ON POLAND

[Excerpts] On Wednesday several deputies mentioned at the National Assembly -- during a session devoted to questions put to the government -- the events taking place in Poland. The premier stated that there are times "when our domestic political problems should be put aside" and described the situation which prevails in Poland under the "martial law" regime. And he continued: "Irrespective of the continent, people and race involved, wherever people are oppressed they will find us at their side. This is what we have always done --both yesterday in opposition and today in power. Never did we," he went on, "call the Warsaw Pact armies' intervention in Czechoslovakia a temporary setback! Unlike the then premier, we never refused to condemn the military coup in Chile. Nor have we ever remained silent with respect to repression in Argentina and El Salvador.

"By thus bearing testimony in the international arena we aim to help the Polish people to face up to the situation which has been forced upon them, help them to rediscover the path to democratic renewal. Even though it is aware of the French people's enthusiasm, the government will remain calm, because there could be nothing more irresponsible and more contemptible with respect to the Polish and French peoples than saying more than, or something different from, what we can achieve through deeds."

France's aid to Poland, Mr Mauroy emphasized, has also been expressed in "constant diplomatic activities." And he added: "Our support has been and will remain concrete. He did not wait for the present deterioration before helping Poland materially, and we have always helped it, sometimes on our own. Since July I personally have been engaged in organizing special food aid as a matter of urgency and we have never ceased seeking to persuade all Western countries to lighten Poland's burden of debt. As recently as yesterday our minister of economy and finance approached our EC partners with this end in mind, just as we have approached them to ensure that the condemnation expressed by the Ten is clearer and more categorical. However, irrespective of the scale of our protest we must assess the situation honestly and state that the current events have so far remained within the Polish national framework. We want them to remain within it."

At this point several UDF deputies shouted: "Hypocrisy! Hypocrisy!"

"The Polish workers," Mr Mauroy continued, "have already been subjected to oppression by their own army. You can imagine what would happen if they were also subjected to oppression by other, foreign armies. Any internationalization of the Polish crisis would have very grave repercussions. This is why -- I repeat on the government's behalf -- we hope that Poland will find the path of renewal and liberties through national accord and without any foreign interference." (The premier was applauded by the PS and PCF groups.)

"A Single Policy"

Mr Stirn (UDF, Calvados) asserted that within the majority party and the government "there are men who seek to justify the Warsaw military coup" because their priorities, he stated, are different from those of the premier. "In their view," he added, "what counts is that order should prevail in Warsaw. They did not applaud you a moment ago when you made statements which showed that, in your view, what counts is freedom in Warsaw."

Mr Stirn stated that it is out of the question to challenge the view that food aid should be given to the Polish people but, he remarked, "you may wonder about the advisability of supporting the government which has just achieved power in Poland -- while not forgoing the idea of letting it benefit from the considerable financial aid whose allocation was decided before the coup."

Taking the floor again, Mr Mauroy stated: "It is true that the minister of economy and finance participated in a routine meeting during which this aid and debt repayments were discussed, but nothing has yet been decided and no pledge has been given. The government has merely continued to discuss the matter calmly to ensure that it can help Poland when, once the circumstances have changed, it is again able to deal with that country's genuine leaders. As for the Polish crisis' repercussions on domestic policy, I know that the opposition will speak about it at great length. Let it absorb the idea that my government has not two or three policies but only one -- the policy which I, as premier, have just explained."

NO COMPLIANT SILENCE ON POLAND, SAYS COT

[Text] "When order prevails in Warsaw freedom is threatened in our country," Mr Jean-Pierre Cot, minister of cooperation and development, stated during a debate organized by the newspaper LA CROIX Monday, 14 December, on the following theme: "Respect for Human Rights and Economic, Political and Strategic Balances in the World."

And the minister added: "If the experiment in democracy is interrupted, the evolution of Eastern countries will be called into question. It is out of the question to resume the compliant silence observed in 1968 (when Czechoslovakia was invaded). If perchance external intervention took place a new situation would arise. The Polish people must realize that they will be able to rely on France's active solidarity."

Asked about Mr Claude Cheysson's comments (LE MONDE of 15 December), Mr Cot stated: "The situation is sufficiently grave to make us restrain our language. Things are changing hourly. Nothing has yet been decided. We have no right to precipitate a situation merely to please ourselves."

PS LEADERSHIP BODY ISSUES STATEMENT ON POLAND

PM171527 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Dec 81 pp 8, 9

[Text] The PS Executive Committee, which met in Paris Sunday 13 December, has adopted the following statement: "The arrival in power [in Poland] of a special military committee for salvation and the declaration of martial law are causing great anxiety in France. Moreover, if confirmed, the many arrests of leaders and militants and the establishment of military courts demand clear condemnation.

"The PS knows that for its members, its voters and the vast majority of public opinion, the democratization process started by the Polish people more than a year ago represents a great hope for Poland and for Europe. The PS reaffirms its hope that the trade union freedom and freedom of speech won by the people's movement in Poland and notably by the Solidarity trade union will be maintained. It demands the release of the people arrested. It sends its friendly wishes to the Polish people in the present crucial period. The PS would consider it to be a very serious matter if the present developments in Poland were to lead to a return to the past in the sphere of democracy and freedom.

"The PS first secretary has met with the Polish ambassador to France to obtain information from him on the situation and to inform him of the acute concern felt by all socialists.

"The PS Executive Committee mandates the Executive Bureau to take all the decisions for action required by events, in conjunction with all our country's democratic forces."

SOCIALIST LEADER ADDRESSES POLISH SUPPORT RALLY

NC192115 Paris AFP in English 2104 GMT 19 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 19 Dec (AFP) -- The first secretary of France's Socialist Party today advocated using Poland's economic dependence on the West as a wedge to loosen martial law in Poland [words indistinct] return of civil liberties.

Lionel Jospin, addressing some 10,000 people at a Polish support meeting, cited ties between the independent Solidarity union (?and the) French left, which "share the same values, the same objectives and the same demands." He stressed any economic pressure on Poland should exclude cutting off food aid, which he said would simply hurt the people.

Polish actor Andres Seneryn, described as Solidarity's representative at the meeting, said his union "is not dead" and that "resistance is being organized in Poland." French National Assembly President Louis Mermaz called for an "end to the state of siege and a stop to repression in Poland." An hour-long strike is scheduled by most French trade unions Monday (1000-1100 GMT) in support of the Polish people.

MARCHAIS INTERVIEWED ON POLISH SITUATION

NC202051 Paris AFP in English 2024 GMT 20 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 20 Dec (AFP) -- French Communist leader Georges Marchais stressed today that "Everything possible must be done to avoid civil war and external intervention in Poland."

In a rare statement since Socialist President Francois Mitterrand assumed power -- and included Communist ministers in his government -- last May, Mr Marchais said in an interview with AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE that "all must be done (also) to continue the indispensable reforms necessary to resolve" Poland's problems. Poland's economic, social and democratic problems must be solved on the basis of understanding among national forces, he said. Mr Marchais made the statement amid refusal by the French Communist Party and powerful Communist-led CGT trades union federation to join in nation-wide condemnation for the military take-over in Poland.

FOOD DELIVERIES TO POLAND WILL NOT BE STOPPED

LD210914 Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 21 Dec 81

MITTERRAND MAY POSTPONE VISIT TO ISRAEL

LD201936 Paris Domestic Service in French 1900 GMT 20 Dec 81

[Text] President Francois Mitterrand may postpone the official visit to Israel he was to make 10-12 February until a later date. This postponement, if confirmed, would no doubt be a direct consequence of the recent annexation of the Golan Heights by Israel. At the Ministry of External Relations it was stated that to make any announcement about a postponement of the presidential visit would be premature, however, the ministry provided no confirmation of these dates.

POLITICAL GROUPS COMMENT ON DOZIER KIDNAPPING

[Excerpt] Rome, 19 Dec (ANSA) -- The kidnapping in Italy of United States General James Lee Dozier by Red Brigade urban guerrillas has once again raised the question of terrorism's international links. The secretary of Italy's Liberal Party, Valerio Zanone, warned that terrorism had entered a new stage and that international headquarters were masterminding such actions now. It was not by chance that the general, a top ranking NATO officer, was kidnapped and a blow thus delivered to the Western alliance at a time when Poland was being subjected to a military clampdown, he said.

Social Democratic Party Secretary Pietro Longo also saw the kidnapping as part of an international strategy of terrorism or at least as an action having objectives of an international nature. Republican Roldolfo Bandiera called it "a terrorist operation at an international level, diligently prepared over a long period of time.." Social Democratic Deputy Constantino Belluscio also saw Dozier's seizure in Verona as calling into question the effectiveness of Italy's security services. This is especially true, he said, when it is taken into consideration that during questioning of recent Red Brigades kidnap victims it appeared that NATO personnel or installations had been targeted for attack, he stressed. The radicals also believed that the seizure of the NATO officer could have been foreseen on the basis of information contained in recent documents on terrorism in Italy. The Socialist Party's lower house caucus issued a statement here claiming that the kidnapping throws a "new and alarming light on the international links of political terrorism in Italy and on the strong influence which these phenomena exert on our country from outside."

Red Brigades Communique

[Excerpt] The first Red Brigades communique on the kidnapping of U.S. General Dozier has been found in Rome. For developments in this case here is our correspondent in Verona, Also Bello:

[Begin recording] The echo of the appeal by Mrs Dozier that whoever is holding her husband should treat him with humanity had not yet faded away when there came another echo, a cold and calculated one, in the customary and hateful ritual of the Red Brigades, with Communique No 1 found in the capital. In the telephone call to ANSA, which indicated the spot where the communique would be, one thing was made clear: the 300-page file, said the unknown phone caller, found by three Rome dailies and containing contributions of a theoretical nature entitled "BR Journal No 4" is "not our work but that of a splinter group." We, he added, will release the "true strategic resolution of 1981" together with Communique No 2.

Here is the content of Communique No 1: Three [words indistinct] closely trypewritten files. The communique is signed "Red Brigades for Communism," which means that the kidnapping of the NATO deputy commander has not been accomplished by one single column but by a clandestine formation. In its totality it does not contain any demands. There is the usual heading with the five-pointed star, followed by four long slogans and the claim: "Thursday, 17 December, an armed nucleus of our organization," said in the ignoble language of the terrorists, "an armed nucleus of our organization captured and locked up in a people's prison a dirty Yankee of the U.S. Army of occupation, Brig Gen James Dozier, deputy commander of the Allied Land Forces in Southern Europe." This claim precedes a long analysis on NATO, war and missiles. This is the central passage of the first communique which, generally speaking, is ready-made prior to a subversive action about to be carried out.

The last part of the document contains an appeal on behalf of so-called proletarian internationalism which exalts the Red Army Faction, the foremost West German subversive organization, and stresses the need to reopen, I quote, "to reopen on a new basis the dialogue with other European revolutionary forces and with the IRA." [end recording]

PCI, PCE RENEW CONDEMNATION OF POLISH EVENTS

AU181953 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 18 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 18 Dec (ANSA) -- The Italian and Spanish Communist Parties renewed their condemnation of the imposition of martial law in Poland, the arrests reported and the suppression of civil and trade union rights in that country in a joint communique released in Rome today at the end of a visit here by Spanish party Secretary Santiago Carrillo. The communique said Carrillo arrived in Rome yesterday for a 24-hour visit which centered on consultations with the head of the Italian party, Enrico Berlinguer, on developments in Poland and the Israeli annexation of the Golan Heights. The two communist party leaders also agreed, the communique said, on the dangerous repercussions certain to be felt as a result of the Israeli move and underscored the need to push forward in the Middle East with initiatives developed by European democratic forces.

Archbishop on Way to Warsaw

LD191624 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 1515 GMT 19 Dec 81

[Excerpt] The papal nuncio for special missions, Archbishop Luigi Poggi, left this morning by plane for Vienna to be able to continue his journey by train to Warsaw this evening. Archbishop Poggi, who has been maintaining contacts for 8 years with the countries of East Europe, is accompanied by Msgr Janusz Polonek of the church's Council for Public Affairs.

As Cardinal Agostino Casaroli, secretary of state, stressed yesterday at a press conference after his return from the United States, up to now there has been a lack of direct contact between the Holy See and Polish bishops. Cardinal Casaroli added that the Holy See wants first and foremost to support the activity of the episcopate of Poland.

GOVERNMENT, PARTIES, UNIONS HIT POLISH CRACKDOWN

PM180915 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 15 Dec 81 p 9

[Excerpts] Madrid -- The seizure of political power by the military in Poland and the declaration of martial law have caused deep concern in the various political and trade union sectors. This concern has also manifested itself among those attending the Madrid CSCE conference, the delegations at which, after adopting a concerned wait-and-see stance, have declined to make any comment on the situation in Poland, believing that this is an internal affair of that socialist country.

For their part, Spanish reactions to the Polish military's coup were immediate. The government, shortly after learning the news, issued a communique stating that it was following events with concern and alarm, while at the same time expressing its confidence that this crisis can be surmounted without external interference or the adoption of internal measures which would ruin the progress recently achieved by the Polish people. In this connection the Spanish Government believes that a political regression in Poland would constitute a negative development of considerable gravity. As far as political parties' and trade union federations' reactions are concerned, they were all in agreement in vigorously condemning the military's coup, and expressed their solidarity with the Polish workers and the defense of their rights and freedoms.

For its part, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party has described the Polish events as a further blow to peace and detente. "This reduces the portions of freedom recently won by the Polish workers, and makes clear the failure of a system incapable of accepting criticism and disagreement." The PCE and the Popular Alliance held special meetings to assess the events in Poland. The Communists' Central Committee Secretariat expressed its profound and radical disagreement with the Polish military coup and its intention to organize and take part in all actions which take place, in order to defend peace and democratic freedoms in any part of the world. Last, the Spanish Communists believe that the surmounting of this crisis can only come about by means of national reconciliation among all the forces which have real influence in Poland, maintaining the trade union freedoms stipulated in the agreements between the government and the Solidarity trade union. For its part, the Popular Alliance referred, after condemning the events, to Marxist socialism's inability to evolve toward a system of freedoms: Socialism has allowed the blow to be struck from within Poland itself, preparing itself for violent occupation if any resistance occurs."

For their part the General Workers Union [UGT], the Workers Trade Union and the National Confederation of Labor also condemn the Polish military coup and expressed their support for the Polish workers' struggle and for the Solidarity trade union's gains. They were in agreement that the defense of democratic freedoms as inseparable from the workers' struggle for decent working conditions, while at the same time expressing their concern at the consequences which this could have for world peace and detente. Like the workers commissions, the UGT has proposed holding joint actions of solidarity with the Polish workers, while at the same time demanding of that country's authorities the release of the detainees and the restoration of trade union freedom and constitutional rights, in order to resume the line of dialogue and negotiation in Poland.

COMMENTATOR ANALYZES AIMS OF RECENT TURKISH MOVES

["Letter From Athens" program, by Athens correspondent Konstandinos Kalligas]

[Text] Following its established and customary tactics -- "the thief shouting to scare the homeowner" -- Turkey recently proceeded to a deliberate and planned heightening of tension in its relations with Greece. This is seen in two moves: The recent false allegation that Greece landed troops in Cyprus just at the time Turkey was strengthening its military occupation forces on the island; and the truly improbable allegation by Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen that Greece has allegedly forfeited its rights as a guarantor power in Cyprus.

As to the first allegation -- the alleged landing of Greek troops in the area of Paphos and so forth -- this has not only been denied by the Greek side but also by the commander of UNFICYP. The Governments of Greece and Cyprus have also released concrete facts, quoting dates and numbers, proving beyond any doubt that the Turks did exactly what they accused Greece of doing -- in other words, they transferred additional troops and modern war equipment to the north of Cyprus, which they have occupied since 1974, thus renewing the equipment they already had there.

As to the second allegation, this is so obviously beyond any consideration that it merits no rejection. The argument used by Turkmen to establish his allegation on Greece losing its rights as a guarantor power is that Greece did not act when the Cypriot constitution was violated. (?How could Greece) have acted when this violation was undertaken by an illegal and condemned gang of exploiters of authority in Athens? That gang was not a Greek government, and consciously or unconsciously it opened the way for the Turkish invasion -- naturally undertaken neither for the restoration of the constitutional order on the island nor for guaranteeing its territorial integrity.

We should not, however, waste time in refuting obviously false and base allegations. The question is, what is Turkey's goal when it resorts to its new provocations and a sudden heightening of tension? Could this be a countermove in order to bring pressure on Greece to force our country to give up its legal rights and interests? Could this be the result of collusion with other forces, on which Turkey relies absolutely and without whose approval and consent it would never have dared undertake a major adventure with an immediate chain reaction not only in the area but also outside it? Could this also be the preamble to a third Attila in Cyprus? None of the authoritative observers in Athens believes this last possibility is the most likely. The situation does not permit such an undertaking, which would not remain confined to the island of Cyprus, as was the case in 1974, but which would immediately develop into a broader and more general clash in the entire area.

The fates of the entire Greek and Cypriot areas are integral and indivisible. Any possible further occupation of Cyprus would be a rift in a vital sector of the entire Greek perimeter, the broader Greek area. The consequences would be immediate and direct on the Greek area, which would become the next objective. Consequently, this is nothing but a parrying move and pressure aimed, apart from all else, at restoring the damage suffered by Turkey in Brussels, when by refusing to accept the well-known wording of the communique it indirectly admitted that it does have expansionist views at the expense of Greece and the Greek area in general. No matter how things stand, Greece will not be affected by Turkey's audacity and provocative attitude, and it will cede absolutely nothing. The bluff will have no effect. If, against all hopes, there is any attempt -- something which is unlikely -- the responsibility would rest upon others and not upon Greece, and it is these others who would regret their action.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

POLISH CRISIS DOMINATES CONCLUSION OF CSCE SESSION

LD182320 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 18 Dec 81

[Gloria del Campo report]

[Text] The current phase of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe ended this evening at 1830 with a single subject dominating the speeches at the last plenary session which lasted all day -- Poland. Poland was cited by all the Western countries and particularly by the Holy See, and as these countries spoke the Eastern delegates also brought the subject up. This removes even further the draft of the final document of the Madrid conference submitted by the neutral and nonaligned countries.

The dominant theme of the speeches, apart from stating that there should be no interference in the internal affairs of Poland, was one of harsh condemnation of the development in this country. Human rights are not being respected, it was stated, and these developments directly affect the Madrid conference. The Eastern delegations, with a brief Polish intervention and a much longer Soviet one, to mention the most important, stressed that no one should interfere with Polish affairs and that the Western news media have published some reports contrary to the reality of the situation. Everyone believes that if the Polish situation had not blown up at this point, an agreement would have been reached today on the basis of the document drawn up by neutral and nonaligned countries, although they would have had to come back in February to resolve the last details. Now the conference will resume on 9 February, but everything depends more than ever on Poland to continue the process begun with the Helsinki Final Act of 1975.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

FOOD DELIVERIES TO POLAND TO BE WATCHED

NC181505 Paris AFP in English 1419 GMT 18 Dec 81

[Text] Brussels, 18 Dec (AFP) -- The European Economic Community (EEC) is to watch carefully to see that 8,000 tons of beef it has given to Poland, and food sold cheaply, is distributed to the Polish people, the community commission said here today. The meat is due to be delivered soon, and the commission has detailed deliveries of other food stupplies sold by the EEC to Poland at 15 per cent below world prices. So far the deliveries comprise 663,000 tons of grain, 55,000 tons of sugar, 77,000 tons of meat, 32,000 tons of butter, and 600 tons of olive oil. Under contracts already concluded with Poland, 8,000 tons of butter, 1,000 tons of beef, 9,800 tons of pork and 163,000 tons of grain are still due to be delivered.

FOREIGN MINISTERS DENOUNCE ISRAEL, GOLAN DECISION

[Daniel Vernet dispatch]

[Text] London -- The unity of Europe and of the Ten has been restored as a result of the annexation of the Golan by Israel. The ministers of foreign affairs, who attended a special session in London on Monday, 14 December, and Tuesday in order to discuss some European matters, soon agreed on a draft statement, called "severe" by Mr Cheysson, which was to be officially published this Tuesday.

The draft statement points out that "The ministers of foreign affairs of EC member states deeply regret the Israeli Government and Knesset decision to extend Israeli law, jurisdiction and administration to the occupied Syrian territory of the Golan Heights. Such extension, which is tantamount to annexation, is contrary to international law and is therefore, in our view, null and void. This step is prejudicial to the possibility of the implementation of Security Council resolution 242 and is bound to make even more difficult the search for an overall peace settlement in the Near East, which we continue to support."

The 10 ministers stated that they were "amazed" by Mr Begin's decision. "This piece of news has literally come like a bolt from the blue," said Mr Cheysson, who was especially surprised because none of his Israeli interlocutors referred to such a possibility in any way during his recent visit to Jerusalem. Until now the Israeli leaders have respected the distinction between the West Bank, known under its Hebrew names of Samaria and Judea, on the one hand and the Golan, deemed to be Syrian territory, on the other. "Politically and juridically nothing justified this heartbreaking decision," the French minister of external relations commented. As the statement made by the Ten indicates, the annexation is contrary to international law, especially the 1907 Hague convention, which states that any occupying country must apply in the occupied territory the laws of the country to which that territory belongs. This kind of decision makes the prospects for peace recede even further," Mr Cheysson added. He still hopes, however, that the withdrawal from Sinai will be concluded as planned. While expressing his "sadness," the minister of external relations was nonetheless unwilling to prejudge the consequences which the Golan's annexation by Israel could have for French Near East policy.

MARTENS AFFIRMS ADHERENCE TO DUAL DECISION

LD181556 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 18 Dec 81

[Address by Prime Minister Wilfried Martens to the Chamber of Representative in Brussels -- live in Flemish with simultaneous French translation]

[Excerpt] The country's security is based on the solidarity of the NATO allies. Along with them, the government will do whatever is necessary to ensure the balance of power on which peace rests, while trying to bring armaments down to the lowest level by a policy of active negotiations. As regards medium-range nuclear weapons, the government confirms its adherence to the NATO dual decision of 12 December 1979 and refers back, as regards the Belgian position, to the 17 September 1980 decision of the third Martens government. It subscribes to the objective of the negotiations defined by the Western side -- making unnecessary, by means of dismantling the Soviet SS-20s, the installation of corresponding weapons in West Europe in 1983. The government will examine every 6 months, in consultation with its allies, the situation and the progress of negotiations and will come to the appropriate conclusion within the alliance framework. Parliament will be reguarly kept informed.

FOREIGN POLICY COUNCIL STAND ON POLAND REPORTED

AU181426 Vienna Domestic Service in German 17 GMT 17 Dec 81

[Statement by Chancellor Kreisky following the session of the Foreign Policy Council in parliament 17 December -- recorded]

[Text] At its session today the Foreign Policy Council thoroughly discussed the situation in Poland in the light of the latest development which gives rise to serious concern. It expresses the urgent expectation that human rights and basic freedoms in the sense of the Helsinki Final Act and the UN human rights charter will be ensured, and that in particular all persons illegally deprived of their freedom will be released. The council is convinced that the Polish people are capable of solving their own problems themselves with their own strength without any intervention from outside. In view of the great misery of the Polish people the council recommends the establishment of a national committee for the purpose of rendering aid to Poles in Austria and abroad, a committee to be composed of representatives of religious and humanitarian organizations, institutions of public life, as well as of political parties. The council appeals to all countries concerned to help Austria cope with the problem of Polish refugees.

KREISKY APPEALS FOR POLISH REFUGEE AID

AU211502 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 19 Dec 81 pp 2-3

[SK, AZ report on Chancellor Kreisky's press conference at the Vienna Concordia Press Club 18 December]

[Excerpts] Commenting on the current situation in Poland, the chancellor declared that now that the controversy has led to bloodshed the present regime will find it much more difficult to find the road to a reconciliation. Kreisky expressed the hope that, as unfortunate as the present events in Poland are, there will be no intervention from outside. The Austrian Government, he said, will use all its political influence to prevent a military intervention, and will do everything possible to induce the Polish Government to return to the political principles of Helsinki and to end the military dictatorship. So far, he said, there still exists at any rate a chance to prevent a military intervention.

The possibility of a return to the conditions before the proclamation of the state of emergency must be adopted as a working hypothesis. In this respect, he said, he was staking his hopes on the strong moral position of the Roman Catholic Church in Poland. The church in Poland has always been an important political factor which was also accepted as such by the government.

The solidarity with the Polish working class will be unlimited, Kreisky stressed, but no attempt will be made to make any recommendations to it or to give it any advice. That was why he, as representative of one of the biggest Social Democratic parties, was exercising restraint, Kreisky said, adding that it was easy for those who are not directly affected by the events to issue from a position of security inflammatory appeals for fighting. Regarding the question of Austria's future relations with Poland Kreisky declared that new circumstances also create new conditions in politics. Hence the changed situation in Poland would also completely change the Austrian policy and he, Kreisky, could not conceive that the relationship of positive coexistence and a relative measure of friendship will continue to exist as it had prior to last Sunday. The food shipments to Poland will at any rate be continued only if it is ensured that they will actually reach those who need such aid. One will not assist this regime that is in such flagrant contradiction to the wishes of its own people, Kreisky declared. He pointed out that most states have failed to adopt such a consistent attitude toward the Turkish military dictatorship.

Numerous questions by domestic and foreign newsmen dealt with the situation of Polish refugees in Austria and the Austrian Government's attitude in this respect. Kreisky stressed that every Pole who feels politically persecuted and arrives at the Austrian border from his homeland will certainly be admitted to the country. At present there are about 30,000 Polish refugees in Austria, 7,000 of whom have an opportunity to proceed to other countries. The visa regulations will not be abolished, Kreisky said, because there was no need to do so even during the Hungarian crisis in 1956. The visa requirement was introduced to ensure a certain control of entries, he declared. However, Austria needs aid from abroad because to date more than $100 millions had to be spent on all refugees, including those emigrating from the Soviet Union via Austria. According to Kreisky, Austria had to give refugees who came to our country without any financial means subsidies that even exceed Austrian basic pensions. This naturally caused a certain discontent among the Austrian population, the chancellor said. He went on to say that last summer he had appealed to numerous countries, including the United States, for aid in this field, but his appeals produced hardly any results. That is why Austria had to reintroduce visas, thus adopting the same policy as Switzerland, he said.

Kreisky pointed out that in contrast to the rather restrictive policy regarding the granting of political refugee status practiced by the UN High Commissioner's Office, Austria has been treating this group of refugees exceedingly generously. He expressed the hope that in the wake of the current events the parliaments of other countries would become more sensitive regarding this issue and that the Poles who have emigrated would also assert themselves more in countries such as the United States and Canada. This could lead to a more liberal immigration policy in such countries, but it is regretable that it takes such events to make them sensitive to the problem.

At the press conference, which was partly held in English, Kreisky stressed that there are also other military dictatorships besides Poland. He said that he had already warned former U.S. President Carter against being blind in one eye in connection with his campaign for human rights. One cannot condemn military dictatorships in one country and tolerate them in another. One must not be blind to what is happening in El Salvador and focus criticism on Poland only, he said. In reply to a newsman's question Kreisky defined his warnings against any military intervention by saying that the dispatch of military experts to Latin America also constitutes an intervention.

INTERIOR MINISTRY REPORTS ON POLISH ARRIVALS

AU181225 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 18 Dec 81 p 8

PAHR CRITICIZES ISRAEL'S ANNEXATION OF GOLAN

[Excerpt] Vienna, Tel Aviv (APA) REUTER, AFP, DPA) -- Foreign Minister Pahr has told the Israeli ambassador in Vienna, Ben-Ya'aqov, that the annexation of the Golan Heights by Israel is a flagrant violation of the UN charter and of the principles of international law. Such a measure cannot be accepted without objection, Pahr declared. Ben-Ya'aqov conveyed to Pahr a message from Israeli Foreign Minister Shamir in which the Israeli measure is outlined. It is described as being not an annexation but an "application of the legal system, jurisdiction and administration of the state of Israel to the Golan Heights.." The Israeli ambassador stressed that his government's step would not affect the operations of the UN forces on the Golan Heights.

BUNDESTAG RESOLUTION ON POLISH CRISIS REPORTED

[Excerpt] Bonn, 18 Dec (DPA) -- At the end of its debate today on the chancellor's statement, the lower house passed -- with one abstension -- a resolution on the situation in Poland. The text of the resolution is as follows:

A) The German house views with growing concern the developments in and around Poland and voices at this fateful moment its solidarity with the hard-pressed Polish people and their struggle for human dignity, constitutionality and democracy.

B) It appeals to the Polish military government to prove its credibility by releasing all arrested persons, by restoring the freedoms achieved in the course of reform and renewal, and by resuming the dialogue with the reform-minded and patriotic forces of the Polish people.

C) The Polish movement for reform and renewal of human dignity, workers' rights and national self-determination, which has been at work since August 1980, is now being crushed. The dialogue with Polish patriots forcibly broken off on 13 December 1981, a dialogue which provoked international human rights acts and the Helsinki Final Act, must be resumed. It must not fail.

D) Contrary to the fundamental declaration of General Jaruzelski on the course of Polish reform, the leaders of the young workers and peasants trade unions, scientists and students are being arrested by the thousands. The free expression of the will of the people is being suppressed; force is being used.

E) The German lower house recalls the strict obligation under international law of all states, especially the signatories of the (?Helsinki) Final Act, to noninterference and to honor the sovereignty of all states in the interest of security, cooperation and peace in Europe. It therefore watches with great concern the growing propagandistic witch hunt against the course of Polish reform and the overt and covert threats from outside against Polish independence.

F) The German lower house appeals to all citizens of our country, to the trade unions and the parties, to the churches, to the welfare and humanitarian organizations and to young people to express human and moral solidarity with the suffering Polish people and to give material help against hunger, suffering and cold which this neighboring people so urgently needs and has earned.

G) The German lower house calls upon the Federal Government to keep the question of government economic aid to the People's Republic of Poland open, and also to work in this regard within the framework of the EEC, until such time as the measures of suppression used by the present regime against the Polish people are halted.

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON FRG-GDR RELATIONS, POLAND

LD191006 Hamburg DPA in German 0003 GMT 19 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 19 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Genscher is confident that the "very intensive talks" at the intra-German summit at Lake Werbellin will bear fruit next year. In an interview with the Mainz ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG made public by the Foreign Ministry, Genscher pointed out that arrangements have been made between the two sides which are to lead to practical results. Agreements in various fields are planned.

Genscher emphasized that the possibilities of the basic treaty between Bonn and East Berlin are far from exhausted. Full use must be made of them. The summit has resulted in some movement in this respect.

Concerning the situation in Poland Genscher underlined the statement of the EEC foreign ministers that developments are being followed with sympathy and concern. The Federal Government hopes that the Polish people will be able to solve its problems by itself without any interference from outside and without the use of force so as to ensure the continuation of the policy of renewal.

RED CROSS WORKERS DELIVER SUPPLIES TO POLAND

[Text] Kiel, 19 Dec (DPA) -- Despite the considerable relief consignments from the West, Polish hospitals are still short of medical supplies, food and cleaning materials. This was stated by German Red Cross [DRK] helpers from Schleswig-Holstein who had delivered aid consignments of this type to 13 hospitals in northern Poland during the past few days. "When we came the stores were empty," they said, "and what we brought will last 4 weeks at the most." The DRK helpers were today on board the Polish ferry Inowroclaw on their way home and are expected back in Kiel later today. Speaking by telephone one DRK helper told DPA: "We were received with great warmth in all hospitals."

The DRK helpers had left Kiel on Tuesday with 13 trucks and 3 cans. They delivered the urgently required supplies -- about 32 tons -- to 13 hospitals between Gydnia and Szczecin. The total value of the medical supplies, children's food and other food was just under DM500,000. According to the DRK helpers, the mood among the Polish population is "dejected." Because of lack of communications the population is clearly badly informed about the situation in the country and is fully occupied in coping with the supply difficulties. One of the women helpers said: "I just do not know how the Poles are to get through the winter."

AID TO POLAND NOT TO DEPEND ON ECONOMIC REFORM

LD201300 Hamburg DPA in German 0750 GMT 20 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 20 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government will, in the words of Government Spokesman Kurt Becker, give some consideration as to how it can contribute to easing the situation in Poland. In an interview with Deutschlandfunk Becker nevertheless made it clear, according to the radio station, that Bonn will continue to adhere to its strict policy of noninterference. Anything else may lead to a deterioration of the situation in Poland. The Bonn government spokesman stressed that it is important to carry on with food aid. To make the continuation of economic aid dependent on the implementation of the reform policy of the Poles will not be the policy of the Federal Government, Becker said.

BANKS TO REFUSE MORE CREDIT TO PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC

LD201420 Hamburg DPA in German 1155 GMT 20 Dec 81

[Text] Stuttgart, 20 Dec (DPA) -- The German banks are not prepared to grant further credits to Poland since the country cannot pay the debt interest run up this year. This was said on Sunday on Southwest Radio by Harald Kuehnen, chairman of the Federal Association of German Banks. According to Kuehnen, the association has received a telex from Polish Premier Wojciech Jaruzelski, in which the latter states that Poland will continue to meet its international obligations and will take care of the repayment of its debts. However, the German credit market is not at present in a position to assume further risks. The situation will only be different if the Federal Government gives a 100-percent guarantee for the bank credits. According to Kuehnen, the banks will have to earmark some of their profits to cover possible future losses. He stresses, however, that this will not happen at the expense of bank customers.

KOHL URGES RED CROSS TO INSPECT POLISH CAMPS

[Text] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA) -- Helmut Kohl, leader of the opposition in the Bundestag, has called for the International Red Cross to be called upon to investigate conditions in Polish internment camps. Kohl said in Bonn on Monday that without interfering in the internal political situation the International Red Cross must be given an opportunity to ensure that the interned persons are kept in conditions of human dignity. There are an increasing number of eyewitness accounts about catastrophic conditions in overcrowded internment camps near Warsaw, Kielce, Katowice and on the Hel Peninsula. There is an acute shortage of warm clothing, of adequate medical care and of communication with the families of the internees.

"If Jaruzelski's military government wants to retain a minimum of confidence among the population in the West which is prepared to offer aid, it must be interested in early and unhindered action by the International Red Cross," Kohl said. The leader of the opposition also called on the Polish authorities to make the necessary arrangements so that the aid provided by churches and private sources reach families and individuals in need. The distribution of this aid in Poland must remain in the hands of the churches and charity organizations.

GENSCHER DISCUSSES POLAND WITH CHARGE D'AFFAIRES

[Excerpts] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher summoned on Monday to the Foreign Ministry Miroslaw Wojkowski, Polish charge d'affaires in Bonn. It was later disclosed that Genscher explained to the Polish diplomat the Bundestag's 18 December resolution on the situation in Poland and the statement issued in this connection by Rainer Barzel (CDU), chairman of the foreign relations committee, on behalf of the three groups. According to the Foreign Ministry, Wojkowski presented his own personal view. Following a request by Genscher the charge d'affaires briefed the federal foreign minister on developments in Poland on the basis of information available to the diplomat. Details have not been disclosed.

SUSPENSION OF AID TO POLAND 'NOT MEANINGFUL'

LD211628 Hamburg DPA in German 1547 GMT 21 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Bonn/Hamburg, 21 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government intends to continue fulfilling all agreed measures of helping Poland despite the new situation. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker reaffirmed on Monday that this applies also to the settlement of 1981 debts. Becker told the press that suspension of aid is "not meaningful." The sum of DM40 million is still available this year for food aid. Everything else has been allocated. Egon Bahr, member of the SPD Presidium, writing in the latest issue of VORWAERTS, said that it is still not clear whether the Polish leadership will attain its objective of stability with a moderate continuation of the reform course. If resistance changes into civil war the strength of the People's Army will be tested.

GENSCHER RECEIVES EAGLEBURGER FOR TALKS

[Text] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher this evening received Lawrence Eagleburger, head of the European affairs department in the U.S. State Department, for a 90-minute discussion. A Foreign Ministry spokesman announced that they discussed East-West relations and particularly the situation in Poland. Eagleburger is on a tour of several European capitals to discuss the crisis in Poland with the allies. It was learned in Bonn that he will fly from Bonn to London. Eagleburger has come from Rome where he discussed, in addition to the Polish crisis, the kidnapping of NATO Gen James Dozier.

PCF LEADER WANTS 'RESPONSIBLE' APPROACH ON POLAND

[Apparent text of PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais 13 December statement: "Do Nothing To Encourage Confrontation"]

[Text] PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais made the following statement yesterday:

I learned with emotion of the events which have just occurred in Poland. Since the beginning of the Polish crisis the PCF has advocated that the Poles themselves should find solutions to their own problems, implementing the economic, social and democratic reforms necessary for the advance of socialism in their country. We followed with interest and sympathy the efforts made to that end, and it is a pity that difficulties and extremism have hindered that process and led to the present situation.

In this situation we remain faithful to our constant policy. We intend to refrain from any initiative which might hinder the necessary search for a peaceful solution to the crisis, making it possible -- on the basis of accord among the national forces -- to pursue the vital reforms to finally overcome the mistakes of the past and develop socialism. Nothing should be done to encourage internal confrontation or foreign intervention, which we do not want. I think that such a responsible attitude, which, I note, has been adopted by high-ranking international and French figures, accords with Poland's interest and the interests of France and of peace.

Gremetz Comments

PM211503 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 16 Dec 81 p 10

[Excerpt] The situation in Poland prompted many reactions in France yesterday, notably that of PCF Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz, who expressed the hope that the present situation is only "temporary."

Questioned on France-Inter, Maxime Gremetz reaffirmed the PCF's concern to "do nothing which might encourage an internal confrontation or foreign intervention." Then he expressed the hope that "the situation is only temporary and that there will be a move toward pursuing the process started on the basis of national accord to implement economic, social and democratic reforms." With regard to the stances adopted by several European communist parties he stated: "Each communist party is independent....The PCF has adopted a responsible position, it is entitled to do that too." Maxime Gremetz also recalled that the PCF "is fighting for a French brand of socialism and shows solidarity with peoples building socialism in their way." Questioned on respect for government solidarity in France, he explained: "We are in the government on the basis of the orientations chosen by the people, we intend to take part in this government to implement that policy."

JOSPIN HITS CHEYSSON, PCF STANCES ON POLAND

[Text] PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin, who was the guest on the channel 2 television midday news program Tuesday, 15 December, expressed his disagreement with the judgment of the situation in Poland made by Mr Claude Cheysson Sunday, when he said that it was an "internal Polish affair." On the one hand he stressed that that judgment "is not the government's attitude, which was given by Mr Pierre Mauroy's statement," and on the other hand that the external relations minister's statement "in no way" corresponds to the PS stance.

Questioned on the PCF's attitude, Mr Jospin replied: "The Socialists must say and do what they think right, say that it is unacceptable and demand the release of those who have been imprisoned and a return to a state of freedom... In June we adopted a joint communique with the PCF which says: 'The two sides discussed the development of the situation in Poland and express the hope that country and its people will themselves successfully carry through the process of economic, social and democratic renewal in which they are engaged.' (Note -- joint declaration issued 23 June). I do not believe that the events now happening represents a renewal of democracy. It strikes me that the PS position is in keeping with that communique, whereas the PCF leadership's is not. But that is the PCF leadership's problem, not ours. It is the PCF leadership which is having difficulty in explaining its stance... which is not entirely in keeping with the agreement we signed. As regards the government, since the Communist ministers and Charles Fiterman say they agree with the statement made by Pierre Mauroy the problem of government solidarity does not arise."

CHIRAC URGES ECONOMIC REPRISALS AGAINST USSR

[Excerpt] On Wednesday, 16 December, Mr Jacques Chirac participated in television's channel one "Great Press Debate" program. The mayor of Paris proposed, among other things, that the Western nations hold consultations with a view to taking economic reprisal measures against the Soviet Union if it were to intervene in Poland. Condemning totally the government's policy, he stated: "I reject anything that resembles socialism in any way."

Mr Jacques Chirac stated among other things: "Poland -- The Soviet Union's barbarous resolve makes it necessary for the West to revise the methods governing its relations with it. We have continually been sending to the Soviet Union our technology, our computers and our turnkey plants, in short, everything that represents progress today and the work of our scholars and scientists. The situation requires that Western nations clearly tell the Soviet Union that unless its behavior changes we will no longer be able to continue to export these things nor trade under the present conditions. Furthermore, it has now become inopportune to pursue the work of the Soviet-French grand economic commission.

"And, finally, there is the problem of the Helsinki accords. They have brought considerable advantage to the Soviet Union and other Eastern countries -- the recognition of the borders which resulted from the war. Per contra, we have asked them to show a somewhat better understanding or appreciation of human rights. It is clear that the Eastern countries and the Soviet Union have violated them. The Western nations which have signed those accords now have the right to meet to consider under what conditions they could advise the Soviet Union that they are reconsidering those accords and declare them null and void. I am in favor of a complete revision of our trade accords and our trade regulations with the Soviet Union and the Eastern countries with a view to calling into question our exports in general and the export of our technology in particular, for we cannot protect our dignity by remaining silent nor our security by being complaisant."

MERMAZ: USSR RESPONSIBLE FOR POLISH TURMOIL

[Text] Louis Mermaz, president of the National Assembly has in turn expressed his opinion on the Warsaw drama. Mr Mermaz did not beat about the bush when he spoke on TF 1 as he said he considered that the USSR was responsible for what is happening in Poland today. Here is Louis Mermaz:

[Begin recording] The first effective thing is to maintain food aid and then, within the framework of the international bodies, to make the Soviet Union understand that we consider it to be responsible for what is happening in Poland, for the events in Poland cannot be separated from the entirety of relations between the Warsaw Pact countries. That must be said very clearly if one wants to be able to contribute to an honest and just settlement of the drama which has begun. The action which France is capable of undertaking should have the value of an impetus. Everything must be done in order not to accept the Yalta division. There must not be a double freeze; one around the Soviets, the other around the United States. The most effective way of refusing to accept this division is to act in such a way that the government with a Socialist leadership and the president can act at the European level, at the level of the Atlantic alliance and equally undertake action in the direction of the Third World. [end recording]

AUSTRALIA REASSURED ON MURUROA RADIOACTIVITY

NC200854 Paris AFP in English 0825 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 22 Dec (AFP) -- France has given an assurance to Australia that regular checks showed there was no radioactivity in the region of the French nuclear testing site of Mururoa Atoll in the Pacific, the External Relations Ministry said here. The government is anxious to dispel concern expressed by the Australian Government following information it had received that there was radioactivity around Mururoa following French nuclear tests. In a diplomatic note handed over on December 17 to the Australian Embassy here, France declared that no traces of radioactivity had been recorded. The note said that the surrounding waters showed no signs of radiation, nor did living organisms in it. (In the English language version of the French note released by the Australian External Affairs department in Canberra yesterday, France recalled that its stragety of nuclear dissuasion was based on having an independent nuclear strike force. This force could only be modernised by nuclear test series at Mururoa, but these were limited to the minimum power compatible with strict security norms. The note added that the Mururoa site was regularly checked, the last time in August 1981, and no radiation had been recorded.)

PAPER DISSATISFIED WITH RESPONSES TO POLISH COUP

PM221155 Paris LE MATIN in French 15 Dec 81 p 2

[Editorial: "Europe Sick With Poland"]

[Excerpts] Whether it likes it or not, the whole of Europe, socialist or capitalist, is involved in the Polish tragedy and no rhetoric, whether it comes from the East or the West, can do anything to change that. Moreoever it does not much matter whether General Jaruzelski, who certainly planned his coup carefully, acted alone or in close consultation with the Kremlin. His intention was to knock out at least the most intransigent leaders of Solidarity. But, martial law or no martial law, this "tough" operation cannot be enough alone. It can only lead to new tragedies unless Jaruzelski succeeds in producing an agreement between the army, which he has pushed hurriedly to the front of the stage, and the country's other political forces, primarily the church but also those millions of people who identify with Solidarity. But how can the roundup carried out between Saturday night and Sunday morning make reconciliation easier between the Polish people and those who aspire to lead them? The crisis which broke out in Poland in July 1980 certainly has specifically Polish causes. But it also reflects a very different malaise, which is probably even more serious. It is the malaise of the peoples in Europe, in the East and the West, who no longer tolerate the strait jacket into which they were placed in an authoritarian way at the end of World War II. A country's membership in a particular camp may have fitted into the logic of Yalta and the conferences which followed, but 35 years later it cannot justify Poland's being doomed to economic ruin and political subservience. Who disputes that the USSR still feels the need to ensure its security? But in the days of missiles and ICBM's, who will believe that it still needs to completely subjugate the states which serve as a buffer between the Soviet homeland and the rest of the world?

INVESTIGATION OF DOZIER KIDNAPPING CONTINUES

[Excerpts] Rome, 22 Dec (ANSA) -- The four-day old investigation into the kidnapping of United States Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier by the Red Brigades urban guerrillas has been joined by NATO-member nation law enforcement and secret service agencies forming the most formidable front ever conceived in the Western world against terrorism. Informed sources in Verona reported on Monday that U.S., West German, French, British and Israeli agents have arrived in the north-central city, the scene of the kidnapping, and established contact to aid in the search for the missing NATO general. It was also reported that Italian investigators are exercising strong pressure on their police informers and contacts in northern Italy's underworld seeking some collaboration which could lead to a break-through in the case.

The Italian Interior Ministry meanwhile is reported to be coordinating research action by the anti-terrorist squad "Digos," the Carabinieri police and Italy's border patrol and revenue police, the Guardia di Finanza. In connection with information from the mafia and other criminal elements, it was noted by investigators that the Red Brigades command may have been in contact with local criminals in order to prepare the abduction, which they believe required more than a week of surveillance in the area. With this in mind, Italian anti-terrorist police are exploring their information channels especially among drug dealers in Verona, considered a center of transit and distribution for a multi-million dollar heroin industry.

Meanwhile, investigators are also continuing their attempts to construct Identi-Kits of the terrorists described by Dozier's wife Judith, who was bound and gagged by the group before they carried her husband to a waiting van. Remo Pancelli, allegedly responsible for the shooting of Carabinieri General Enrico Galvaligi one year ago in Rome, and Antonio Sevasta, a suspected founder of the Red Brigades Sardinian group, have so far been identified by the "Digos" as members of Dozier's kidnapping commando. Without any further leads in the investigation, the police are reported to be intensifying their search in Italy's north-eastern region, setting up road blocks and systematic searches in the countryside and carrying on search missions in many towns in the Veneto region.

LD220028 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2300 GMT 21 Dec 81

[Text] The secretary of the Polish Episcopal Conference, Msgr Bronislaw Dabrowski, accompanied by a prelate, arrived in Rome this evening via Frankfurt. The Polish primate's envoy yesterday had a long talk in Warsaw with Msgr Luigi Poggi, the pope's envoy to the Polish capital. On his arrival in Rome, Monsignor Dabrowski succeeded in eluding the many waiting journalists by using the hallway normally taken by flight personnel.

No Red Cross Contact

LD220828 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 0500 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Text] The International Red Cross has no contact with Poland and declares that our country is even more cut off from the world than Biafra during the 1967-70 war, where Red Cross representatives were at least able to send radio messages. The chairman of the International Red Cross in Geneva said: We are very concerned because we only wish to help the victims of fate. Now, while the Polish Government has admitted that there are prisoners and wounded, we wish, in accordance with the Geneva Convention, to visit those who are interned, to inform their families about them and to deliver letters.

After an unsuccessful attempt to obtain visas from the Polish ambassador in Geneva, the chairman delcared: There is still some hope. A doctor of the International Red Cross, Dr (Husbach), who is now in Budapest, is trying to go to Poland to assess the most urgent needs on the spot with the representatives of the Polish Red Cross and to convey our wish to the authorities to help prisoners and wounded.

ULUSU REVIEWS SITUATION WITH CONSULTATIVE ASSEMBLY

[Text] Ankara, 21 Dec (AA) -- Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu told the Consultative Assembly the number of persons killed in acts of anarchy and terror in Turkey had been reduced from an average of 22 deaths per day before 12 September 1980 to the present figure of one or less. From 12 September 1980 through 20 December 1981, security forces had collected over 85,000 rifles, more than 700,000 pistols and submachine guns, 2 mortar guns, 33 missiles, 5 antiaircraft guns, over 5 million bullets, and 84 radio sets, Ulusu announced. And 17,671 of 26,860 cases coming before the military courts the same period had been concluded. Currently 24,625 persons were under arrest, 1,997 under detention, and 3,849 were serving prison terms after being convicted.

Of 370 cases of alleged torture coming before the courts, 43 had led to prosecution, while investigation was still going on all others but 110 which had been found groundless. Twenty-eight defendants were under arrest, while 69 more faced trial on torture charges. A police officer had recently been convicted to 14 years in jail for torturing prisoners, the prime minister noted. Martial law courts had so far handed down 70 death penalties of which 21 were currently under review by the military court of appeals. The appeals court had reversed 18 court decisions of capital punishment, while it upheld 25. Of the latter, 17 had been sent for final approval to the National Security Council, which had approved 14. As 4 of the convicts involved were at large, 10 had been executed.

Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, addressing the Consultative Assembly Monday on the principal activities of and major issues before his government, announced protection for domestic industry would gradually be reduced. He summed up the basic principles of his government's economic "stability and development program" as follows: To rebuild an investing and producing economy, expenditures should equal real production, savings should be increased, losses due to rises in world prices beyond our control should be counteracted by a lower level of consumption, and the added burden that cannot be counteracted should be distributed fairly among citizens. Production efforts should be directed in particular to overcoming the foreign exchange shortage. Production in 10 major manufacturing industries, representing one-third of domestic industry, had gone up by 15.3 percent in the first three quarters of 1981, Ulusu announced. Consequently, the share of the industrial sector in GNP had gone up again to 22.6 percent. A similar rise was recorded in agricultural production. Ulusu pointed out production had in fact been stepped up and inflation reduced in 1981.

National income, which had recorded negative growth in 1979 and 1980, was expected to record a growth rate of 4.4 percent in 1981, with industry growing by 7.6 percent. In the first 11 months of 1981, the prime minister said, the cumulative [words indistinct] rise over the same period in 1980, and remained below the 40 percent inflation rate originally aimed at for 1981. Ulusu stressed in particular the fact that the rate of [words indistinct] the overall price level had been curbed "not under economic stagnation, but as the economy was being revitalized." Monetary policy, which constitutes an important tool for his government's stability program, Ulusu said, had succeeded in reversing the flight from cash [as received], and in channeling a growing part of savings to the banks. Great care had been taken to have the economy function with real assets, he added, refraining as much as possible from resorting to central bank resources. Another major development in money and banking was the significant increase in bank deposits. Bank deposits rose from 481.9 billion Turkish lira on first July 1980 to 1161.5 billion Turkish lira by the end of October 1981.

Turkey's balance of payments was improving as its economy opened up to the world. There were no longer delays in foreign exchange transfers, Ulusu announced, with Turkey once again regaining its credit-worthiness. "We do not intend to balance our foreign payments by reducing imports or interrupting economic activity," Ulusu said. Competition through gradual and selective removal of import barriers would encourage "dynamism and efficiency" in the economy, he believed.

With Turkey finding new markets in its own region, exports in 1981 were expected to reach $4.9 billion, which was 55 percent higher than in 1980, and $5.85 billion, which was 55 percent higher than in 1980, and $5.85 billion in 1982. Manufactured goods constituted nearly half of all exports in 1981. Exports to countries of the Middle East and North Africa rose by a record 195 percent over last year, while exports to OECD countries rose by 38.3 percent. Remittances by Turkish workers abroad would pass the $2.5 billion target, Ulusu added, (?stressing that) "we must find our own and permament solution to the foreign exchange shortage."

In his address to the Consultative Assembly Monday, Prime Minister Ulusu announced receipts in the 1981 budget had reached 894 billion Turkish lira by the end of October, exceeding expenditures for the first time in recent years. The surplus of 80.6 billion Turkish Lira reflected his government's policy of restrained expenditure in applying the budget as a major tool in attaining stability. The 10-month 1982 budget totalled 1,815 billion Turkish Lira divided up among major items as follows: 49 billion TL for personnel, 352 billion TL for other current expenditures, 381.7 billion TL for investment, 591.3 billion TL for transfers. These figures represented increases of 31 to 36 percent over the same items for 1981. The 1982 budget aimed at reducing the inflation rate to 29 percent and increasing national income by 4.4 percent, while taking care to preserve the improvement in the balance of payments and not leading to economic stagnation.

Public investment would be channelled to the basic functions of the government, in keeping with this year's investment policy. Incentives would be provided to the building industry. The prime minister announced priority was given to investment in infrastructure in the field of power and mining, agriculture, transportation and communications.

The importance of agriculture had increased further due to recent developments at home and abroad. Hence the government's program stressed the supply of agricultural input on time, and the improvement and expansion of credits for specific projects in agriculture; of the percentage of total public investments marked for agriculture, 66.5 percent would be channeled to infrastructure, that is, development of land and water resources.

Prime Minister Ulusu cited 1981 activities and 1982 investment projects in power and mining as follows: Electrification of 1,400 more villages raised the total of rural units enjoying electric power to 19,744. Investment in power represented 23.4 percent of all public investment in the 1982 program. Ongoing construction projects included the Afsin-Elbistan thermal power station and the Urfa irrigation tunnel linked to the Ataturk Dam under construction in southeastern Turkey, which will house Turkey's largest hydroelectric power station. In mining, priority is being giving to minerals related to power, such as coal, oil exploration, and copper and iron.

The 1982 appropriation for investment in transport and communication was 171 billion Turkish lira. Projects included building of expressways, which are of major importance in view of Turkey's geographic location. Some 129 km of railways would be electrified, while capacity would be increased in several Black Sea, Marmara and Mediterranean ports. Some 195,000 new telephones and a 10,000 line Telex project would be financed. A 16 billion Turkish lira new project for improving communication with the Gulf States is also being launched with a 2 billion Turkish lira appropriation in the 1982 budget.

The prime minister said the recent law on higher education provided for government supervision and control in the field of higher education on the one hand, while preserving the concept on autonomy on the other. Students in higher education were being equipped with the "requisites of modern scholarship," while being carefully trained as "conscientious guardians of Kemalist nationalism."

Prime Minister Ulusu announced his government attaches major importance to the Western alliance and to solidarity and cooperation within NATO, while it takes special care over relations with the Council of Europe and the European Parliament. Taking up foreign policy issues in his address to the Consultative Assembly Monday, the prime minister noted the restoration of domestic stability and tranquillity had positive consequences for Turkish foreign policy. Turkey was now considered a guaranteeing factor for regional security, with her political importance and prestige increasing day by day. Relations cultivated with neighboring and friendly countries were bearing fruit both in the political and the economic field. Friendly ties with Islamic countries of the Middle East and North Africa, "based on mutual respect and confidence," had led to economic cooperation beyond expectations. Contruction undertaken by Turkish contractors abroad reached $7.5 billion, while Trukish workers they employed numbered more than 100,000. Exports to the same countries exceeded $1 billion. Turkey would continue to cultivate its external relations on the bases of "respect for the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity" of all countries, non-intervention in their domestic affairs and equality of rights, and to preserve its "peaceful approach" to all problems.

His government attached major importance to the Western alliance and to solidarity and cooperation within NATO, Premier Ulusu confirmed. Turkey appreciates, he added, "the efforts of Western allies, particularly the United States, who manifests close interests and understanding" toward Turkey's need for military and economic aid in order to increase her defense power, which bears importance for NATO defense. His government also wishes to strengthen organic ties with the west, and has decided to apply for full membership in EEC "after the requisite political and economic milieu is reached."

"Our government has always taken special care over its relations with the Council of Europe and the European Parliament," Ulusu commented. "We realize the importance for Western democracies of the maintenance and strengthening of these relations without damage, and we understand the interest shown by our Western friends toward political dvelopments in Turkey," he said, and added, "but what is of utmost importance is the establishment of a healthy democracy in Turkey." "Turkey had embarked upon the process of establishing such a democracy with the opening of the Consultative Assembly," he pointed out. He hoped "our friends will keep in mind" that the timing of phase of the process was "up to the Turkish people."

In the belief that stronger ties with Islamic countries contributes to peace and stability in the region, Ulusu announced his government intends to raise these ties "to a higher level." Turkish head of state Gen Kenan Evren's recent visit to Pakistan was a "positive" step within this framework. "We believe it is in the common interest of all countries for fraternal Islamic countries to settle any disputes and to cultivate further cooperation among themselves," the prime minister said. Ulusu reiterated Turkey's stand that unless a just and comprehensive solution was found to the Middle East question, regional stability could not be attained. His government believes unilateral action which threatens peace should be refrained from, and welcomes initiatives in search of a just, permanent and comprehensive settlement to the Middle East question acceptable to all the parties involved.

On Cyprus, Greece

TA211749 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 21 Dec 81

[Excerpt] In his address to the Consultative Assembly, Prime Minister Ulusu discussed relations with Greece, charging that with his speeches at the NATO Defense Planning Committee meetings, Papandreou had shown clearly that he does not intend to resolve Turkish-Greek problems through negotiations. Ulusu stressed that Papandreou's view of a "Turkish threat" was received with astonishment by the Western public as well. Ulusu said: Every responsible and experienced government should know that bilateral problems cannot be resolved by unilaterally ignoring agreements between two countries, by interpreting international agreements in an arbitrary manner, by positing unilateral allegations, such as the consideration of the Flight Information Region line as the Greek border, by means of prejudices, by basing oneself on the wrong premises or by creating faits accomplis. The intransigent attitude adopted by the Greek Government will make tension inevitable and can only bring disappointment to Greece.

We have always declared that Turkey wants the problems to be resolved through negotiations, within the framework of the existing agreements and accords between the two countries and in a way that will insure a fair and just balance of interests. This view has not changed. However, Greece is pursuing an illogical and extremist policy, saying: Only I have rights; your rights begin where my rights -- which I determine myself -- end. The result of such behavior so far as the Aegean is concerned would be for the entire Aegean to be included in Greece's sovereignty. Naturally only Greece would be responsible for the results of such an unacceptable attitude, which is not based on any justified reason and is contrary to international law and practice.

Prime Minister Ulusu stated that the Greek Government had adopted a dangerous and extremely negative attitude regarding the Aegean problem and the Cyprus issue. He added that at a time when the intercommunal talks became meaningful and substantial, the Greek Government tried to undermine and invalidate them. Ulusu said: The method of the negotiations which was determined for the Cyprus problem and which received extensive international support cannot be changed according to the whim of the Greek Government. Referring to the Greek prime minister's remarks that an investigation should be opened regarding the Cyprus issue, Ulusu stated that Turkey would be pleased if such an investigation were opened because it would enable historical facts to be revealed.

Ulusu pointed out that military issues had gained priority in the Greek Cypriot sector following the change of government in Greece, adding: We have concrete evidence to the effect that the Greek Cypriot community has been increasing the firepower of the Greek Cypriot National Guard above and beyond its defense needs. We have already drawn the attention of the United Nations to the drawbacks and dangers of such activities which the Greek Cypriot administration has been carrying out with the support and encouragement of Greece. The period from the end of 1963 to the middle of 1974 was one of bitter experiences for Cyprus. The reason was that one of the two communities living in Cyprus did not have sufficient defense capability and the other community exploited this situation mercilessly. A stable quiet has reigned in Cyprus since 1974. The reasons for this positive development are known to all. The developments after 1974 have clearly and definitely shown that there is no security problem or a related problem of defense for the Greek Cypriot community. Consequently, we are not having any difficulty in explaining the real and insidious reasons why, after the Honorable Papandreou came to power, there have been efforts for armament in Cyprus far above its defense needs. Turkey is conscious of its historic responsibilities regarding the Turkish Cypriot community -- responsibilities stipulated by treaties. Our goverment is determined to encourage and support efforts for peace in Cyprus despite the artificially created difficulties.

MINISTER CALLS PAPANDREOU STAND INTRANSIGENT

TA191654 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 19 Dec 81

[Excerpt] State Minister and Acting Foreign Minister Ilhan Oztrak has said: We hope the Papandreou government will change its intransigent attitude, full of contradictions, and will help find a solution of the Cyprus problem and other problems between the two countries. Oztrak was speaking at the Consultative Assembly budget planning committee. He pointed out that despite Turkey's good-will efforts, it has been impossible to resolve problems and improve relations to the desired level with its neighbors and ally, Greece. The acting foreign minister stressed that Turkey strongly supports all bilateral, regional and international measures against international terrorism.

Noting that the detente process, which has gone on for about 10 years between the East and the West, has now reached a critical stage, Oztrak said: The insecurity created by the increasing strength of the nuclear and conventional forces of the Warsaw Pact, the continuing occupation of Afghanistan, the developments in Poland, the Middle East impasse and the economic crisis, which has reached international dimensions, have all had negative effects on the political situation and caused a return to tension. Oztrak pointed out that developments in Europe and the Middle East are of great concern to Turkey because of its location. Oztrak also said Turkey's position in the NATO alliance was being enhanced as a dependable ally, adding that the alliance had now been induced to deal with Turkey's needs and problems.

At present there is no suggestion of a Netherlands protest. The possibility will be discussed by the second chamber on Wednesday [16 December]. Initial reactions from Netherlander political parties were characterized by "great disquiet" (Democrats '66) and deep indignation at the violation of fundamental human rights such as freedom of speech (Labor Party). Today all political parties will take part in a silent protest outside the Polish Embassy in The Hague.

GENSCHER SEEKS COMMUNICATION WITH USSR, POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 22 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher wants "to use all channels of communication" to explain the views of the Federal Government to the Polish and Soviet leaderships. In an interview with North German radio on Tuesday, Genscher included among these the Geneva disarmament negotiations on medium-range missiles and the CSCE followup conference in Madrid.

Genscher welcomed the "now much closer consultations" of the United States with their allies and confirmed an exchange of views on the situation in Poland with U.S. Undersecretary Lawrence Eagleburger on Monday in Bonn. He left unanswered the question whether there are differences between Bonn and Washington on the U.S. wish for restrictions against Poland. Genscher emphasized, however, that the Federal Government would continue to press for a continuation of the obligations which had been announced by the Polish Government itself and which are aimed at a return to the course of reform. "In this respect we are not keeping silent," Genscher said.

The Federal Government also considered the sending of a papal envoy to Poland as significant. Genscher gave the assurance that before any further decisions are made the Federal Government would consult the appropriate Bundestag committees. This does not, however, refer to the aid already agreed on, which is being continued.

MERTES COMMENTS ON AID FOR POLAND, SOVIET ROLE

LD221532 Hamburg DPA in German 1504 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 22 Dec (DPA) -- In the view of the foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU, Alois Mertes, the European Community should examine whether the basis for the current Western aid to Poland still exists. Mertes said in a DPA interview today that this basis is the course of reform and renewal with which the West declared its solidarity. Meanwhile, the impression is gaining ground that the Soviet Union is pulling the strings behind the Warsaw military regime to stop this course.

Mertes appealed to the West to develop a common stragety on giving government aid to the Soviet Union and its allies.

FRG READY TO SUBMIT JOINT PROPOSALS WITH GDR

LD031058 Hamburg DPA in German 1009 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 23 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Republic is ready, according to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, to submit jointly with the GDR proposals on disarmament and arms control at next year's UN General Assembly. In an article for FDP's NORDSEE-ZEITUNG (Christmas edition), he said even though the Polish tragedy pushed the chancellor's visit to the GDR into the background, it is still necessary to approach German problems on a long-term basis and regard policy on Germany as a European peace task. The possibilities created on the basic treaty with the GDR and by the Helsinki Final Act are by no means exhausted. The Federal Republic and the GDR should regard the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act in all its parts, as a German contribution to peace and cooperation in Europe.

APEL INTERVIEWED ON ANTI-AMERICANISM, ARMS TALKS

DW221515 Cologne Deutsche Welle in German to Europe 0915 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Excerpt] [Question] Let us discuss a current issue. The U.S. ambassador to Bonn recently said most frankly in a speech something to the effect that if you don't want to have our soldiers here, we will bring them home. Can such an issue be handled on an emotional basis or is the United States also interested in safeguarding Europe?

[Answer] I've known the U.S. ambassador long enough to be able to call him one of my friends and I don't believe it was an emotional outbreak. It was much rather a sober statement to point out particularly the differences between East and West Europe. He knows as much as we do that an alliance depends on unity and that not only German peace and German freedom are being safeguarded at the Elbe but also U.S. peace and U.S. freedom. The alliance is indivisible and we should, therefore, not utter ineffective mutual threats because everybody knows that we are indivisibly dependent on each other.

[Question] Does the much-quoted anti-Americanism exist at all as a politically relevant force in the Federal Republic or do you consider it merely a phantom?

[Answer] It is certainly not a politically relevant force. I am firmly convinced of that. This is also demonstrated by all opinion polls. The vast majority of Germans knows that only in an alliance with the United States can peace be safeguarded on our conditions. But, naturally, young people are more unceremonious and they make more unceremonious statements not only with regard to the United States but also with regard to German politicians. The criticism I am facing -- and I don't complain about it -- would probably not have happened to my predecessors 10 or 15 years ago. This is simply a matter of more frank expressions. I think all this should not be taken too dramatically.

[Question] We don't know at the moment about the outcome of the Geneva negotiations and whether they will produce the desired results in the envisaged time. It has been discussed very much whether NATO should postpone its deployment plans as long as the negotiations are going on. What is your position with regard to these considerations?

[Answer] I don't hold a public position at all with regard to these considerations because nothing would be more foolish than to speculate publicly at the beginning of negotiations on their possible results. The federal chancellor said it very clearly that the NATO dual decision with its two elements is firmly valid for us. It outlines most clearly when and what will be deployed on the Western side if no respective agreements are achieved in time with the Soviet Union.

ANSA OFFICE REPORTS DOZIER 'CONDEMNED TO DEATH'

AU221600 Rome ANSA in English 1550 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Text] Beirut, 22 Dec (ANSA) -- ANSA's Beirut office received a call at 1400 GMT today stating that the Red Brigades had condemned to death American General James Dozier.

The anonymous caller said that police would find the body in a country village after 1900 GMT today. It was not clear if the caller meant to say that the general was already dead or would be killed this afternoon. It was also unclear whether the call was authentic or a hoax.

The caller spoke perfect Lebanese Arabic with a voice apparently altered by some sort of muffler. Arabic was audible in the background from wherever he was calling.

The full text of his message said that what he described as the "Baader-Meinhof Red Brigades" were "announcing the following communique":

"The full text of his message said that what he described as the "Baader-Meinhof Red Brigades" were "announcing the following communique":

"The Red Brigades announce their responsibility in the execution and death-sentence against American general, James Dozier, after the people's tribunal found him guilty.

"There is no need to call on the American CIA for aid in seeking to free the American imperialist today.

"The Red Brigades state that there is no relationship between the Red Brigades and Imam Mussa Sadr's Shi'ite group in Beirut or Tehran, or with the imam's disappearance in Libya".

The anonymous caller failed to explain the precise meaning of the designation, "the Baader-Meinhof Red Brigades."

The "Baader-Meinhof gang" is the name given by the media to the Red Germany, the Rote Armee Fraktion (RAF), whose founding leaders were Andreas Baader and Ulrike Meinhof, both of whom died, allegedly by their own hand, in a West Germany jail.

"We chose this person (Dozier) in particular to strike at the interests of the Americans in Italy," the caller said.

Apparently diverging from normal Red Brigades practice of refusing to let their anonymous callers get involved in conversations, the caller agreed to clarify his reference to Imam Mussa Sadr's Shi'ite group.

"We have read on the foreign and Arab news agencies that there is a relationship and a cooperation between the Red Brigades and the imam's group," he said. "Now, we have denied it, and we say there is no such relationship."

Asked why the communique was being read in Beirut rather than in Italy, the caller said, "We had instructions to give the communique to the ANSA office in Beirut at 1600 local (1400 GMT) for greater security. I have nothing to add."

The transmission of the text from Beirut to Rome was delayed by difficulties with the telex link. Several repetitions were required for garbled parts of the message.

No information or factor was available here to assess the reliability or authenticity of the message.

Investigators Continue Search

AU230835 Rome ANSA in English 0823 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Text] Verona, 23 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian investigators charged with tracking down United States General James Lee Dozier and his Red Brigades urban guerrilla kidnappers were not able to give any indication as to whether the telephone call made to the ANSA news agency office in Beirut on Tuesday afternoon, indicating that Dozier had already been executed, is being taken into serious consideration, informed sources revealed here.

The investigators, flanked by American, French and West German anti-terrorist experts, indicated only that their search is officially proceeding with road-blocks and systematic searches in the surrounding towns and countryside near Verona where the 50-year old general was kidnapped on Thursday afternoon.

Investigators maintain that the general is still in the vicinity, according to the sources.

The telephone message in Beirut, where a caller speaking perfect Lebanese Arabic transmitted the text of a message from what he described as the "Baader-Meinhof Red Brigades" announcing the death of the general and declaring that police would find the body after 2000 Italian time Tuesday, was seen here by the sources as giving weight to the international link often cited in respect to the Italian terrorist organization.

The sources said that it did not however convince investigators that the execution had actually taken place.

By late Tuesday night, in fact, the general's body had not been found and there was still no information or factors available to assess the reliability of authenticity of either the caller in Beirut or the message he relayed.

Scepticism about the message was also reportedly increased by an analogous episode where a caller speaking German informed the ANSA office in the northern Italian region of Trento that he had a message from the Red Brigades.

That incident, which also occurred on Tuesday, was immediately resolved with the arrest of an apparently mentally disturbed man by police in Verona.

Dozier, the ranking American officer at the Nato Land Forces Southern Europe Command in Verona, was kidnapped from his home on Thursday afternoon and taken away in a van by a guerrilla "commando" reportedly comprised of 12 or more members.

The Red Brigades claimed the abduction the next day in telephone calls to ANSA offices in Rome and Milan, and the first written communique from the terrorist group was received in two Roman newspaper offices on Saturday.

Investigators have indicated that these messages are probably authentic.

LIBYAN PRESENCE IN ITALIAN TERRORISM SUSPECTED

AU221619 Rome ANSA in English 1529 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 22 Dec (ANSA) -- An Italian terrorism expert claims that there is sufficient proof to demonstrate the active presence of Libya in Italian terrorism of both the extreme right and left, according to an article appearing in today's "PAESE SERA".

The Rome daily said that Judge Ferdinando Imposimato, who for years has been investigating terrorism, said that various trails followed up by Italian anti-terrorist teams have led to Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi.

For example, one terrorist spoke of arms supplies sent from Libya and unloaded on Italy's southern coasts of Calabria. These operations reportedly took place under the supervision of an Arab colonel.

Similar statements have been made by other captured terrorists who gave information to investigators in exchange for leniency.

Police also seized weapons in terrorist hideouts that they originally believed came from the Mideast. Investigators decided to track down the origin of these weapons however. A complete probe was begun of manufacturers of the sequestered arms.

The Milan public prosecutors' office urged the government to officially ask Libya for an account of how a "FAL" rifle found in a "front line" arsenal came to be in the possession of that rightwing terrorist group. Investigations showed that the rifle had been sold by the Herstal Arms Manufacturing Company directly to the Tripoli government.

According to the "PAESE SERA" article not only the notorious Red Brigades, but other subversive groups in Italy had ties with Libyans.

Investigators probing a rightwing terrorist organization known as "New Order" have also uncovered evidence which reportedly leads to the Al-Qadhdhafi government, the daily said.

GOVERNMENT TO SUSPEND FINANCIAL AID TO POLAND

AU230846 Rome ANSA in English 0835 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Rome, 23 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian financial aid to the Warsaw government will be suspended but shipments of food staples to Poland will be continued and intensified under certain conditions of distribution, according to a decision considered a compromise solution emerging from a summit meeting of Italy's coalition partners, a communique from government headquarters revealed here.

The decision, reached on Tuesday night after a meeting of the secretaries of the Christian Democrat, Socialist, Social Democrat, Liberal and Republican Parties, suspended financial aid to Poland "until normal political conditions are re-established."

The decision relative to foodstuffs stated that they would be "continued and, where possible, intensified" to the Polish population "through civil and religious channels, with precise guarantees concerning their effective destination to the civil populations."

The effort to reach some decision on aid to Poland after the December 12th imposition of martial law in that country, accompanied by the imprisonment of members of the "Solidarnosc" independent trade union and repressive action against strikers, came after two of the key coalition partners deferred opposing suggestions on the aid cut-off.

The Christian Democrats suggested increasing food supplies to Poland, provided they could be entrusted to the control and distribution of the Roman Catholic episcopate.

The Socialist Party secretary, Bettino Craxi, instead urged the suspension of all aid to avoid reinforcing the military regime.

COMMUNIST PARTY ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON POLAND

AU230824 Rome ANSA in English 0814 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 23 Dec (ANSA) -- The Italian Communist Party has reiterated its condemnation for the introduction of martial law in Poland and its criticism for the political systems of Eastern European nations in a document approved by the party's leadership, according to a communist press office communique released here.

The communique, released on Monday evening, outlined the points around which the leadership of Western Europe's largest Communist Party, with one and a half million card carrying members and ten million votes in the last government elections, rallied in agreement.

"Party leadership," the communique said, "confirms that the dramatic evolution of the situation in Poland points up the necessity of releasing the arrested citizens and resuming the difficult but inescapable quest to solve the Polish society and people, who must all be allowed to operate in full freedom."

The document itself was not relayed to the public.

Political experts here noted that this position is in line with the statement expressed by Communist Party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer since the advent of the military regime in Poland on December 12th and also reflects the motions approved by Communist Party regional council's meeting recently in preparation for the party's national congress, scheduled to take place this spring.

LIBYAN OIL AGREEMENT -- AGIP, part of the state group ENI, has reached provisional agreement with the Libyan Government on a resumption of Libyan oil supplies to Italy, an informed source said here today. Oil and gas were cut off early this year, because Italy found Libya's prices too high. Now Libya has trimmed its prices by amounts between 50 cents and $1.2 a barrel, depending on category, the source said. Definitive prices and quantities still need to be settled. In 1980 Libya was Italy's second biggest oil supplier, sending 13 million tons. [Text] [Paris AFP in English 1112 GMT 22 Dec 81 NC]

PRIME MINISTER OUTLINES 1982 OBJECTIVES

LD230056 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2030 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Address by Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao -- recorded]

[Excerpts] Good evening: 1981 is about to end. The year that follows, 1982, will be a crucial year for the consolidation of the democratic system in Portugal -- a year when the Constitution will be revised, negotiations with the Common Market will be completed, regionalization will be launched, a year for Portugal's financial recovery and economic regeneration.

Before anything else, 1982 will be a year when the Constitution will be revised at the end of a debate in the assembly, which in a democracy is the proper place, so that expression can be given to the fundamental political and ideological options, through the people's elected representatives.

The present Constitution, written in 1975-76, doesn't correspond to the Portuguese reality in the 1980's. For this reason, among others, the revision of the Constitution takes on exceptional importance for the reinforcement of the institutions that govern us, for the armed forces' subordination to the political democratic power, to the widening of the possible avenues of economic, social and political concensus among the Portuguese and so that the government is able to rule in peace and to fulfill its program.

There are forces putting up an obstinate opposition to the revision of the Constitution, forces who want everything to remain the same as though we were living in the revolutionary period that followed the great hopes of 25 April.

These minority sections, who are after all conservative, have done and will still do their utmost to prevent our fundamental law from being changed. Not hesitating, it is necessary to achieve their goal, to politicize everything, including the legitimate rights of the citizens and workers such as trade union freedom and the right to strike, rights which, ironically, are crushed daily in other parts of the world where the ideology they defend reigns supreme.

Hence, all the current speeches, interviews, statements and testimonies aimed at theorizing the reasons which should make the revision of the Constitution impossible. But we will not allow this to happen because this is neither the will of the Portuguese people nor of two-thirds of the MP's who represent them in the assembly.

We all know why the Portuguese Communist Party [PCP] and its allies, objective and otherwise, do not want the revision of the Constitution to go ahead; why they fear the two-thirds concensus achieved without their agreement; why they are mobilizing their influence in the civilian and military spheres, shouting threats at the government and the parliamentary majority and advocating the dissolution of the assembly.

The first months of 1982 will, therefore, be the scenario for the desperate political struggle of the enemies of progress, of those who want everything to remain the same, of those who do not want to lose powers, in short, of all the ferocious opponents of the revision of the Constitution. But the PCP and its allies -- whoever they may turn out to be -- know that democratic institutions cannot be intimidated by their prohpecies of doom nor will they give up a single bit of the democratic power incumbent upon them to exercise. The government, for its part, as well as the forces, authorities and services answerable to it, will reply to this testing of its strength with a calm but firm resolve without hesitation or concessions of any kind. We are not prepared to yield, not even an iota, in the exercise of our [word indistinct] duties which we undertook to perform as a result of two freely-held elections. We will ensure that the proceedings of the assembly will take place in an atmosphere of calm and security. [sentence indistinct]

The year 1982 also will be the decisive year for Portugal's accession to the EEC, culminating complex and difficult negotiations which have been speeded up over the past few months and which will speed up more over the coming year. It is another essential political goal and, more than that, a veritable historic challenge of the kind that marks the life of a nation.

The recent visit to Portugal by the president of France and my recent trip to London at the invitation of the British prime minister enable us to view with confidence the prospects for our economic and political accession to Europe to which we already belong by virtue of our history and culture.

With regard to this objective, there will be minorities seeking to hinder an option duly adopted by the overwhelming majority of the assembly. Once again, this is a question of regime and once again [words indistinct] the PCP set in opposing our accession to the Common Market, in this case in a simultaneous move with certain sectors of the extreme right. The government over which I preside will not allow itself to be disturbed in this sphere either. We are hoping to conclude, in the course of 1982, our negotiations with the EEC and to submit for the assembly's approval the overall balance of the agreed terms so that in a [words indistinct], the political choice we made may become clear and the institutional solidarity among the organs of sovereignty may become noticeable.

Finally, 1982 will be a turning point in a policy of financial recovery and economic revival. We all know that this requires courage and political will, transparency and truth. In the difficult times the world is going through -- in which what is happening in Poland is the harshest and most topical example, although not the only one -- in this phase of uncertainty is affecting us all, unity in freedom and a policy of truth become all the more necessary.

In democracy and freedom -- and we only accept governing under such circumstances -- the government does not shirk its responsibilities nor does it give up the authority which it exercises. The government says no to irresponsibility and to capitulation. It also says no to anarcy, to corruption, to the political and social mobilizations which weaken political stability and national credibility and which are now being hatched in certain areas but will not take off.

The government says yes to realism, to the possibilities of conciliating an austere economic and financial policy with the development of certain areas and the ensuing improvement in the living conditions, in keeping with criteria of social justice. The government says yes to the struggle for full democracy which is the fundamental condition for the implementation of its program.

Regardless of the risks we might have to take, we, for our part, are resolute. Above all, this is what I came here to tell you tonight and what I would like to make very clear: We accept and seek the fundamental concensus capable of strengthening the regime, of consolidating the state and of enhancing the prestige of Portugal. But we will not consent to more subterfuges, more alibis, more crossed moves or more postponements. We will therefore fight without truce all those who, by taking to the streets or through politically-motivated strikes, through backstage maneuvers or abuse of their positions, want to hinder or delay our democratic course.

The longer and the more difficult the journey, the sooner it is necessary to begin. This is what we have already done. We have already set off on our journey; we are already working. We have, and will have, as fellow travelers the Portuguese men and women who clearly and unequivocally lent their support to our national blueprint and who, fortunately, represent the large majority of the responsible citizens of our country. Good night.

UNION COMMITTEE PROTESTS REPRESSION IN POLAND

LD201720 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 20 Dec 81

[Excerpt] A few minutes ago, the meeting of the Federal Committee of the Workers' Commissions, main body of the union between congresses, came to an end. In the first place, the Federal Committee approved a motion, in line with that of the Secretariat, expressing its profound solidarity with the Polish workers and its outright opposition to the act of force which the military council of Poland is carrying out with violence -- even causing several deaths and numerous injuries -- against the workers and the Solidarity union in that country. Likewise, the Federal Committee demands the freedom of everyone arrested, an immediate halt to the violence and the repressive measures, the annulment of the state of war and restoration of civil freedoms and rights. We believe that only when legality is restored can the process of renewal be resumed by means of dialogue and negotiation. The Federal Committee, moreover, mandated the Secretariat and its Executive Committee to adopt initiatives of active, forthright solidarity, as developments progress in Poland, on the part of Spanish workers with the Polish people and workers.

CARRILLO REPEATS CRITICISM OF POLISH EVENTS

AU190853 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 19 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 19 Dec (ANSA) -- Spain's Communists see the latest events in Poland as in complete contradiction to the essence of socialism, according to the head of the Spanish Communist Party Santiago Carrillo in an interview appearing today in the Italian "LA STAMPA" daily.

Carrillo made a short visit to Rome Thursday and Friday to confer with Italian Communist Secretary Enrico Berlinguer on developments in Poland and the Israeli annexation of the Golan Heights.

In the "LA STAMPA" interview, Carrillo said that it was impossible to imagine a military regime arising out of a socialist system. Poland was undergoing a transformation that has now been halted through force, he said. Should the present military dictatorship conslidate its hold on the country, Poland would find itself on the path towards a reactionary, nationalistic regime, the Spanish Communist leader said.

During his visit here the Italian and Spanish Communist Parties renewed their condemnation of the imposition of martial law in Poland, the arrests reported and the suppression of civil and trade union rights in that country.

Carrillo left Rome for Belgrade Friday afternoon. He will head for home this afternoon.

NATIONWIDE STRIKE SUPPORTS POLISH PEOPLE

NC221747 Paris AFP in English 1737 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Text] Oslo, 22 Dec (AFP) -- Norway came to a complete standstill today in a nation-wide strike in support of the Polish people. At the same time a group of Poles living in exile staged a silent demonstration outside the Polish Embassy in Oslo.

Government offices were silent as were most work-places around the country. Norwegian broadcasting stopped its regular program for five minutes at noon.

Prime Minister Kaare Willoch said at a press conference that the new military regime in Poland represents an inhuman system that has lost every possibility of winning support from the people.

The Norwegian Trade Union Federation gave its full support to demands from the International trade Union organisation that the state of emergency in Poland be repealed at once. Strike action in Norway today had full support of trade unions and employers' organisations.

ULLSTEN: READY TO GIVE FURTHER AID TO POLAND

PM211221 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 15 Dec 81 p 6

[Kaa Eneberg report]

[Excerpts] "Events in Poland illustrate the true character of the communist system. In the long run, communism cannot tolerate opposition or independent political movements. Its foundation is oppression. When the demand for democratization goes so far as to threaten the system as such, attempts at liberation are brutally crushed."

Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten said this during Riksdag question time on Monday [14 December]. In reply to a question from Social Democrat Karl-Erik Svartberg, Ullsten said the government is prepared to give another 1 million kronor in aid to Poland. Ullsten said the Swedish view is that any solution in Poland must be based on the principle of the country's independence and right to freely choose its own way out of the crisis, without outside interference. "Negotiations and a willingness to compromise still seem to us the only way of making progress. In the long run, individuals' desire for freedom cannot be suppressed. Freedom must also mean freedom for those with divergent views," Ullsten said.

THATCHER ANSWERS MP'S ON POLAND, FOOD AID

[Text] The prime minister today warned Poland's military rulers that they were making "an error of historic proportions" if they thought they could put down the Polish people. "We all deeply regret the action being taken to extinguish the flame of freedom that had started in Poland, and if the authorities think they can snuff it out, they are making an error of historic proportions," Mrs Thatcher told the Commons.

During repeated questioning about the plight of the population, Mrs Thatcher stressed the importance of ensuring that any food sent to the country went to those in need, and not the military. Replying to the opposition leader, Mr Foot, who referred to the "brutal suppression" taking place, Mrs Thatcher said: "We totally condemn the oppression by the present regime". She said she could not confirm reports of shootings or the exact position of Solidarity leader Lech Walesa. There was no precise information, other than that he was being detained. But she told Mr Foot: "It seems that almost every undertaking of the Helsinki agreement is being flouted."

On food, she said the West was anxious to do everything possible but did not want food falling into the hands of the military authorities. "We have been in touch with the Red Cross in Geneva and although most of our food has already gone -- there is only a little left that has not gone -- mostly barley and a few tons of beef, we are making strenuous efforts to see that any future deliveries of food do get to the people of Poland," said Mrs Thatcher.

She told former Labour foreign secretary, Dr David Owen (SDP Plymouth, Devonport): "Of course we shall have to be certain that any aid will not strengthen the forces of oppression." Mrs Thatcher stressed that many in Britain felt it would not help the people of Poland to cut off food supplies. But Labour left-winger Mr Bob Cryer (Keighley) said the TUC would regard her stance over Poland as "hypocritical" when she was using the imprisonment of the dole queue and the intervention of the courts to suppress workers in this country. To loud cries of "rubbish!" from the Tory benches, Mr Cryer said her same double standards were demonstrated when she asked trade unionists to accept lower wages, while the new head of the civil service was going to earn 50,000 pounds a year. "Doesn't this demonstrate she doesn't give a damn about workers in the United Kingdom Poland, or anywhere else?" he demanded. But Mrs Thatcher told him there was "no parallel whatsoever "between the two countries.

CARRINGTON SAYS POLISH SITUATION WORSE

PM221539 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 22 Dec 81 p 4

[Report by "our diplomatic staff"]

[Excerpt] The situation in Poland was becoming worse rather than better, Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, said yesterday in an interview on the BBC "World at One" programme. "We've all got to be very careful that what we say doesn't encourage a catastrophe in Poland which isn't in the end going to help the Polish people," he said. The government's initial reaction to the introduction of martial law had been "serious concern, but let us wait and see." Since then things had got very much worse. "We are on the verge of a catastrophe of enormous scale in Poland. There are aspects now which are much more serious than a week or so ago. One will have to consider, for example, any further food aid. If we do give any food aid we will have to make sure it gets to the Polish people and is distributed by some sort of voluntary organisation or the church," said the foreign secretary.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON POLISH CRISIS

[Text] In connection with events in Poland, the following government statement was issued tonight:

Motivated by a profound sympathy for the Polish people, the Greek Government is following with great uneasiness the implementation of emergency measures in Poland and expresses its deep regret at the recent dramatic developments. Together with other European countries, Greece expects states that signed the Helsinki Final Act to abstain from any form of involvement in Poland's internal affairs. The Greek Government believes that Poland must, alone and without the use of violence, solve its problems so that the process of reforms and renewals may continue.

[Text] In a message issued to Greek workers at the U.S. bases on the occasion of the festive days, Deputy Defense Minister Petsos stresses that in the next negotiations with U.S. authorities, an effort will be made to clarify the peculiar status of work that currently is in force for the Greek personnel.

PAPANDREOU REPLIES TO ULUSU ON CYPRUS ISSUE

NC212311 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 21 Dec 81

[Text] The Greek Government's fervent desire is not only that peace be consolidated in the Aegean but that creative cooperation between the two peoples becomes possible -- the Greek and the Turkish peoples. This will become possible when respect has been shown to the independence of the Republic of Cyprus and the Aegean's status has been recognized, as this has been defined by international agreements, treaties and conventions.

This was stressed, in a statement made tonight by Prime Minister Papandreou in reply to a long and strong statement by Turkish Prime Minister Ulusu who, speaking at the so-called Constituent Assembly, warned that the Greek Government's intransigent position will make the creation of new tensions inevitable and will cause disappointment to Greece.

The prime minister's statement is as follows:

Turkish Prime Minister Ulusu's statement contains many and significant misinterpretations of the Greek Government's positions and, of course, contains positions we cannot accept. From the very first day the government came into power, I stressed the basic and sovereign aim of our policy is consolidation of peace in the area. The Turkish prime minister is surprised by the fact that at the NATO national defense ministers' meeting in Brussels I referred to a Turkish threat. I invite him to read the numerous statements of his predecessors, both Ecevit and Demirel, concerning Turkish claims in the Aegean. Certainly, Ulusu must be aware of the multiple violations of national airspace in the Aegean by Turkish planes.

Of course, I am glad, Papandreou continues, because the Turkish prime minister and the Turkish national defense minister in Brussels stressed that such a threat does not exist, because this, of course, is a prerequisite for the maintenance of peace in the area.

However, I would like to stress a significant difference between the Turkish prime minister's positions and those of the Greek Government. Often Ulusu refers to the principle of equite [spoken in French]. As he knows, this principle directly questions all international agreements, treaties and conventions which protect the Aegean's legal status. How can there be a fruitful dialogue between the two countries when one begins by questioning the entire legal status? This is precisely the kind of dialogue with which the Greek Government does not agree, while at the same time it states that it is always ready to participate in a dialogue provided neither country questions national sovereign rights.

Concerning the Cyprus issue, Papandreou continues, once again it should be made clear that this is not a Greek-Turkish issue. Cyprus is an independent state, a UN member. We recall to the Turkish prime minister the significant UN General Assembly resolutions with which Turkey has not complied. Our position has always been that neither Greek nor Turkish troops have a place in Cyprus and it is the duty of both countries to withdraw their armed forces from the Megalonisos. Within this framework and under UN auspices, under its guidance and in the presence of the UN peace force, the two communities, the Greek-Cypriot and the Turkish-Cypriot, will be in a position to formulate a charter that will correspond to Cyprus' special conditions and will protect the rights of all citizens, whether Greek Cypriots or Turkish Cypriots.

I would like to stress, the prime minister continues, that to the extent that the Turkish Government considers its country a guarantor power -- the Zurich agreement -- to this extend both Greece and Britain are necessarily also guarantor powers. Let Ulusu choose.

I don't know on what the Turkish prime minister bases his allegation that the Cyprus National Guard is acquiring fire power beyond its defense needs. I am impressed by Ulusu's observation, especially in view of the recent significant reinforcement of Turkish toops on the Megalonisos.

Prime Minister Papandreou concluded: I reiterate that the Greek Government's fervent desire is not only that peace be consolidated in the Aegean but that creative cooperation between the two peoples, the Greek people and the Turkish people, becomes possible. This will become possible when respect has been shown to the independence of the Republic of Cyprus and the Aegean's status, as defined by international agreements, treaties and conventions, has been recognized.

COMMUNISTS CRITICIZE 'WARSAW MILITARY COUP'

NC230945 Paris AFP in English 0924 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 23 Dec (AFP) -- A group of 118 members of the French Communist Party (FCP) who disagree with the party leadership over Poland today issued a statement publicly criticising the Warsaw military coup.

They urged FCP militants to join their group "demand the end of the state of siege, the liberation of prisoners and the restoration of democratic rights recently gained by the workers."

Last night 25 FCP journalists urged the party leadership to "denounce without ambiguity the military coup which has broken all hopes of a socialist rebirth" in Poland.

Meanwhile, Claude Poperon, member of the FCP Politbureau, stated that the party leadership had no intention of altering its policy on Poland, which supports measures taken under the state of martial law there. He admitted that these measures did not "conform to the FCP's ideas of socialism", but there was no other alternative in Poland. He denied a report by the leftist daily LIBERATION that the FCP had been informed in advance of the December 13 Warsaw state of siege.

BONN MAINTAINING 'CAUTIOUS' ATTITUDE ON POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 23 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government agrees with the other West European governments about the need for a cautious and restrained attitude toward Poland. With this statement, Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl indirectly confirmed today that differences exist with Washington on the question of restrictions. Ruehl repeatedly refused to give information on the talks between U.S. special envoy Lawrence Eagleburger and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and on U.S. reaction to the German view.

Addressing the federal press conference, Ruehl again explained in detail the Federal Republic's restraint in its policy on Poland. He left no doubt that the Federal Republic's restraint in its policy on Poland. He left no doubt that the Federal Republic, like its West European allies, for the moment reject the planned U.S. sanctions against Poland. "The policy of the Federal Government is aimed at not exacerbating the crisis in Poland from the outside," stressed Ruehl. Any exacerbation, which in Bonn's view apparently includes the sanctions desired by Washington, could only result in bringing about the opposite of the hoped-for easing of the situation for the Polish people. At the moment there is no cause for dramatic conclusions, stressed the government spokesman. However, an assessment of the situation is exceptionally difficult because communications are cut and the information received is often contradictory. The Federal Government is maintaining "adequately good contacts" with the Catholic Church.

Sudden changes in Poland could be discussed at all times with the allies because there are constant consultations so Ruehl strongly denied press reports that the Federal Government is allegedly isolated from its West European allies. The policy of "cautious waiting, restraint and moderation in statements" accorded with the view of the EEC partners on all essential points.

No 'Mediating Role'

LD231356 Hamburg DPA in German 1239 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 23 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Republic is not a mediator between the great powers and, in the words of Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl, has not been asked to perform such a role by the Soviet state and party chief, Leonid Brezhnev. With textual quotes from a Brezhnev interview by the U.S. television network NBC, Ruehl today rejected press reports that he had allegedly granted the Federal Republic such a role. At the federal press conference Ruehl described the question put by the U.S. interviewer about Brezhnev's attitude to Bonn having a mediating role between Moscow and Washington, as a "suggestive question." He said the reply to it that "We welcome a trend of this sort in the policy of the FRG, which promotes detente and peaceful cooperation," was, using the words of the Soviet ambassador to Bonn, Vladimir Semenov, "balanced and sensitive."

The view that the Federal Republic could not be a mediator was, Ruehl said, confirmed by Semenov yesterday in a talk with the state secretary in the chancellor's office, Manfred Lahnstein. Bonn did not stand between the alliances, but had its firm place in the Western pact system, which at best allowed it "to declare and to expound." Ruehl thus outlined the position of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who has always described the Federal Republic's role in talks between the United States and the Soviet Union as an interpreter's job.

DM206 MILLION IN FOOD AID SUPPLIED TO POLAND

[Text] In a statement ot the National Assembly on Poland, Premier Pierre Mauroy said: France distinguishes between oppression of a national kind and more direct foreign intervention. He added: The French Government is determined to take no notice of the law of silence behind which any normalization always tries to hide.

On USSR Interference

[Text] Speaking to the parliament, Pierre Mauroy considered for the first time that Soviet interference in Poland is real. Nonetheless, the premier added, there is a tangible difference between the present oppression, which is national in character, and a more massive, more direct foreign intervention. France must take this difference into account, Pierre Mauroy added.

The premier also defined French objectives in relation to Poland. There are three: This country must resolve its problems without foreign interference, progress and freedoms that have been won must not be withdrawn, and last the Polish Government must understand that only a radical change in its attitude can prevent economic disorder from getting worse and can prevent the international situation as a whole from being affected.

PCF'S MARCHAIS SENDS MESSAGE TO POLISH LEADER

LD231522 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Text] Georges Marchais has just sent a letter to General Jaruzelski. The message was delivered to the Polish Embassy in Paris early this afternoon, and its contents have been made public. The letter says in particular that it is up to the Polish working class and people to resolve Poland's problems. It adds, and I quote: Even if a state of emergency is provided for in the constitution, we find the suspension of public freedoms, the arrests and internments that it entails distressing.

JOBERT QUESTIONED ON POLAND, U.S.-USSR RELATIONS

LD240512 Paris Domestic Service in French 1810 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Interview with Michel Jobert, minister of state for foreign trade, by Francois Bonnemain of France-Inter, Alain Fernback of French Television, Paul Gilbert of LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS, Patric Ledenteque of OUEST-FRANCE, Joe Fitchett of the INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE, and Ralph Pinto of France-Inter -- live or recorded: date and place not specified]

[Excerpts] [Question] For almost 2 weeks now, Mr Minister, much has been said of the misfortunes of the Poles, and we still do not see what Western governments can do to help Poland. So, my first question is simple: Is there something to be done apart from condemnations in principle, however strong they are?

[Answer] I will reply that what is important is not whether condemnations are in principle; it is important to define the attitude one will have if one accepts or if one refuses. Then things can be implemented if possible. But what is our attitude? Should we accept that this situation, which is detestable in all respects, should prolong itself in silence or in fury? Do we not all have the right to say that what marks our life, what makes our dignity, is to fight for our rights and the right to freedom. It is true that we all live in a world which is as it is. As regards Europe and a whole section of the world, it is a result of the sharing between the great powers, between the great powers which put their understanding above all else -- if possible their good understanding, in any case their dialogue, dialogue for two.

[Question] I am going to ask you a question as former foreign minister and current minister of foreign trade. One may wonder in the specific case of Poland whether in the end foreign trade is not more important than foreign policy.

[Answer] You are worried about what the means will be and you think, in your very pessimistic point of view, that economic relations are so inbuilt between countries that it is too bad for others, that the important thing is to keep going or fall by the wayside. This is not so at all. Having shared out zones of influence with the United States, the Soviet Union has ceaselessly been trying to make Europe recognize these shares, the territorial shares. For 20 years the Soviet Union has also been trying to secure an international conference on peace and security in Europe. Then suddenly in 1973 -- and why? Because the Soviet Union was making a strategic agreement with the United States -- the two great powers agreed to push all of their European clientele to this conference. What was the aim of this conference? It was a gift the Americans were giving to the Russians -- recognizing the share-out of 1945, the territorial shares.

[Question] But Mr Minister, the economic issues concern the Soviet Union in particular. So, apart from the political pressure in Helsinki or elsewhere, could one not envisage a form of economic pressure?

[Answer] Yes, one could in fact, supposing that the United States -- which must be disgusted by this situation -- interrupted its deliveries of wheat. It would be very effective. Not only have they resumed them; they have increased them. So I go back to my political analysis. You see, this world is shared between two great powers which want only one thing -- their good understanding. Well, from time to time there are people who are crushed, and this does not worry them; Poland is among these. Well, we are concerned about them, but it seems to me that others are not at all.

[Question] Do you think Mr Reagan is not concerned about Poland at present, or at least gives the impression of not being concerned?

[Answer] Listen, I have read Mr Reagan's statements just as you have. I have read the statements by his secretary of defense. I got the impression that for the United States this matter goes beyond the Polish framework and the limits of the suffering of the Polish people, that it is a matter of dialogue -- I come back to the word I used a while ago -- with the Soviet Union. And it is this that we are going toward. It is a situation which has become absolutely tragic, but I am ready to bet you that before next June the United States will have had talks, including talks on strategic matters, with the USSR.

[Question] I note you left Beijing over a sad love story. But why did you not leave Moscow over the military coup d'etat in Poland? You even signed a contract, if I am right, for 8 billion or 6 billion cubic meters of gas.

[Answer] Once again, Mr Fernbach, you have been caught in the act of inaccuracy. I did not leave Beijing; I left Beijing on the normal date of my departure. Also you say I signed a contract. Read a little, at least the press, Mr Fernbach. I did not sign a contract. Private French companies signed a contract which, moreover, was a framework contract that had already been signed last September.

[Question] In any case, you are very pessimistic about the possibility of Europe and the Americans speaking with the same voice on this Polish affair, or at least acting in common.

[Answer] I hope that we would speak in less conflicting voices, and loudly as well. Yes, I hope so.

HUNT FOR GENERAL DOZIER CONTINUES WITHOUT RESULTS

LD232156 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Aldo Bello report from Verona]

[Text] We are now in the phase of methodical searches, with Veneto divided into several areas. Digos [political police], Carabinieri, and Guardia di Finanza have been given precise tasks and roles and are directed by the coordination center which was set up here immediately after the kidnapping of the NATO deputy commander, Gen James Lee Dozier.

Raids and searches of private premises continued today, but without results. The range of action has been enlarged. Enquiries are not being carried out only in this region, that is, in Lombardy and Emilia-Romagna, but also in central Italy. This morning, for instance, a vast operation was carried out in Umbria in the lower valley of the Nero River, but the target of the investigators still remains the heavily populated centers such as Milan and Mestre, where the terrorists can more easily disguise themselves.

In the meantime, while mentally unbalanced persons and those who are trying to stir up trouble continue to play their games -- one of them rang up ANSA in Venice a short while ago, announcing that there was a communique in Piazza San Marco, which of course was not found -- it is reported from Bonn that the Federal Office of Criminal Investigation has officially confirmed that special agents have been sent to Italy to cooperate with Digos and Carabinieri about the possible involvement of German Red Army terrorists in the kidnapping of the NATO general. It was not disclosed how many there are.

POPE ADDRESSES POLES AT CHRISTMAS AUDIENCE

LD231558 Vatican City in English to Central and Western Europe 1445 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Text] Speaking to the Polish people at today's audience, the pope said:

My dear fellow countrymen, we know that Christmas is the family season. We know that on Christmas Eve the family unites for the oplatek [wafer]. It is important to extend this family scene of the oplatek and of Christmas Eve to all Polish families, both at home and beyond the country's borders. It is important to think of the whole of Poland as one single family. In this family justice and love must triumph. All contrary forces must be put aside.

These are the wishes I extend to all my fellow countrymen on the occasion of this oplatek. You, who have been particularly close to my heart and the heart of the whole church in these recent days, that you may feel present in the heart of the church, that you may feel that society and nation, that all the brothers and sisters are with you and that, strengthened by this consciousness in the spirit of the best national traditions, you may celebrate Christmas.

CP CHAIRMAN: COMMUNISTS DEPLORE PRAVDA ARTICLE

LD232026 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 23 Dec 81

[Text] The chairman of the Finnish Communist Party [SKP], Aarne Saarinen, regards the article in the Soviet party paper PRAVDA on the voting decision by the Finnish People's Democratic League [SKDL] diet group as ill-considered. According to Saarinen, the article does not serve the SKP's endeavours for unity. Saarinen thinks the PRAVDA article will again be used as a weapon by a certain side against the other. According to Saarinen, the article also aroused extensive irritation among Finnish communists.

PRAVDA today reported on the dismissal of 11 deputies of the so-called minority in the SKP from the SKDL diet group. PRAVDA thinks the measure is unique and unprecendented. In PRAVDA's opinion, the step is an expression of attempts by certian circles to break up the unity of the Communist Party and to weaken the party's position in Finalnd. In view of the SKP chairman, the article gives a false impression of the events in the SKDL diet group.

CP UNDERSTANDS NEED FOR POLISH MARTIAL LAW

PM231131 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 21 Dec 81 p 8

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report]

[Text] Oslo, 20 Dec -- The Norwegian Communist Party [NKP] will not condemn the state of martial law in Poland. It is the party's view that the military council under the leadership of Prime Minister Jaruzelski proclaimed the state of martial law to combat what the party calls complete chaos, a press statement says. The NKP central executive considers, however, that the state of military law in Poland should be lifted as soon as possible. "The political, economic and social problems can only be solved peacefully through the further development of the process of socialist democratization. The trade union movement will be an important factor in this process," the statement says. Norway's Communist Youth League does not accept that a military takeover and martial law were the only way of solving the crisis in Poland.

EC COUNTRIES SUBMIT DEMARCHE TO POLISH MINISTER

[Excerpts] Governments of the Common Market countries have made a joint approach to the Polish Government over numerous reports of the suppression of trade union rights, internment and inhuman conditions of detention and even deaths in Poland, the Foreign Office said today. The representation was presented last night by Mr Ramsay Melhuish, acting head of the British mission in Warsaw, on behalf of the 10, as Britain is current president of the community. Mr Melhuish saw the Polish foreign minister, Mr Joseph Czyrek. The Foreign Office said that he expressed the community's hope that the process of "true negotiation" would be restored in Poland.

The Foreign Office did not expand on exactly what this meant. A spokesman said the representation -- officially a demarche -- could be seen as a forceful declaration of the community's viewpoint. In reply Mr Czyrek said that the demarche was based on a "misrepresentation" of the situation in Poland.

The Foreign Office said that the acting head of mission did not specifically ask for the release of those now in internment or the whereabouts of the Solidarity leader Mr Lech Walesa. It seems also that Mr Melhuish did not discuss the possibility of Western sanctions against Poland or restrictions on food supplies, such as had been demanded by some critics of the present action.

CARRINGTON RECEIVES NEW POLISH AMBASSADOR

[Text] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington today told the new Polish ambassador in London that Britain condemned the detentions and violence following the military crackdown last week. The new ambassador, Mr Stefan Staniszewski, who arrived in London only five days ago, was paying a courtesy call on the foreign secretary. Lord Carrington stressed the importance he attaches to the Polish Government's commitment that the present measures will be short-lived. The British Government also thought food supplies should go to those most in need, he said. He also asked about restrictions on the movement of British diplomats in Poland, and the clampdown which has stopped British journalists reporting events in Poland.

Miners' leader Mr Joe Gormley today added his voice to the storm of protest over the military takeover. Speaking of his own "revulsion", he declared: "I believe the whole trade union movement in Britain, along with our colleagues in the rest of Europe, should express their condemnation of this action and ask that pressure should be put on the politicians of the world to seek the immediate release of these workers' representatives in Poland and a peaceful solution to the problems." The executive of the engineering union, the AUEW, today sent 500 pounds towards helping the Poles.

PAPER WARNS OF NEW CYPRUS ATTACK BY TURKS

NC180840 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 17 Dec 81 p 1

[Editorial: "Toward a New Attila?"]

[Text] The government should not have waited for the insolent Ankara allegations--that Greek troops and war materiel allegedly are being sent to Cyprus--in order to release the news that the Turks are doing precisely what they have been accusing us of doing. The question is extremely serious, particularly under the current international conditions. It shows that Turkey not only fails to display any desire to negotiate or to contribute to a Cyprus solution but that it also is acting in a way that shows proof of its deceitful and malicious intentions.

Indeed, why is it sending troops and war materiel to Cyprus, as the Greek Government has announced, releasing details on concrete dates and cases? From the Greek side, there is no threat of a resort to force. Ankara has failed to furnish any concrete evidence to support its allegations that Greek troops are being sent to the island. Well, what is Ankara aspiring to?

What is most probable is that a new Attila-type attack is being planned and that the suitable opportunity is being awaited for implementation of these plans. What would this opportunity be? We are living among active volcanoes, or among volcanoes that can erupt in our region from one moment to another. Poland is like a boiling pot: if the situation gets out of the control of the Warsaw government, the Soviet Union will intervene, possibly with other countries to the bloc. The annexation of the Golan Heights by Israel has caused a sudden deterioration in the Middle East crisis and has made a new war very probable. In the meantime the Iran-Iraq war is continuing.

These are dramatic events which could attract the attention of the world and could encourage Ankara to embark on new adventurism. Who would care about the fate of the rest of Cyprus at a time when the world around is in flames, and especially since the outside world would have formed the impression--as a result of Turkish propaganda--that this was a preventive action in view of a Greek threat? Let us not underestimate the warning drawn from events and let us unmask and denounce in time, to foreign governments and to the world, Ankara's deceitful and malicious intentions.

TURKISH-LIBYAN LABOR COMMITTEE MEETS IN ANKARA

TA221150 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 22 Dec 81

[Text] The Turkish-Libyan labor and social security joint experts committee met in Ankara today. It is discussing measures to eliminate the difficulties being encountered in implementation of the existing labor and social security agreements between the two countries. The problems of the 65,000 Turkish workers employed in Libya are also being discussed. The Turkish delegation at the talks is headed by Foreign Ministry Social Affairs Director Okan Gezer.

In an opening speech, Gezer recalled that there were historic, cultural and traditional ties between the two countries and that the 65,000 Turkish workers in Libya were prompting a heightening of these relations. He stated that the Turkish Government wanted to strengthen relations with Libya, added that cooperation must be developed so that the contribution of Turkish manual labor to Libya's economic development could be increased. Gezer pointed out that the increasing number of Turkish workers in Libya has created certain problems and that at the meeting they would also try to solve problems arising from the implementation of existing agreements.

Libyan Labor Secretariat Director General (Muhammad al-Montaza), who is heading the Libyan delegation, expressed belief that at the end of the present meetings they would resolve the problems concerning the work force and social security. The joint committee meetings are expected to last 4 days.

DENKTAS: COMMUNITIES CANNOT LIVE TOGETHER NOW

[Text] President Denktas has said that if Greek Prime Minister Papandreou continues to pretend that Cyprus is a Greek island, this might lead to bloody conflicts. Denktas made this statement today speaking at the unveiling ceremony of an Ataturk bust at the Alasya primary school in Gazi Magosa [Famagusta]. Recalling that since the day he assumed power in Greece, Papandreou's stand has encouraged rifts in Cyprus, Denktas said: After Greek troops landed in Cyprus, Papandreou reminded us that Greece was a guarantor power and began asking for withdrawal of all foreign troops from the island. By making this request, Papandreou has in fact conceded to the presence of Greek troops in Cyprus. We already knew this fact, but we now want the world to learn about it and to make its assessment accordingly. Greek weapons have been involved in the murder of Turkish Cypriots, and it was to stop these attacks that Turkey carried out its operation in Cyprus. Peace has reigned on the island since 1974 because of the presence of Turkish troops. Papandreou's stand resembles that of the thief that shouts to scare off the homeowner.

In our children's presence, the insurers of our future, I would like to deliver the following message to Papandreou: As long as he continues to pretend that Cyprus is a Greek island, his assessments will be wrong and will serve to encourage the Greek Cypriots to renew the bloody incidents. It is completely clear that the two communities in Cyprus cannot live intermingled anymore. If Papandreou continues to proclaim that Cyprus is a Greek island, without taking into consideration the changes that have occurred since 1963, then he and Kiprianou, his apprentice, will make the same mistakes that the West and Archibishop Makarios made in the past. I want to call on him in the presence of Ataturk: Cyprus has never been and will never be Greek. Like our martyrs in the past, we today will never permit this to happen.

CUNHAL SUPPORTS MOVES BY POLISH AUTHORITIES

[Excerpts] Commenting on the situation in Poland during a communist rally in Lisbon last night, Portuguese Communist Party Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal referred to what he described as a "curious anticommunist campaign in connection with the situation in Poland." According to Cunhal, this campaign is being waged because the situation in Poland is unfavorable to the counterrevolutionary forces and is aimed at diverting the attention of the Portuguese people from their very grave problems.

Referring to Poland, Cunhal said: We are gratified at the latest developments. All signs indicate that the Poles are about to solve the situation by halting the process of continuing deterioration of the economic, social and political situation. Cunhal told the communist militants who packed Lisbon's sports pavilion that this will save Poland from economic catastrophe and civil war, whose brink it had been led to a result of serious mistakes by the party and by the government and as a result of imperialist interference and successive concessions to counterrevolution.

NO OFFICIAL COMMENT ON REAGAN'S POLAND STATEMENT

LD241108 Hamburg DPA in German 1054 GMT 24 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 24 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government said nothing officially today on U.S. President Ronald Reagan's statement on Poland. Government circles referred to the statement made yesterday by Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl that the Federal Government, together with the other West European governments, agreed on the need for a careful and restrained attitude toward Poland. In contrast, Reagan, in his televised Christmas address, imposed economic sanctions on Poland and announced that further measures against Poland and the Soviet Union would be imposed if the use of force against the Polish people was not ended.

GENSCHER URGES REVOCATION OF POLISH MARTIAL LAW

LD271482 Hamburg DPA in German 1410 GMT 27 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 27 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has once again appealed to the Soviet leadership not to hinder Poland on its path to renewal and reform. In an interview on South German Radio on Sunday, Genscher said that the Soviet Union must be aware of the responsibility which it bears. It must avoid allowing the Polish events to burden the East-West relationship, which would disrupt the hopeful initial signs of a dialogue on peace and disarmament. Genscher recalled that the Polish leadership committed itself to the course of renewal and reform also after 13 December. It is important that, by repealing martial law and releasing the internees, it should clearly indicate that the process of dialogue with political forces, social groups, the church and the independent union Solidarity can be continued. He was convinced that it is not yet too late for this. At the present time all states, in both the West and the East, must resist the temptation to interfere in Poland.

MINISTER CALLS FOR SOVIET AFGHAN WITHDRAWAL

LD271232 Hamburg DPA in German 1049 GMT 27 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 27 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has called upon the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan. On the second anniversary of the Soviet intervention on Sunday Genscher appealed to the Soviet Union to allow the Afghan people unrestricted exercise of their right to independence and self-determination. He based his call on his shared stance "with the majority of states" and pointed out that the will of the Afghan people is dramatically expressed in resistance and mass flight from the country. The Foreign Ministry called Afghanistan a touchstone for Soviet willingness to respect the independence and self-reliance of Third World states. The situation in that country is a serious burden on international relations. The Federal Government will continue to strive for self-determination and independence in Afghanistan, along with its Western partners and in close cooperation with the nonaligned countries. It will continue to the best of its ability to contribute to the alleviation of the suffering of the more than 2.5 million Afghan refugees.

BRIEFS

SCHMIDT TO MEET REAGAN -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today left Hamburg by air with his wife Hannelore for a visit to the United States, which will combine holiday and political aspects. Initially they want to holiday on a small island off Florida. A talk with President Reagan is planned for 5 January. One subject of the meeting could be the differing points of view of the United States and the FRG on Poland. The FRG is against economic or political sanctions against the crisis ridden country, even after the declaration of martial law. [Excerpt] [Hamburg DPA in German 1217 GMT 25 Dec 81 LD]

CHEYSSON SPEAKS TO ASSEMBLY ON POLISH EVENTS

[Excerpt] External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson, speaking to the National Assembly foreign affairs commission Thursday 17 December, said that consultations had been started as early as the evening of Sunday 13 December among the Ten and their allies and that immediate agreement had made it possible to warn Poland's neighbors that any direct intervention on their part would be extremely serious and would have tragic effects on the detente process.

He made two remarks: On the one hand, it would not be appropriate to accuse a foreign government of urging extreme measures, but the condemnation must be categorical and it has been expressed by the president, the premier and the government; in addition Mr Cheysson stressed that the government should not say anything it cannot stand by, so as not to undermine the government's credibility and so that the world knows that France does what it says it will.

During the debate which followed the external relations minister's explanation, Pierre Joxe, chairman of the Socialist group, paid tribute to Mr Cheysson's action, stressing that he "is pursuing an active policy which is giving France a new face, that of a nation which defends freedoms throughout the world.... It is in this context that we assessed and regretted some aspects of the statement made on Poland by the external relations minister last Sunday," he added. "On the other hand we approve and welcome the premier's statement which he made on the government's behalf Wednesday and which has just been recalled and explained by Mr Cheysson."

ECONOMICS MINISTER CITED ON POLISH DEBT

PM241645 Paris LE MONDE in French 19 Dec 81 p 7

[Text] The latest developments in Poland have so far not changed France's attitude in the international negotiations on the Polish debt, Economy and Finance Minister Jacques Delors stated Wednesday 16 December. Questioned in the corridors of the National Assembly, Mr Delors stated that French experts "are still working" on the adjustment of the 1982 repayment dates of Poland's public debt to 16 Western countries. This debt amounts to $12.5 billion of the $25 billion which Poland owes to the West. "The worst aspect of this affair is the people who are continuing to talk in an irresponsible way," Mr Delors concluded, saying that he refuses to "expect the worst."

In the Nord region, where Poles are numerous, Pierre Mauroy received a delegation of the congress of Poles living in France. The premier promised to facilitate the return home of exiles and said he will step up food relief aid to Poland.

DEVELOPMENTS IN DOZIER KIDNAPPING CASE

26 Dec 'Pessimism'

LD262036 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 26 Dec 81

[Text] The Dozier kidnapping: There is pessimism over the possibility of a speedy solution to the case. During the press conference in Milan this morning, investigating agents denied the possibility of a direct link between the arrests of three Red Brigades members and the kidnapping of the U.S. general. Now that 9 days have elapsed since the kidnapping and while waiting for the second Red Brigades communique, the view is gaining ground that this is going to be a long drawn-out case. In the meantime checks and searches are being made in the belief that the high-ranking NATO officer may be held in a Veneto hideout. The possibility is not ruled out that the actions of the security forces may have put the Red Brigades members in difficulties. Obviously this is an assessment which time will prove right or wrong.

Spadolini Holds 26 Dec Meeting

[Text] Rome, 26 Dec (ANSA) -- The problems of terrorism in Italy were the subject of a summit meeting held here over the weekend and chaired by Premier Giovanni Spadolini. He met with Italian political and military leaders which included Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni, the defense chief of staff, the commanders of the paramilitary Carabinieri police force and the Finance Guard, the chief of police, and the top brass of the nation's security services.

The Saturday consultation was shrouded in strictest secrecy, although it was assumed that the recent kidnapping in Verona of American General James Dozier, a top-ranking NATO official, figured largely in the discussions. At the end of the summit, Minister Rognoni told newsmen that it had been a meeting of "an operative nature" and that he could say nothing more.

24 Dec Meeting

[Excerpts] Verona, 24 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni chaired a meeting of top police and army officers here today just a week after the Red Brigades urban guerrillas kidnapped U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier from his home in this north Italian town. The two-hour meeting was wrapped in the utmost secrecy. Swamped by journalists as he left, Rognoni said nothing more than, "I have no comment to make." The meeting was attended by the commanders of Italy's paramilitary Carabinieri police, the national police chief, and the commanders of the NATO surface forces in southern Europe, among others.

The investigators are now waiting for a new message which the Red Brigades have said they will be issuing on the kidnap, this time, so some analysts believe, stating some form of conditions for his release.

Kidnappers' Second Communique

LD272230 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 27 Dec 81

Apart from the communique and the photograph, the terrorists also left a long document that they had mentioned a few days ago in a telephone call. In that call they also denied any knowledge of the dossier found in Rome a week ago. The telephone call said the dossier was the work of a group that had split from the Red Brigades. That seems to indicate that there are new conflicts within the terrorist organization.

The bishop of Verona, Msgr Giuseppe Amari, tonight visited Mrs Dozier, the wife of the kidnapped general, to whom he forwarded a message from the pope. In the message, Pope John Paul II expressed feelings of Christian solidarity with Dozier's family and the hope that the matter would be settled favorably.

'Trial Has Begun'

LD272352 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2300 GMT 27 Dec 81

[Text] Ten days after the kidnapping of U.S. General Dozier, the Red Brigades released communique No 2 in Milan. Vittorio Luridiana reports from the capital of Lombardy:

[Begin recording] The Red Brigades tonight telephoned ANSA news agency to say they have released the second communique on the kidnapping of NATO Gen James Dozier. The lengthy message was left in a trashcan in the Piazza Giovine Italia. It consisted of a photograph of the kidnapped general, a six-page communique and a copy of the resolution of the Red Brigades' Strategic Directorate dated December 1981. The photograph shows General Dozier and a five-pointed star with the inscription "Red Brigades" above him. [Words indistinct] against imperialism, attack imperialism of the multinationals, the text says, and its structure of military occupation which is NATO. The typewritten text that accompanied the photograph is now being studied by investigators. The communique says among other things that the trial of the American general has begun. [end recording]

More on Communique

PA272133 Madrid EFE in Spanish 2123 GMT 27 Dec 81

[Text] Milan, 27 Dec (EFE) -- The Red Brigades announced today in Milan that they have started the "proletarian trial" of U.S. Gen James Dozier, who was kidnapped in Verona on 17 December. In a communique found early this evening in Milan, after an anonymous telephone call, the terrorists say Dozier, deputy chief of staff of the NATO forces, whose headquarters is in Verona, in northeast Italy, will have to pay for "U.S. massacres in Vietnam."

The 6-page Red Brigades communique contains many attacks against "imperialism" and NATO and calls Dozier a "pig" and "murderer" who "deserved" several medals for his role in Vietnam. The communique, found in a waste can in the plaza in the city, is accompanied by a photograph of Dozier under the five-pointed Red Brigade star. In the photograph General Dozier holds a poster saying, "The capitalist crisis produces imperialist war. Only an anti-imperialist civil war can defeat the war."

The Red Brigades communique, the second referring to General Dozier's kidnapping, is dated today. Besides the photograph of the general, it has attached a document entitled "Resolution of the Strategic Directorate" dated "December 1981." The 188-page document is divided into 4 chapters: "The crisis of the imperialist bourgeoisie produces war," "Restructuring crisis and revolution crisis," "To conquer and organize the masses in the field of armed struggle for communism," and "Transforming the projects of the imperialist bourgeoisie into an anti-imperialist civil war."

POPE'S MESSAGE TO POLES ON CHRISTMAS DAY

LD251734 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 1515 GMT 25 Dec 81

[Christmas message and blessing in Polish by Pope John Paul II in St Peters Square 25 December -- recording]

[Text] And now I am addressing you, my beloved countrymen [words indistinct] convey to you the greetings from the newly born, to you who are present here in St Peters Square, representatives of Solidarity and all fellow countrymen, and also to you who are listening to my words in our homeland and wherever you are in the world, I convey today's greetings. I include in these greetings everybody and each one of you, all of Poland, our common homeland. I wish these greetings to reach in particular those who are suffering, who are separated from their loved ones and who perhaps feel dispirited or distressed.

Beloved brothers, a great many people are praying for Poland all over the world. Together with them and the entire church, I am addressing you at this moment of greetings expressed in languages of various nations and saying in our mother tongue: Lift up your hand, God the Baby, in blessing. You who indicated the road to Bethlehem to the shepherds and the Magi, show the Polish land's sons and daughters the road to a better future for their motherland, to peace, justice and freedom. May the name of Jesus Christ be blessed.

Poggi Returns From Poland

AU280848 Rome ANSA in English 0843 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 28 Dec (ANSA) -- The pope's special envoy to Poland, Msgr Luigi Poggi, returned to Rome from Warsaw Sunday night at the end of his five-day mission in which he met with Polish leader General Wojciech Jaruzelski.

According to unconfirmed leaks here Poggi discussed the Polish situation and the possibilities for a resumption of a dialogue between the government and the country's social forces, during his Warsaw talks. The papal envoy also met with Poland's primate, Msgr Josef Glemp and other high prelates in the Warsaw Curia.

DEPUTIES CONDEMN MARTIAL LAW IN POLAND

PM231617 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 18 Dec 81 p 5

[Text] The Congress of Deputies yesterday approved by a large majority an official resolution condemning the current events in Poland. Speaker of the chamber Landelino Lavilla read out the resolution, which was drafted on the basis of a text prepared by the representatives of the parliamentary groups. The final vote was 252 votes in favor, 2 abstentions and 1 vote against. These last two results were caused more by matters of a technical nature (it is usual for some deputies to leave their voting switches turned on) than by ideological disagreements with the text presented for their approval.

The chamber's communication states verbatim as follows: "The Congress of Deputies, in view of the grave events which are taking place in Poland and echoing the sentiments of the Spanish people, decides: 1) To express its friendship and solidarity with the Polish nation and people at this critical juncture, 2) To condemn the interruption by force of the process of securing public freedoms which the Polish people had chosen, and to express the hope that that process can be resumed, 3) To assert the absolute need for direct or indirect external intervention to be avoided, since that would affect the international situation very adversely and exacerbate dramatically the Polish people's problems."

JUAN CARLOS RECALLS PAST STRIFE, URGES UNITY

LD242306 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 24 Dec 81

[Christmas address by King Juan Carlos; place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] As a new year approaches I would once again like to express to you in your homes, via radio and television, my sincere desire above all for peace and happiness on the occasion of the traditional Christmas holidays. I think it would be as inappropriate to dwell on the unpleasant things, analyzing them with bitterness, pessimism or despair, as it would be to ignore them indifferently and rashly and think that they do not exist. But difficulties are not resolved by mentioning them on a night like tonight. Rather they must be remedied with the effort and dedication of every day, of every night, of every hour and every minute. Without relating past events, we are all aware that since last Christmas, when I addressed you on this same date, we have lived through difficult and important moments. The conviction of their importance and the decision to overcome them now constitutes the beginning of their solution.

Rather than thinking about the difficulties of the path ahead we must think about the path itself in the certainty of knowing which is the one we must follow to arrive at the desired destination. In politics, we have a constitution which a majority of the Spanish people gave themselves. In obeying it and respecting it we are now on this path which we must follow without doubts or hesitation to live in a state of law. There is no other valid alternative. Nor can there be thought of other solutions imposed by minorities who could upset the aim of peace and order which inspires our conduct. I beg God tonight and I beg the Spaniards that this truth may penetrate the minds of everyone and forever prevail over campaigns of slander, false propaganda and malicious rumors.

Let us feel united like true brothers, like members of the same family, like compatriots aware of the need to work for Spain. Let us avoid by all means creating motives that could unleash confrontation and discord among ourselves. Let us not try to change a past which existed and which we must accept with its reality, its facts, its memories and its men; memories which must be respected and men whose collaboration is necessary, because we cannot dispense with any Spaniard prepared to work decisively for the fatherland.

I beg only of you at this hour, an hour of fraternity, love and hope, that this family peace you are enjoying at the moment be extended throughout the coming year to the great family which all Spaniards should constitute on the blessed hearth of our fatherland. Let this same spirit of harmony fill our souls and inspire our actions. Let us respect each other in freedom. Let us renounce violence and feel ourselves united in the great task of building a prosperous and orderly Spain in which the supreme goal of its welfare and its greatness takes precedence over particular interests and narrow aspiration. Congratulations, both on my own behalf and on behalf of the queen and our children, to all of you, to all Spaniards wherever they are, especially those who are suffering and are victims of misfortune and adversity. Good night.

MINOR PARTIES' DIFFERENCES THREATEN COALITION

PM231703 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 16 Dec 81 p 7

[Christian Broendum report]

[Excerpt] The distance between the Radical Liberals and the Socialist People's Party [SF] on economic policy is so great that the Radical Liberals yesterday rejected a proposal for negotiations with the SF toward finding foundation for cooperation in the formation of a government. Yesterday the SF and the Radical Liberals had separate negotiations with Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen on a joint economic policy, and after the meetings Anker Jorgensen said that he had asked the two parties to give their positions on the points in the Social Democratic plan of action.

Earlier yesterday after a cabinet meeting the prime minister said that, if the two parties are unable to reach agreement which would give a guarantee of a parliamentary majority for a new government, the Social Democrats will go into opposition. Anker Jorgensen announced that he has proposed to the Radical Liberals and the SF that they hold separate negotiations, but the Radical Liberals have rejected the proposal.

Radical Liberal leader Niels Helveg Petersen said after his meeting with the prime minister that the Radicals have refused to meet the SF because of the SF's proposals on unemployment. "These confirm that it is impossible to bridge the gap between the Social Democrats and Radical Liberals' views on the one hand and the SF program on the other The SF program would only be effective in the short-term. It would lead to inflation and increase the tax burden and therefore lead to a long-term decrease in employment."

Helveg Petersen said that the Radical Liberals and the Social Democrats are in agreement on a number of major points, but that there is great distance between them and the SF. SF Chairman Gert Petersen admitted after the meeting with Anker Jorgensen that the differences between the SF and the Social Democrats and the Radicals have not grown smaller. "We are in agreement with the Social Democrats on a number of points of principle, but there are considerable differences in the assessment of the size of investments which should be made in particular policies."

SWEDEN

PRIME MINISTER STEPS UP PROTEST ON POLAND

PM231543 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Sweden 19 Dec 81 pp 1, 4

[Finn Norgren and Per-Erik Landqvist report]

[Excerpt] "Sweden strongly condemns this gross violation of fundamental human rights," the government has said in a statement which makes criticism of developments in Poland tougher. "Unfortunately things have gone so far that blood has begun to flow," Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin said on Friday evening [18 December]. "This makes it natural for Sweden to protest more strongly than before."

At a meeting of the Riksdag foreign affairs committee on Friday the government gave an account of the background to its statement. Former Moderate Coalition party leader Goesta Bohman said later that he was behind the statement, and Social Democrat leader Olof Palme considered that the statement was correct in principle.

"Basically there is absolute agreement between the parties on the committee," Thorbjorn Falldin said. However, a joint statement by all the parties in the Riksdag has not been discussed. At a press conference Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten also dismissed the notion that the Left Party-Communists -- who are not represented either in the foreign affairs committee or the Foreign Affairs Council -- should join in the criticism: "What has happened in Poland is a protest against the communist system. I find it difficult to believe that Swedish Communists would be able to join in our criticism."

The government has demanded that the state of martial law in Poland be terminated and that all those imprisoned be released. It also says that the actions by the army and the police should cease. "The reports that Polish citizens have been killed have outraged us. Poland must continue along the road of negotiation and be spared every external military intervention. It is important to say clearly that no troops should be allowed to enter Poland," Thorbjorn Falldin said. "We hope that the protests will in part create international pressure on the country's leaders and in part give moral support to the people."

ARMED FORCES CHIEF REPORTS ON SUB INTRUSION

[Text] Soviet submarine 137 was already in Swedish waters Saturday 24 October 1981 and it carried out exercises for 4 days inside and outside territorial waters before it ran aground at 1957 hours on the evening of 27 October. This is clear from Swedish Armed Forces Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung's partially published report of the investigations into the submarine 137 incident after the report from a fisherman at 0954 hours Wednesday 28 October that it had run aground. The affair was frontpage news around the world for more than 10 days.

The commander in chief notes that the submarine was not discovered by the population of the islands in the Blekinge Archipelago, and that there are no certain indications of its presence from radar and radio surveillance, but that the possibility cannot be excluded that a radar echo was misinterpreted. The commander in chief says: "Therefore the possibility cannot be excluded that radar surveillance did reveal the submarine, but that this was taken at the time for a merchant ship or a fishing boat. Identification of radar echoes must normally be effected through direct sighting."

The commander in chief is sure that submarine 137 was on the surface at least 2 hours before it ran aground and that it was in Swedish waters at the time. He also says that the submarine was aware that it was entering the restricted military area and that the grounding was caused by an error in maneuvering or navigation inside the restricted zone. The commander in chief draws the conclusion that submarine 137's mission was illegal intelligence activities designed to practice navigation and reconnaissance in suitable channels and in seabed positions.

It is also possible that submarine 137 was looking for Swedish military installations in the area. It might also have been following secret Swedish equipment trials -- of torpedoes, for example, secret trials of which were being carried out 19-23 October. According to the commander in chief, it is also possible that submarine 137 was making preparations for the landing of equipment or personnel on sensitive islands. The commander in chief's final conclusion is that the 137 carried out a planned intrusion into Gaasefuaerden and ran aground attempting a rapid and powerful turning maneuver executed too late, with a probability bordering on certainty the 137 had nuclear warheads in several of its torpedo tubes. The commander in chief is unable to find any other explanation for the presence of uranium-238.

TRADE UNION LEADERS TO MEET POLISH AMBASSADOR

[John Richards report]

[Text] Mr Len Murray, general secretary of the Trades Union Congress, will lead a deputation from the TUC international committee to the Polish Embassy in London today to meet Mr Stanislaw Staniszewski, the new Polish ambassador. The British Trade Union leaders will demand to know the number of prisoners held in the current crisis and their identities and whereabouts. They will ask particularly about the whereabouts of Mr Lech Walesa, the Solidarity leader. Other queries will be: "What charges are the prisoners likely to face?" And "What is the position of their families?"

The TUC delegation will include Mr Thomas Jackson, chairman of the international committee, Mr Moss Evans, Mr Clive Jenkins, Mr Frank Chapple and Mr Raymond Buckton. The new ambassador arrived in Britain three days ago. An embassy spokesman would not comment on the TUC visit. He said: "There is no reason for everybody to know about every meeting which takes place at the embassy."

In a strongly-worded statement, the TUC General Council reaffirmed yesterday its continuing support for Solidarity, its leaders and its members "who are faced with brutal suppression by the Polish military authorities." The TUC said it was convinced that independent trade unionism in Poland would survive and reemerge, and that the critical and deep-rooted economic and social problems of the country could only begin to be tackled when trade unionists were released and dialogue recommenced with a civilian government. The delegation would make clear to the ambassador "their revulsion at the internment of trade union representatives and the killing of working people by the police."

"Nothing can justify these acts of repression," said the statement. "The General Council will ask the ambassador to convey to the military authorities the demand of all British working people that the imprisoned trade unionists should be released and martial law lifted."

Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, was reported to have responded sympathetically to the TUC's calls that financial assistance would be linked with the release of trade unionists and for food and medical supplies to continue to be provided to people in need in Poland. The TUC has sent 5,000 pounds for medical supplies to be donated to the Polish medical bank, an off-shoot of Solidarity, "through reliable channels not associated with the Polish authorities." Telegrams have also been sent to East European trade union centres urging them to use their influence with their governments to have trade union freedoms restored and Polish trade unionists released. TUC affiliated unions are being asked to make similar approaches to their counterparts in East Europe.

Mr Murray is hoping to join a European TUC fact-finding mission to Poland as soon as visas are available. He said last night: "We are under the same dilemma as our own government when it comes to knowing what form of pressure can be used on the Polish authorities. We are not going to the ambassador in a threatening mood or waving big sticks. We are going to tell him very firmly of the utter condemnation of the British trade union movement of what is happening in Poland." Mr Murray has called the meeting a "make or break" move in relations between British and East European unions.

DAILY TELEGRAPH ON POLAND'S FINANCIAL PROBLEM

PM831307 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 23 Dec 81 p 10

[Editorial: "Polish Debt"]

[Text] The events in Poland of the last few days are, above all, a human tragedy on a vast scale. To be talking about the balance sheets of Western banks at a time when Poles are once again being subjected to government terror seems either callous or myopic. But for all that, the financial problem Poland represents demands our fullest attention. The danger of a Polish default on its mountainous debt to the West has multiplied since General Jaruzelski took the decision to make war on his own countrymen ten days ago. That is an outcome which could have dire consequences for our increasingly fragile financial system.

The precariousness of the situation makes it difficult for the West to take the absolute moral line which most individuals would like. There is a very strong temptation to tell the banks which lent money so improvidently in the mid and late 1970s that they deserve everything that is coming to them. Likewise, it would be splendid to tell the Russians that if they wish to rule their unhappy empire with an iron fist, they must pay the price. Whether such an emotional spasm would be in either the interests of the Poles or ourselves is another matter.

While it is true that the 17,000 million dollars of Polish commerical debt (a further 11,000 million dollars is owned directly to Western governments) is spread between 460 banks and at least 10 countries, nobody can be really sure what would happen if even one of those banks declared Poland in default. Because of "cross-default clauses" in loan agreements, all the other banks would swiftly have to follow suit. Although the balance sheets of the banks might just sustain that shock, though not without some serious casualties in West Germany, bankers are appalled at the effect it might have on other heavily indebted countries who might also be tempted to default. Even since the first OPEC surpluses began to mount up eight years ago, the world has been floating on a sea of debt. An accidental Polish default would be the equivalent of somebody opening a stopcock.

The best course of action open to the West is to begin to make contingency plans for dealing with a default if and when one comes to ensure that the ensuing damage would be limited. That may involve a degree of bailing out of banks which deserve to sink. So be it. At the same time, negotiations with the Poles on rescheduling the debts should continue, but with very much greater toughness over the conditions the Poles must observe. The key to whether the West should prevent a Polish default is the restoration of the reform movement. Further aid to a Polish Government which had crushed Solidarity and returned to its old Stalinist ways would be both stupid and wrong.

PAPANDREOU'S OFFICIAL VISIT POSTPONED TO 27 FEB

NC241158 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 24 Dec 81

[Text] According to an official announcement, following consultations between Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and President Kiprianou, it has been decided to postpone Mr Papandreou's official visit to Cyprus, which was scheduled to begin on 9 January. According to the announcement, the visit will take place on 27 February - 1 March. This is due to developments in Europe which make Mr Papandreou's presence in Athens necessary during the coming weeks.

Daily on Reasons

[Excerpts] It was announced simultaneously in Nicosia and Athens yesterday that Prime Minister Papandreou's official visit to Cyprus has been postponed until 27 February.

Authoritative political observers have expressed the view that one of the main reasons for the postponement of the visit is the tension in Greek-Turkish relations, which Ankara is systematically cultivating with statements by Turkish officials and military officers.

According to the press, the Greek Government made it clear both to NATO and the EC that it did not intend to remain indifferent if Turkish threats are implemented in either Cyprus or the Aegean. The same observers maintained that Ankara's provocative stand is aimed at improving its negotiating stand rather than at engaging in any military adventure in either the Aegean or Cyprus.

With regard to the report that Ankara will urge the Turkish Cypriots to declare a Turkish Cypriot state on the island, the same observers said that such a development is not now envisaged. Ankara has nothing to gain from this action; on the contrary, this would create new problems for it and many headaches internationally. The observers stressed that such an action would mean the nullifying of the process of the intercommunal talks, something that would expose Turkey both in the United Nations and internationally, and would burn every bridge to a peaceful and honorable solution to the Cyprus issue.

Other reasons that compelled the postponement of Mr Papandreou's visit to Cyprus are the developments in Poland, the Middle East situation, which is continuously deteriorating, and the tension in U.S.-Libyan relations.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS DENY NEW TRAVEL RESTRICTIONS

TA250930 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 25 Dec 81

[Text] Reports to the effect that the TFSC is not permitting Greek Cypriot students to visit their relatives in the Karpas region have been denied. In a statement today, the Foreign Ministry spokesman described the reports as Greek Cypriot propaganda. He said: Greek Cypriot students can visit all their relatives in the Karpas region. It is the Greek Cypriot administration that is preventing these visits because it does not allow the students to fill in the entrance forms that are part of the procedures required to enter our region, whereas many visitors arriving from London and other places enter our region by abiding by these procedures.

Furthermore, every year and every holiday the children and relatives of Maronites enter our region under these procedures and spend the holidays in the federated state. When the obstacles created by the Greek Cypriot administration -- only for the purpose of propaganda -- are lifted, these students can visit their relatives in the Karpas region.

GOVERNMENT MEETING EXAMINES TURKISH INTENTIONS

NC251030 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 24 Dec 81 p 1

[Text] Greek-Turkish relations (as they exist following the latest Turkish provocations) and Greek defense policy (in connection with Greece's economic expansion) are being examined this morning at a meeting of the Government Council for Foreign Defense Issues [KISEA]. Also participating in today's session, held under the presidency of Prime Minister Papandreou, are Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos, Minister to the Prime Minister Koutsoyiorgas, Public Order Minister Skoularikis, Deputy Foreign Ministers Papoulias and Fotilas, Deputy Ministers of National Defense Dhrosoyiannis and Petsos, the prime minister's diplomatic adviser, Makheritsas and other officials.

The main objective of the meeting is to examine Greek-Turkish relations following recent statements by Turkish Prime Minster Ulusu and to weigh existing information on various Turkish movements which has been pinpointed by the Greek side.

Besides the already known strengthening of the Turkish occupation forces in Cyprus, it appears that certain efforts by Ankara to create a "minority problem" in Thrace have also been spotted. The Turkish Government is also aiming at strengthening the Aegean troops, according to "information" which it has permitted to leak.

Existing clear indications indicate that a "war of nerves" rather than substantive activities is being incited. This is because:

--Ankara has no real reason to strengthen its occupation troops in Cyprus because it could "if need be" quickly move men and materiel.

--The movement of Aegean troops is being substantially talked about instead of being surrounded by secrecy, as it would have been had there been a real reason. [as published]

Turkey always incited the "minority issue" when it is striving to create tension in its relations with Greece.

OIL, TRADE AGREEMENTS SET WITH ARAB STATES

NC261319 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 26 Dec 81

[Text] The Greek-Iraqi agreement on the supply of Iraqi oil will be signed in Baghdad. The agreement will be signed by Deputy Commerce Minister Papaspirou who will leave for Baghdad this afternoon.

The deputy commerce minister yesterday returned from Damascus where he had signed another oil agreement with the Syrian minister. In Damascus Mr Papaspirou also held talks on the development of Greek-Syrian trade relations. At the talks, it was decided to form a mixed Greek-Syrian interministerial committee to undertake the development of trade exchanges between the two countries. Moreover, it was also agreed that Greece will participate in the Damascus trade fair to be held by the end of May.

Mr Papaspirou has also visited Amman, where he held talks with the Jordanian commerce minister on the development of bilateral trade relations. It has been decided that a new protocol will be signed in May.

COUP WARNING DELAYS PAPANDREOU VISIT TO CYPRUS

NC281033 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 26 Dec 81 pp 1, 11

[Text] Nicosia (HURRIYET)--The Greek secret service and their colleagues in Cyprus have discovered that a coup was to be staged in Greece and an attempt made on Papandreou's life on 9 January, the date he planned to visit Cyprus after first having signed a decree removing the chief of the General Staff and the armed forces commanders from service. With this warning, Prime Minister Papandreou informed Kiprianou officially the other night that he had postponed his visit to Cyprus. Papandreou told Kiprianou that he had to postpone his visit until 27 February because of "the latest political developments in Europe."

Forty-eight hours before the announcement of Papandreou's decision to postpone his visit to Cyprus, the Greek National Guard was put on alert after a warning from the intelligence service. Another reason for these special measures is that Greek Cypriot Communist Party Secretary General Papaioannou accused Papandreou of "plunging into adventures," adding that the policy he is pursuing will inflict new hardships on the Greek Cypriot community and push it into new traps.

However, it is not really the communists that worry the Greek secret service so much as the terrorist organization known as EOKA-C, which has proclaimed Papandreou a "traitor." It has been ascertained that "the plot" on Papandreou's life was planned by members of the fanatic rightest organization EOKA and not by the communists.

ANKARA DENIES CONDONING ANTI-IRANIAN ACTIVITIES

TA251627 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1600 GMT 25 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, (?25) Dec (AA)--The Foreign Ministry has formally denied reports appearing in the foreign, particularly the London press, alleging that military units were being formed in eastern Turkey by certain opponents of the Iranian revolution and that these units aimed at restoring the monarchy in Iran. Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman said "these allegations, entirely irrational and groundless," were "intended to cast doubt on friendly and good-neighborly relations maintained with Iran" and were "categorically false."

COURT OVERTURNS ECEVIT 4-MONTH PRISON SENTENCE

[Text] Ankara, 25 Dec (AFP)--The Turkish military appeal court has overturned former social-democratic Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit's four-month jail sentence for violating a decree banning all political activity in the country, a source close to Mr Ecevit said today. The former Republican Party leader began serving his sentence in Ankara's central jail on December 3, a month after sentence was passed, but is expected to be released shortly.

The capital's public prosecutor protested to the Defence Ministry at the severity of Mr Ecevit's sentence, and the appeal court only agreed to review the case at the request of the ministry. This course was the only one open to the former prime minister, as a State Council decree forbids appeal in military courts for sentences under three years.

Mr Ecevit's lawyer, Sahin Mengu, said he did not yet know if the appeal court had quashed the sentence, meaning the former premier would be freed immediately, or if it had simply reduced it. But he and Mr Ecevit's other representatives told the press they believed the decision modified, while basically approving, the ruling of the military court. They said that the most likely outcome was that, with routine remission for good conduct, Mr Ecevit would now spend only 60 days in jail.

GENSCHER WARNS BOTH EAST AND WEST ON POLAND

DW281523 Stuttgart Sueddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1740 GMT 27 Dec 81

[Correspondent Krems interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; date and place not given — recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] The greatest international risk at the moment is surely the situation in Poland. How do you assess this situation at this time, and what do you have to say about the obvious differences of opinion in the West, between the United States and the Europeans, about the reaction to the development in Poland?

[Answer] We as Germans probably sympathize with particular empathy with the Polish people, which is understandable. We are linked with the Polish people through a history full of changes, a history which after World War II has been characterized by the efforts for reconciliation, a harmonization of interests, and the rediscovery of the common interests between Germans and Poles. For this reason we are particularly interested in seeing that the course of reform and renewal in the People's Republic of Poland can be continued. It is with concern that we have been watching developments since 13 December, because many hopes which the people in Poland had attached to the process of renewal and reform seem to have been disappointed for the time being.

Hence, it is all the more important for the Polish leadership which has committed itself, and once again so after 13 December, to be aware of the responsibility it is bearing for making a continuation of this course possible, meaning the course of renewal and reform. Visible signals to this end are due now, namely, the lifting of martial law, the release of the interned people, so that the process of dialogue may continue, this being the dialogue between the political forces, the dialogue of the political forces with the social forces, the latter being the Catholic church but also the independent trade union Solidarity.

I am firmly convinced that it is not yet too late for that, but that the leadership in Poland must be aware that it must very soon and very quickly give some positive signal to this effect. And all other states, in East and West alike, must resist the temptation to intrude in Poland's internal affairs. Nobody has any right to meddle in these internal affairs. All we can do is appeal to the Soviet Union to not hinder Poland on its course of renewal and reform in any way. I believe that people in Moscow must realize what responsibility the Soviet leadership, too, bears at this time for making it possible for Poland to pursue its course and for preventing these developments from affecting East-West relations.

[Question] You appeal to the Soviet Union. Should you not also appeal to the United States to desist from the strategy of reacting to the developments in Poland with restrictions, with sanctions?

[Answer] The United States has expectations that the process of renewal and reform can be continued. It has not made any attempt to tell the Polish people what to do and what this course should be like. As Europeans and European partners we maintain a close exchange of views with the United States, and jointly we are trying to do everything to prevent, above all, any intervention from outside in the Polish affairs.

[Question] This means you, the Federal Government and the European Community advocate the view that the foodstuffs aid, the humanitarian assistance to Poland at least should be continued?

[Answer] It is bad enough what the people in Poland must suffer under the events. If a lack or partial lack of foodstuffs supplies even adds to the distress of their existence, it is my opinion that this would be so bad that nobody could bear the responsibility for it. This is why we decided to continue the foodstuffs aid as promised. The German Bundestag also adopted a resolution to this effect by a nearly unanimous vote.

Since we consider this to be such an important problem which involves Poland within the East-West relationship, the Federal Government has made it absolutely clear that we will naturally consult the pertinent Bundestag committees before we make any decisions concerning further aid measures.

Together with our partners we, as the Federal Republic of Germany, pursue the goal to achieve intensified cooperation between East and West in Europe on different levels. Let me just recall that NATO at its December meeting submitted a broad offer on negotiations to the Soviet Union by its signal at Brussels. We repeated that the renunciation of medium-range weapons in the West and the East is our goal. We said that we desire a European disarmament conference with confidence building measures for all of Europe. We decided in favor of the continuation of the CSCE session in Madrid even though there were many voices from among the neutrals that the conference should be interrupted for several months.

We are for a revitalization of the troop reduction negotiations in Vienna, and we advocate the view that the two great powers should open negotiations on the intercontinental strategic weapons at the beginning of the year, pursuing not only their limitation but also, as suggested by the United States, their reduction. Basically all these are hopeful beginnings. And for heaven's sake they must not be burdened by a worsening of the East-West climate.

Remember, please, the chancellor's visit to the GDR which had been undertaken under circumstances that definitely were not simple, yet which was clearly aimed at making our German contribution toward East-West understanding. We are living here on the highly armed continent of Europe. It must be our goal to create on a long-term basis a peace order for all of Europe in which ideological antagonisms, too, must not be allowed to impede cooperation in the long-run. All this requires that the peoples be allowed to pursue their course and that the process of renewal and reform in Poland must not be interrupted. What I mean to say by this is that historic decisions are being made for Poland.

The Polish development, however, also is of historical significance for European development. And we as Germans here in the Federal Republic of Germany have always seen our East-West policy, our inter-German policy, as a European policy of peace, as our contribution toward safeguarding cooperation and peace in Europe, hence, our urgent appeal to the responsible people in Warsaw and Moscow to do everything to prevent this process from being interrupted.

[Question] You suggested last week that the two German states, meaning the Federal Republic and the GDR, should introduce joint disarmament proposals and arms limitation proposals in the United Nations. Could you expand a bit on this? What, specifically, should happen?

[Answer] We are affiliated with different pact systems, and nobody will expect the GDR to take our position from the outset, as it were. Yet, we know that all disarmament negotiations are promising. These include the absolute revelations of the arms efforts -- we report our arms expenditures to the register kept by the United Nations. The Warsaw Pact states do not do it yet. In this respect a joint German-German appeal to all member states of the two alliances to have their arms expenditures registered with the United Nations each year could well be an important step.

Disarmament negotiations require a process of verification. It is possible to set up some rules to that effect. This might be a German-German project. If disarmament negotiations are to overcome distrust and create confidence, then they must be verifiable. Setting up rules to this end might be a German-German project. We would like to win the GDR over to this idea.

REGRETS EXPRESSED ON FAILURE OF EC MEETING

LD281744 Hamburg DPA in German 1422 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 28 Dec (DPA) -- Differences over the right policy on Poland have apparently prevented the proposed meeting of EC foreign ministers.

Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher regrets that the foreign ministers will not meet, a meeting he considered "right and requisite," the spokesman of the German Foreign Office told a press conference in Bonn today.

Instead of the foreign ministers, the political directors (department heads) of the foreign ministries, of the 10 EC countries will meet in London on Wednesday for a joint assessment of the Polish situation. The Federal Government at present refuses to consider the economic sanctions announced by U.S. President Ronald Reagan last Wednesday. Government Spokesman Becker pointed out that the process of close consultations between the Western allies was still going on.

The Federal Government's careful restraint in regard to Poland has led to distinct differences of opinion with Washington in the last few days. The U.S. press has called the German reticence 'foolish.' According to the London SUNDAY TIMES, U.S. Government quarters have expressed concern over the German stand. In contrast to Bonn, Paris and London have expressed understanding for the U.S. Government's sanctions.

Bonn's policy is based on the view that sanctions would needlessly aggravate the Polish crisis whose outcome is still quite open. Government Spokesman Becker referred to the extended talks Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is planning to hold with Reagan and Secretary Alexander Haig in Washington on 5 January. They are to discuss in detail the situation in Poland and the most appropriate Western policy.

WISCHNEWSKI RECEIVES POLISH CHARGE D'AFFAIRES

[Text] Bonn/Paris, 28 Dec (DPA) -- SPD Vice Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski will attend a Socialist International meeting on events in Poland in Paris on 29 December. SPD Executive spokesman Wolfgang Clement made this announcement, and added that Wischnewski received the Polish charge d'affaires to the FRG for an extended talk today in Bonn. According to Clement, Wischnewski said that it is crucial to adopt an attitude which will benefit the vital interests of the Polish people including the early ending of the state of martial law and the release of internees. Wischnewski affirmed that the European Community must adhere to this policy vis-a-vis Polish events.

The French Socialists favor "active solidarity with the Polish people" and the use of Poland's financial and economic dependence on the West as a means of applying pressure. They feel that a statement issued by SPD Chairman Willy Brandt on behalf of the Socialist International after the imposition of martial law in Poland was too feeble and, together with the Italian and Swedish socialists, criticized it sharply. In the statement, Brandt expressed the socialist hope that the Poles will be able to solve their problems without external interference and without a bloodbath. Lionel Jospin, first secretary of the French Socialist Party, regretted the publication of this statement without prior discussion.

CDU DEPUTY CALLS FOR SANCTIONS AGAINST POLAND

LD281824 Hamburg DPA in German 1805 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Text] Hamburg, 28 Dec (DPA) -- CDU Deputy Olaf von Wrangel has called on the Federal Government to take a concrete lead in regard to Poland. In an article for BERGEDORFER ZEITUNG (2 January issue), published in Hamburg, Wrangel, who is vice chairman of the Bundestag committee on inter-German affairs, calls for sanctions to be agreed with NATO and the European Community. In his view, the Bonn government should take a lead in convening the signatory states of the Helsinki Final Act for a discussion of the Polish situation. The neutral states should be given a prominent role. Together with its allies the Federal Government should press for a condemnation of the events in Poland. An edited version of the article was sent to DPA.

PRESS COMMENTS ON ASPECTS OF POLISH CRISIS

'Muscle-Flexing Show'

DW290857 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 28 Dec 81 p 3

[Commentary signed HHG: "The Better Way of Helping"]

[Text] Outrage at the Polish generals is one thing, political reaction is another. The people in the tormented country should not suffer from Western countermeasures; yet who will probably have to make do without fish if the Polish fishing fleet brings home less fish in the future because of the U.S. embargo? This kind of sanction may be good for a muscle-flexing show, but experience teaches that such sanctions affect the wrong people or completely fail. Since Hungary it has definitely been known -- and despite all the big words, also accepted by the United States -- that the possibilities of exerting influence during rumblings in the Eastern camp are very limited if the big clash is to be avoided. The situation is no different this time.

Just the same, the world need not remain idle. The rulers over there, who claim to represent the progressive part of mankind with their system, are highly sensitive to charges of acting inhumanly even though they constantly try to protect their thin skin with a great deal of propaganda leather. The West will be unable to eliminate the military junta as long as Warsaw and Moscow believe this junta is, in contrast, necessary. What is more likely to reap success is perhaps pressure on the generals to mitigate their so-called martial law. They claim, for example, that acceptable conditions exist in the detention camps. International commissions should be allowed to see on the spot whether this is really true. Doubts exist in that respect. In this point the Polish military people seem to be amenable. This probably will help the Poles more than temporarily prohibiting some functionaries to fly to the United States on the Polish airline.

'Will the West Never Learn?'

[Johann Georg Reissmueller editorial: "The West Does Not Learn Anything"]

[Text] The West fails whenever the Soviet Union crushes a nation by an act of force. In 1956 when the Red Army was crushing the Hungarian uprising, the West sent over slogans to hold out and did nothing; it was fully preoccupied with its own affairs, above all with the Suez adventure and its consequences. Twelve years later the United States let Brezhnev understand that it would keep quiet in case he might be reaching out for Czechoslovakia. Brezhnev would have anticipated this anyway but then he must have felt really encouraged to wage an invasion. Another 11 years later the West responded to the Soviet onslaught on Afghanistan with the floor show-styled announcement that one would have to think it over seriously as to whether "detente" would be able to withstand another such blow. And now two years later when party General Jaruzelski suppresses his people by Soviet order the West reacts by setting in motion an excellently organized bureaucratic no-load operation.

Strong words do not benefit the Poles at all, the Bonn leadership tells the people. This is a diversionary maneuver. It is supposed to make people forget that what is needed above all is deeds. But there will be none. NATO is holding one meeting after the other with the result that no agreement is being reached as to whether it has decided on anything at all for this (particular) case -- meaning that the Polish Army is being compelled by Moscow to see for itself that the Soviet order in Poland is restored. Granted, plans have been discussed but it turns out now that during all this time one had palavered behind unlocked back doors. NATO has had almost one and a half years for planning; now it is rather late for doing this.

NATO also cannot make up its mind -- plan or no plan -- as to what must be done now. Though the United States is ready to make Moscow pay a price for the invasion of Poland committed with its indirect blessing the Europeans are doing nothing, and among them it is the Germans, above all, who refrain from doing anything. Bonn rejects everything the United States proposes. Likewise the Germans do not make any serious counterproposals. From Bonn -- while the government expresses concern; and watches the situation attentively waiting to see whether or not and how ... -- parlysis is spreading in Europe and beyond. In a statement on behalf of the Socialist International Willy Brandt, its German chairman, takes notice of Jaruzelski's promise to continue the reform course and he apparently does not see anything grotesque in the fact that the supreme commander was speaking of the reform course at the very time when his militia troops were swarming out to arrest thousands of people and to put them into camps. The Soviet Union is not mentioned in Brandt's statement -- as though it had nothing to do with the matter.

The Atlantic alliance cannot agree on anything and the allies hurriedly arrived at the conclusion to persist in verbose idleness individually too. Big words are said nevertheless, as for instance in parliamentary resolutions -- and in fact they do not benefit the Poles at all because they discernibly gloss over (or may be even to manifest in a smart manner) the determination for not acting. This is a repetition of the depressing spectacle presented by the Western countries after the occupation of Afghanistan. At the time, Bonn's Foreign Minister Genscher expressed the view that the West should place its hopes in the Third World. We know how much has come of it for Afghanistan. He now has said that an important opportunity to energetically raise demands for Poland vis-a-vis the Soviet camp had been during the talk he held with Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Chnoupek after Jaruzelski's blow. This is Bonn's idea of "energy" vis-a-vis Moscow.

After three and a half decades full of bitter experiences the West does not know yet what matters in dealing with the Soviet power: steadfastness, vigilance and utmost soberness. The West must prepare in time its reaction to foreseeable Soviet moves. It must not give way to the spur of the moment (which by the way is usually missing), as is shown in the cases of Afghanistan and Poland. The West must also learn to press hard on the Soviet Union with unwavering persistence, if need be; this is what is lacking in the case of Afghanistan. The West at long last must get rid of its hidden longing for letting itself be deceived by the Soviet Union. How do Western statesmen actually know that the Red Army is not participating in the oppression in Poland?

Being inattentive at all, any leaving of things to their own momentum, any false reaction and any sliding into sentimental approaches -- as well meant as it may be -- in dealing with the Soviet power can cost it dearly. In retrospect, it appears as a mistake that Federal Chancellor Schmidt conceded to Honecker's urging for a meeting prior to mid-December -- at a time when something dramatic was about to happen in Poland. Will it benefit him, will it benefit us that he in the cathedral of Guestrow allowed himself to be tempted by saying that Honecker, the Marxist, and Schmidt, the Christian, are not that far away from one another? And what was the unbelievable report supposed to mean that Honecker was as taken aback as he himself, Schmidt, was about the news from Poland? These are mistakes on a small scale. But one is added to the other and as soon as there are enough together then the policy will be wrong. Will the West never learn what Soviet-Leninism means?

Yalta in Disarray

[Herbert Kremp editorial: "Yalta in Erosion"]

[Text] The Polish crisis has led to an exchange of frosty signals between the world powers. We would not be taking a risk to speak of a low in relations. In the Western states with their tradition of freedom, the Soviet initiated crushing of the Polish reform movement elicits memories of the causes of World War II.

The obligation toward that country -- which is suffering the most among all civilized nations because of its central position -- is felt more strongly in the West than in Germany, whose communist-ruled part belongs to the "reich executors" of 1981.

The U.S. President is in agreement with the British and the French that the crisis must not be taken as an "internal affair of Poland." This is how it is defined by the Soviets. Such an approach reduces the imperial dimension, which it in fact is assumed to have, and is intended to block the view from the heap of ruins which the communist parties of the East European countries, subjugated after the war, have become. One of the most important structural elements of the Yalta policy, as understood by Stalin, finds itself in utter disarray. The military dictatorship marks a historic stage: domination after the utopia has failed.

In the face of these overwhelming realities the freedom-minded democracies are reacting determinedly as well as moderately. Washington has come to realize that after two years of unsuccessful war in Afghanistan and after the bankruptcy in Poland (and other countries of East Europe) the Soviet Union is sliding into a vehement militarization of its foreign policy. A power of this disposition is not free in its decisions, as sovereign as it may pretend to be. It has lost any radiating and persuasive power, as this is proved not lastly by its east Asian policy toward China and Japan. The sole still existing argument is its military power.

This power must be taken as seriously as it is. The Polish crisis of tension will continue in various forms and trigger corresponding responses of violence. Everywhere in East Europe the economic results are deteriorating to the same degree as the communist system's credibility. Performance cannot be extorted from these pretentious peoples. Tanks and guns cannot produce. The financing of their production no longer belongs to the profitable goals of Western investment policy, not because one really has come to realize that loans in this field would bypass agriculture and consumer goods industries and the infrastructure would be channeled unilaterally into the military-heavy industrial complex, but because loans would be lost, some of them today and others tomorrow.

In view of the fact that border occurences increase rather than dampen Soviet aggressiveness, U.S. policy would be well advised to proceed with the process of the Geneva negotiations on arms limitation and at the same time to restore the equality in arms. This is the core, the dual core so to speak, of the message sent by President Reagan. Nobody should expect something different or something "stronger." No alternative must be developed for the order of Yalta at a time when this order starts to dissolve itself from within on the Soviet side. For the time being the Soviet Union must be prevented from creating new fields of glacis in protection against the disintegrating internal order.

But Moscow can be prevented from this only if the extremely threatening situation, which results from the inner weakness and the military strength of the Soviet Union, is being responded to with defense readiness rather than readiness to surrender. The state of peace no longer can be sought at a low price. Brezhnev's attempt at turning the system's inner weakness into an outward success through large-scale detente gestures, Helsinki rhetoric and peace diplomacy, has failed, perhaps not everywhere in the neighboring countries, in West Europe above all, but simply in the Soviet Union itself, where detente has had a paralyzing effect contrary to the initiator's plans.

Brezhnev may still place certain, though not very great, hopes in the Federal Republic of Germany. Ever since the crisis of tension in Poland, Bonn seems frozen. A number of important politicians demostratively went on a "winter journey." This is expressive of an inclination toward escaping reality in the moment of its brightness. The gesture of getting out is not understood everywhere. For the first time since the times of Konrad Adenauer the shadow of isolation is looming over Bonn. Historically this is not necessary but it is well-deserved.

CHEYSSON INTERVIEWED ON MIDEAST PROBLEMS

NC251117 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1048 GMT 25 Dec 81

[Text] Beirut, 25 Dec (MENA) -- External relations Minister Claude Cheysson has praised his country's relations with Egypt, stressing that the relations between the two countries are very good and that all efforts must be exerted to help the Egyptians and give Egypt everything it needs. Cheysson said that within this framework, France endorses the decision to participate in the international forces in the Sinai after the evacuation of the Israeli forces.

In an interview published by the Lebanese paper AS-SAFIR today, Cheysson expresses his belief that it is not possible to establish any peace in the Middle East without the Palestinians, Egyptians and Syrians. Therefore, he added, France must have relations with all if we are interested in the question of peace. Cheysson stresses that there will be no peace in the Middle East if the Arab stand is not unified. He expresses his belief that the Arabs must speak about the main issues, because there can be no peace if any of the Arab countries is ignored.

Cheysson expressed his regret over the fact that Security Council resolution 425 on south Lebanon has not been implemented. He said that this decision is not being fully implemented and that the United Nations is to blame. He added that what is important to France is that every Arab land and people should be under Arab control. Questioned about France's readiness to sell arms to Israel, the minister said: "This is absolutely out of question."

Speaking of France's relations with the PLO, Cheysson said: We have many contacts with the PLO, and we have met with many of its leaders, including PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat and PLO political department chief Faruq Qaddumi. We will have other meetings. On a possible visit by 'Arafat to Paris, Cheysson said: This question is not a subject of discussion now, because nobody has raised it. Cheysson explained that despite the fact that Greece has recognized the PLO as a state, there is no justification for demanding France to recognize the PLO as a state, because Greece and France have different views on the theory of international law.

ROCARD ARGUES NEED TO SPEAK OUT ON POLAND

[Text] At the end of a tour devoted to employment, Minister of Planning and Land Development Michel Rocard stated in Poitiers 18 December: "The events of the past few days are not an exclusively internal Polish affair, certainly not a French affair -- as the opposition is trying to suggest, although long-standing practice of selective indignation should inspire it with greater restraint; it is an internal affair for the universal conscience because the most basic freedoms are at stake. Indeed what picture would be presented if we were to accept, to any extent, a situation in which the military sit round the cabinet table while trade unionists are thrown into prison?"

"What Base Confusion"

Mr Rocard, speaking in the presence of Mr Marcel Rigout, minister of professional training and a PCF member, added: "France should make its voice heard because its political majority is a Socialist one. Those who are carrying out internal political maneuvers at the expense of the Polish people are now saying that they 'reject anything related to socialism.' What base confusion! Socialism in Paris -- who would dare to doubt it? -- has nothing in common with Warsaw's socialism any more than those who speak of freedom in Paris dare -- I presume -- to give it the same meaning as it has in Santiago or El Salvador."

"The president has stated that France will give the Polish people its 'material and moral aid.' That pledge concerns all the French people through the moral support which may be given to those fighting to win back their freedom and rights by the determination of a fraternal people whose attachment to freedom and human rights is rooted in history. We must show imagination, responsibility and tenacity in expressing that aid. This flame which will not be extinguished has a name: Solidarity," he concluded.

POLISH SAILORS REQUEST POLITICAL ASYLUM

NC281754 Paris AFP in English 1736 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Text] St Brieuc, 28 Dec (AFP) -- Three Polish sailors, including an officer, went ashore during a stopover at this Brittany port to request political asylum in France, reliable sources here said today. The sailors from the Polish freighter Swietlik, were granted three-month safe conduct passes, the sources said. The Swietlik, which unloaded its cargo of steel ballbearings here, left its home port of Kolobrzeg with a 17-man crew before the December 13 imposition of martial law in Poland.

FORMER PACIFIC NUCLEAR TEST SITE TO REOPEN

[Text] Paris, 28 Dec (AFP) -- France plans to "reactivate" its nuclear test site at the Fangataufa Atoll for underground blasts more powerful than those carried out at nearby Mururoa, the scene of recent controversy over possible radioactive leakage into South Pacific waters. Officials at the French Pacific Experimentation Center (PEC) on Mururoa have stressed that Fangataufa will not replace Mururoa, but serve for testing such charges as the multiple warheads used on French M-4 missiles.

But the officials declined to comment on how soon Fangataufa would be ready for the new test program. Last week, PEC chief Adm Jacques Choupin said that major construction work was necessary to provide access to the lagoon on Fangatuafa, a tiny coral reef lying 1,200 km (720 miles) southeast of Tahiti. Like Mururoa, the Fangataufa Atoll sits stop a volcanic base some 15 million years old. Used in August 1968 for the French first test of a [word indistinct] nuclear warhead and in June 1975 for the first French underground nuclear balst, Fangataufa was abandoned in favor of Mururoa in late 1975.

French plans to reutilize the Fangataufa test site were announced amid controversy stemming from a Paris newspaper report last month that tests on Mururoa were producing wide cracks in the atoll and causing it to sink. Speaking to journalists last week, Adm Choupin acknowledged that radioactivity had veen released from an underground wastepile when a fierce storm lashed Mururoa last March, but said there was no resulting contamination.

FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS IN DOZIER KIDNAPPING CASE

Beirut Telephone Call

AU290845 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 29 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Rome, 29 Dec (ANSA) -- A telephone call to the ANSA news agency's office in Beirut yesterday allegedly from an urban guerrilla group linked to the Red Brigades unit holding U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier found no response anywhere in Italy by the early hours of this morning despite a promise that one of conditions for Dozier's release would be published somewhere in the country after midnight local time (2300 GMT).

The call, the second of its kind signed by the self-styled "Baader-Meinhof Red Brigades" in Beirut and treated with as much scepticism by investigators as the first, laid down three conditions for Dozier's release, but only disclosed the second two. According to the anonymous caller, the first would be published in Italy after midnight local. The second was that three detained urban guerrillas named Ferrari, Amico and Piti (Beti) should be released from Italian jails and consigned safely in Beirut. The third laid down that the Italian magistrates should provide the news agencies, for immediate publication, their dossier on the disappearance of the imam of Lebanon's Shi'ite Muslims Musa as-Sadr, who was last heard from in Tripoli at the end of August 1978.

Yesterday's phone-call to ANSA in Beirut left the investigators as preplexed as the first, which was made shortly after Dozier's kidnapping in Verona on December 17 and said his body would be found somewhere in the Italian countryside later. On both occasions, one of the factors arousing police scepticism was the signature of the "Baader-Meinhof Red Brigades." The "Baader-Meinhof gang" was the name coined by the West German press for the Rote Armee Fraktion, the Red Brigades' West German equivalent founded in the early seventies by Andreas Baader and Ulrike Meinhof.

According to first hypotheses advanced by the police, the urban guerrillas whose liberation was demanded could be Flavio Amico and Paolo Maurizio Ferrari, while the third, Beti or Piti, is not on the police files.

In order to improve coordination of the investigations into the Dozier kidnapping, Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni yesterday asked Prefect Gaspare de Francisci to set up a single office for the paramilitary Carabineri, ordinary police and Revenue Guards seeking the second-ranking officer for NATO's surface forces in southern Europe. In other developments, Verona police sources officially denied that a reward of 200 million lire (about 170,000 dollars) has been offered for information on the kidnappers.

Search Continues

The Red Brigades communique, the spokesman added, contains some data on the Italian armed forces. This is information available to the public and can be found in specialized publications, parliamentary acts and in the report issued every year by the London Institute for Strategic Studies. Thus it is impossible to know from the brigades leaflet what, if anything, Dozier may have told his kidnappers about military matters.

Nothing is known about the investigation except that searchers are continuing in an effort to find where the terrorists are holding the general. In particular there have been special searches in the Euganei hills by Carabinieri with the help of helicopters and [word indistinct] units.

Finally, the Verona police headquarters has given no official confirmation of press reports that a reward of hundreds of millions of lira will be given to anyone who can provide information which may prove useful in the search. The head of the Verona police has denied that such a reward has been promised.

As for the telephone call to the ANSA office in Beirut, it is almost certainly the work of a pathological liar. But among the conditions for Dozier's release is the release from prison of some Red Brigades members, and it has been ascertained that the names given by the self-styled Baader-Meinhof Red Brigades representative really exist and that among them there is Amico, the typographer who was arrested in Milan on 22 December with two other presumed members of the Walter Alasia Column.

Demand Release of Three

[Excerpt] Rome, 28 Dec (AFP) -- An anonymous telephone call to the Beirut office of the Italian news agency ANSA today demanded release of three terrorists from Italian prisons in return for the liberation of kidnapped U.S. General James Lee Dozier, it was reported here. Authorities here expressed scepticism over the authenticity of the call, the second purportedly from the "Baader-Meinhoff Red Brigades."

It demanded release of three brigade members called "Piti, Amico and Ferrari," and their transfer to Beirut. It also demanded publication of the Italian police file on Musa as-Sadr, spiritual leader of the Lebanese Shi'ites who disappeared between Tripoli and Rome in 1978. An earlier call to ANSA in Beirut mentioned the Musa as-Sadr followers, but spokesmen for the movement later denied any connection with the Red Brigades. Today's caller said a third demand would be communicated shortly before midnight.

In other developments today, sources said three persons arrested by Italian police near the French border on currency charges were carrying Red Brigades documents which could link them to the Dozier kidnapping. Police withheld the names of the three and released no details.

POGGI REPORTS TO POPE ON VISIT TO WARSAW

AU281609 Rome ANSA in English 1517 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Vatican City, 28 Dec (ANSA) -- The pope's special envoy to Poland, Msgr Luigi Poggi, delivered an ample report to Polish Pope John Paul II here today on his mission of consultations with Polish Catholic Church and Government leaders, according to Vatican Press Office Deputy Chief Don Pierfrance Pastore.

During his stay in Warsaw, from December 19-27, Msgr Poggi met with various leaders of the Polish Episcopate, including Polish Primate Josef Glemp, archbishop of Krakow, Franciszek Macharski and secretary of the Polish Episcopal Conference, Msgr Bronislaw Dabrowski. On Christmas Eve, Poggi was also received by Polish head of state, General Jaruzelski and Foreign Affairs Minister Czyrek.

In response to a journalist's question as to whether the Roman Catholic archbishop of Vienna, Cardinal Franz Koenig, had been given a special assignment in relation to monitoring Polish affairs for the Vatican, Pastore said that he did not know of any such plans. Pastore also emphasized that during his two day stay in Vienna on his return from Warsaw, Poggi had been the guest of the papal nuncio to Austria, and not of Cardinal Koenig.

NO PLANNED ATTEMPT ON PAPANDREOU'S LIFE KNOWN

NC281820 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Text] The government spokesman has stated that there are no plans to cancel Prime Minister Papandreou's official visit to Cyprus, which will be held on 27 and 28 February and 1 March. The spokesman denied a press report that Mr Papandreou's visit was postponed because there were reports of an attempt against his life. The report, the spokesman stated, is absolutely unfounded, as are the other allegations that President Kiprianou said something to this effect at the Council of Ministers meeting.

Paper on Postponement

NC281205 Nicosia I DHILINI in Greek 28 Dec 81 pp 1, 8

[Excerpt] Based on specific and indisputable information available to it, I DHILINI is in a position to reveal today why the visit of Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou to Cyprus, scheduled for 7-9 January, was postponed. According to our authoritative information, which can allow no denial, postponement of the visit was first announced by President Kiprianou to members of the government on 24 December during a special meeting of the Ministerial Council.

Specifically, Kiprianou told the council that there was information from Greek mainland sources that an attempt would be made on the life of the Greek prime minister and that for this reason it had been decided to postpone his Cyprus visit, scheduled for 7 January. He avoided, however, providing any further information to his ministers on the entire issue. He also avoided revealing from whom and when the Greek mainland sources received the information on the planned attempt against Papandreou and who asked for a postponement of the visit.

The fact, however, that Kiprianou announced to his ministers the news of the postponement on 24 December -- in other words, one day prior to the official announcement -- leaves no doubt that the decision was made in advance and that the whole matter had already been discussed between Nicosia and Athens. This is also proved by the fact that preparations had already been made to reschedule the visit.

DENKTAS: NEW ATHENS MOVE OPENS WAY FOR ENOSIS

TA281340 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1300 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the reason behind Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou's -- and Greece's -- request for full independence for Cyprus is to eliminate Turkey's guarantee and to open the door to enosis. Noting that the meaning of independence was included in the Akritas plan, Denktas added: Actions against the Turkish Cypriot community between 1963 and 1974 were taken to obtain full independence. The meaning of full independence in the political dictionary entails the elimination of Turkey's guarantee against enosis, giving the authority to the Greek Cypriots -- as though they were the Cypriot people -- to achieve enosis through self-determination that does not recognize the right of the Turkish Cypriots to safeguard the sovereignty of the island and that considers the Turkish Cypriots a minority.

50 FROM TEACHERS UNION SENTENCED TO PRISON TERMS

[Text] Various administrators and members of the Turkish Teachers' Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER] have been sentenced to prison terms ranging from 1 to 9 years. The Ankara Martial Law Command 3d Military Court sentenced 5 of the suspects to 9 years in prison, 31 of them to 8 years, 10 of them to 5 years and 4 of them to 1 year. The court acquitted 12 of the defendants. The court also ruled that the TOB-DER headquarters and all its branches be closed.

The defendants were accused of establishing and administering an association with the goal of securing the sovereignty of a social class over all the other classes and of overthrowing the existing economic and social system. They were also accused of propagandizing with the goal of abolishing civil rights stipulated by the constitution.

[Excerpts] Ankara, 25 Dec (AFP) -- Activities of the union, TOB-DER, had been suspended by the National Security Council after the September 12, 1980 military coup. TOB-DER President Gultekin Gazioglu, in refuge abroad, was earlier stripped of his Turkish citizenship when he failed to heed a request to return and be prosecuted.

KREISKY ON REAGAN FOOD AID PLANS FOR POLAND

AU261554 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1830 GMT 25 Dec 81

[Excerpt] As is known, U.S. President Reagan has said that he will halt economic aid to Poland, but added that from now on U.S. food assistance for Poland will be directed through Austria. In connection with this statement, Chancellor Kreisky said today, in an interview with the Austrian Radio and Television Authority at his holiday resort in Bad Gastein, that so far there are no precise details about this offer. First of all it is not clear whether the United States only wants to send food aid for Polish refugees in Austria, or that the U.S. food shipments should be processed in Austria with Poland as the final destination. Austria is ready to organize such food shipments to Poland for the United States. However, Kreisky said, if the United States only intends to send food aid for Polish refugees in Austria, this is too little. Austria expects the United States to increase the immigration quota of Polish refugees.

CSSR ACTION ON POLAND AID SHIPMENT PROTESTED

AU281335 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 28 December reports on its front page that the first Austrian aid train to Poland with 100 tons of foodstuffs and clothing has already arrived there "despite the scandalous attitude of the CSSR, whose border police refused to let the two Austrian Red Cross officials accompanying the train pass, even though they had visas." The report continues that "Milan Kadnar, CSSR ambassador in Vienna, was summoned to the Foreign Ministry in Vienna where Secretary General Hinteregger lodged a protest in the strongest terms against the turning back of the Red Cross assistants who were accompanying the train and were carrying valid CSSR and Polish visas. He termed the actions of the CSSR border personnel 'an unfriendly act,' which was all the more serious since President Kirchschlaeger had personally assumed patronage of the Austrian national committee."

Vienna KURIER on the same day reports in a front page article that "On Sunday Foreign Minister Pahr stated in a KURIER interview that he 'was seriously considering' a diplomatic escort for every individual transport to Poland: An accompanying Austrian diplomat will ensure that such an incident will not be repeated." The report continues by noting that Pahr regards the incident as a "direct affront against the Federal Government and as a qualified [qualifiziert] unfriendly act against Austria" but that he added that it would not affect further Austrian aid to Poland.

GOVERNMENT DISAGREES WITH U.S. SANCTIONS

LD301234 Hamburg DPA in German 1200 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government does not believe in Soviet "instigation" of martial law in Poland. It will continue to adhere to its policy of strict noninterference in Poland, and with regard to the U.S. sanctions against the Soviet Union, consultations must still be held within the alliance. This was announced by Government Spokesman Kurt Becker to journalists in Bonn today in a statement by the Federal Government on Washington's decisions.

Becker at the same time refuted claims that there is ill feeling between Bonn and Washington on their assessment of the situation in Poland. Bonn is in close contact with the Reagan administration, as well as with the other allies. Although it is true that different assessments have been expressed, the two governments agree that a final evaluation of the events in Poland is not possible at the present time. The government spokesman stated that the difficulty in assessing the situation depends on the question of whether martial law had been imposed autonomously by the Polish Government -- "as we believe" -- or whether the U.S. premise is correct that the Polish Government is not acting on its own responsibility. "We do not share the view that the Soviet Union should be regarded as the instigator of the imposition of martial law," he stressed.

GENSCHER SPEAKS ON FRG, EEC TASKS, POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 29 Dec (DPA) -- Overcoming unemployment, achieving European unity and securing peace are the major tasks for 1982, according to FDP Chairman, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. In a statement published in Bonn today, Genscher stressed that 1982 would be a "fateful year for Europe" with regard to the development of the European Community and East-West relations.

In the FDP leader's view, there is no cause for pessimism, economically speaking. What is needed, however, is realism. The Federal Republic needs a joint effort by all political and social groups and all citizens. "We can only succeed with a pact of economic reason," writes Genscher. As far as the majority of citizens is concerned, the will to perform and a sense of reasponsibility had again assumed first place over thoughts of making demands. All parties and social groups must demonstrate their ability to live up to this reality. Any major national effort now needed must be geared to innovation, investment, competitiveness and jobs. All sides are called upon to renounce ideological blinkers, prestige positions and group egoism.

The EEC would have to prove its ability to act and make decisions in solving its financial problems and creating -- as urged by Genscher -- a European union. The goal is a "powerful European Community, with the United States as an ally and friend linked by joint values." Only in this way would the West European countries be able to create prerequisites ensuring that "non-war, based on deterrence, can be replaced in the long-term by a European peace union based on trust."

Genscher called on the Soviet Union to do its share in this. A lot would depend on the USSR respecting Poland's identity and recognizing its European identity. "The Soviet Union should now fully consider what the almost historic importance its attitude toward Poland has for the future development of the East-West's strict policy of noninterference with indifference, and not misinterpret its restraint as political abstinence."

TALKS ON POLAND CONTINUE AMONG WESTERN LEADERS

LD291458 Hamburg DPA in German 1411 GMT 29 Dec 81

[Text] On Tuesday Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher continued the Western alliance's exchange of views on Poland by telephoning U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and his British counterpart Lord Carrington. He also spoke to the Belgian foreign minister, Leo Tindemans, who is taking over as the EC president on 1 January, and to his Italian colleague Emilio Colombo. Mutual regret was expressed in all of the talks that the session on Poland the EC foreign ministers had planned to hold in London on Wednesday will not take place. It will be replaced by a meeting of political directors from the foreign ministries of the 10 EC states. A Foreign Ministry spokesman in Bonn announced that Genscher intends to continue the exchange of views within the next few days. Diplomatic circles in Bonn also emphasized that Foreign Minister Genscher had been prepared to attend a ministerial meeting. It seems that the plan for the conference was foundered by the French foreign minister's trip abroad. The German policy concerning Poland is criticized in the U.S. press as overcautious and christened by the Bonn CSU politician Franz Ludwig Graf Stauffenberg as "appeasement propaganda." However, Bonn considers it to be appreciably more precise than the relevant policy of other EC states.

EEC FOREIGN MINISTERS TO MEET IN LONDON 31 DEC

Britain at the moment has the presidency of the EEC.

POLAND'S RAKOWSKI ARRIVES FOR TALKS WITH GENSCHER

LD301014 Hamburg DPA in German 1002 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA) -- Poland's deputy premier, Mieczyslaw Rakowski, arrived in Bonn today for talks with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher on the current situation in Poland. The Polish politician was welcomed at the airport by Genscher. The two politicians then drove to the minister's office at the Foreign Ministry. After the political talks, which were unexpectedly announced yesterday, Genscher will give a luncheon for the Polish guest. Rakowski will return to Warsaw today.

KOHL, MERTES DISCUSS GOVERNMENT'S POLISH POLICY

[Text] Bonn, 28 December -- In view of developments in Poland CDU Chairman Kohl has called on the free world to intensify its moral pressure on the Polish and Soviet leaderships. The protest against the continuing measures of oppression by the Polish military council must not die down. Holidays and vacation days cannot make people forget that tens of thousands of Polish reformers have been under arrest for weeks, Kohl declared in the press service of his Bundestag group. The news reports on measures of force including tortures increase to an alarming degree. It is not the Polish workers and the forces of reform which must be held responsible for the crisis in Poland but exclusively the Communist Party which has led the country into political and economic chaos.

The Soviet leadership, which takes any reform movement in its own country or in an allied state as a direct threat to its power and therefore brutally seeks to suppress it, shares essentially in the responsibility for this. Kohl said that the Soviet Union should be aware that Poland's future development will exert a decisive influence on East-West relations on the whole and that a continued measure of oppression against the forces of reform will considerably burden the detente efforts on all levels.

The foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU, Alois Mertes, in an interview with this newspaper Monday restated the urgency of a joint assessment of the situation in Poland. Mertes accused the Federal Government of indulging in the language of "preventive good behavior" in the present situation. It does not call things by their proper names clearly enough. Yet this is the minimal commitment which the Federal Republic has toward distressed Poland.

Mertes said that irrespective of the subjective intentions and motives of General Jaruzelski, what is happening now is a "Polish self-application of the Brezhnev doctrine." If the Soviet Union and the GDR claim that a process of normalization is underway in Poland then it means in the vernacular that it is a self-shackling of Poland which spares the Soviet Union the political costs of an intervention. According to Mertes the West's attitude must be aimed at preventing this method of gagging the Polish people.

In the opinion of the CDU/CSU the grant of state assistance to Poland must be made dependent on the return to the very degree of democracy and state of justice which prevailed prior to the imposition of martial law. Mertes justified this demand by saying that the economic basis of the voluminous public financial and economic aid to Poland had promoted the success of the Polish course of reforms and renewal. Since this course has been strangled the justification for the extraordinary support action for the People's Republic of Poland during the past 2 years also becomes null and void, Mertes said. The Western taxpayer just cannot be expected to even finance the oppression of human rights and the violation of the Helsinki Final Act and of the elementary rules of international law and humanity. It is the view of the CDU/CSU, however, that sanctions against the military dictatorship in Poland must not hit the victims of the military dictatorship.

The CDU politician advocates the view that the current crisis makes evident a decisive weakness of Western policy toward the East, namely, the absence of a common, reliable strategy of economic cooperation and economic-political sanctions. Sanctions are useful only if they are supported by the West in its entirety and if they also hit the actual wirepullers of the Polish crisis, the Soviet Union, the GDR, and Czechoslovakia.

BUSINESSMEN SCORE ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR

[Excerpts] Bonn, 29 Dec (DPA) -- Otto Wolff von Amerongen, president of the Association of German Chambers of Industry and Commerce, and Hans Hartwig, president of the Federal Association of German Wholesale and Foreign Trade, have spoken out against an economic embargo as a reply to alleged Soviet interference in Poland. They were interviewed by DPA/VWD. The two men agreed that trade restrictions of this sort had proved in the past to be useless and could be no substitute for exercising pressure through foreign policy. Hartwig said the damage resulting from economic sanctions was considerable, because "the world economic division of labor" is disturbed.

Amerongen said that in the conditions of free world trade, it is almost impossible to operate regional embargoes in the world. This is particularly the case where the measures are concentrated on one or two countries of the Eastern bloc. The possibilities for avoiding the embargo are present from the outset. Amerongen said: Naturally, no goods that are sensitive for Western defense must go to the East. However, difficulties are presented in this connection by the so-called grey zones, and therefore there is something to be gained by a more specific definition of the list of strategically important goods.

SOCIALIST INTERNATIONAL MEETS TO DISCUSS POLAND

LD291828 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 29 Dec 81

[Text] The Socialist International [SI] has been meeting in Paris since this morning to try and define a joint position on the Polish situation. The meeting was called by the French Socialist Party which was discontented with SI's initial official reaction to the imposition of martial law in Poland. The former West German chancellor and president of the Socialist International, Willy Brandt, let it be understood that the events in Poland are a strictly internal affair and that foreign verbal denunication would not help the Poles. (Michel Lemerle), you are following the meeting for us. Well, has a compromise been reached among all the SI member countries?

[Lemerle] Yes, the Socialist Party has some cause for satisfaction this evening: It took the initiative in calling this meeting to try and get a more firm reaction from the SI on the Polish situation and, in general, it has obtained satisfaction. The final declaration, adopted unanimously but with reservations from Finland, is a lot less moderate than the initial reaction from Willy Brandt 2 weeks ago. The text adopted this evening condemns the taking of power by the Polish military, demands the immediate release of prisoners, calls for the trade union Solidarity to be free to carry out its activities and for an end to repression and martial law in Poland. This represents an unambiguous condemnation but one may also note a certain realism on the means of action proposed. This SI is careful not to recommend any sanctions against Poland; it even proposes that food and medical aid should be intensified but also that general economic aid should be considered as the situation in Poland develops in the coming weeks and the coming months.

[Paris Domestic Service in French at 1900 GMT on 29 December reports that the Socialist International hardened its position: "It firmly condemned the assumption of power by the military in Poland. It also stressed that the Polish people have the right to solve their problems without outside interference. The declaration was adopted unanimously. Finally, the socialist leaders stressed the fact that the Polish crisis must not serve as an alibi for interventions in other parts of the world."]

[Text] Paris, 29 Dec (AFP) -- The Presidium of the Socialist International that met here today condemned the military takeover in Poland and demanded that the Polish people be given the right to resolve their problems without outside interference. Agreement on a resolution to that effect was reached by all parties represented at the meeting with the exception of Finland, according to the first secretary of the French Socialist Party, Lionel Jospin. Mr Jospin, Mario Soares of the Portuguese Socialist Party and Felipe Gonzalez, their Spanish colleague, had earlier been mentioned as the main promoters of a strong condemnation, Willy Brandt of West Germany advocating moderation. Prominent socialists or social democrats in attendance included Joop den Uyl of the Netherlands, Michael Foot of Britain and Abba Eban of Israel.

The Socialist International, which groups socialist and social democrat leaders, said in a communique that it "condemned the military show of strength in Poland as well as the repression of civil rights." The statement, which represented a hardening of the organization's position on Poland, was approved unanimously by the 15 delegations at the meeting. It demanded "the immediate release of all imprisoned people and the possibility for the Solidarity free union to engage in its activities freely."

Calling the Polish reform movement launched 17 months ago "a great hope for the country and the entire world" the Socialist International said "we cannot accept this people's movement being crushed by force."

The communique reaffirmed each country's right to social and economic justice as well as national independence and said: "This goes as well for Poland as for Turkey, Afghanistan, or particularly for El Salvador." But the group urged that the Polish crisis not be used as a pretext for putting a chill on detente and efforts at arms control. It said that the Polish crisis seriously endangered detente and "the responsibility would fall on the communist world."

Mr Brandt, president of the Socialist International, who was absent today, earlier urged the group to follow a line of "moderation," saying that "unsolicited advice and harsh statements will not help the Polish people." His moderate line was strongly criticized by French, Italian and Swedish socialists, but drew continued support from the Finns, the only delegation to express reservations about today's resolution. The representative of the West German Social Democrat Party of Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, whose government has been following a cautious line in the Polish crisis, said he was "entirely in agreement" with the Socialist International statement. Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, SDP vice-president, said he was particularly pleased that the statement made no mention of sanctions against Poland.

FRENCH, ITALIAN, JAPANESE UNIONS ACT ON POLAND

[Text] Paris, 29 Dec (AFP) -- French, Italian and Japanese trade unions are to undertake long-term action aimed at the lifting of martial law in Poland and the restoration of the rights of the suspended independent trade union federation Solidarity. An announcement on this by the socialist French CFDT union federation today followed a meeting here between the CFDT and representatives of the Italian Unitary Federation (IUF), umbrella organisation of the communist CGIL, socialist UIL, and Catholic CISL unions, and of SOHYO, the biggest Japanese union, at whose initiative the meeting was held. Delegates agreed to back, among other suggestions, the French proposal that a delegation from the Geneva-based International Labor Organisation (ILO) be sent immediately to Poland. The CFDT and the Italian unions will also study a SOHYO suggestion that the 13th of each month (marking the anniversary of the December 13 Polish coup) be earmarked "as a day allowing joint expression of union support for Solidarity."

MINISTER ON 'RAPID CHANGES' IN NEW CALEDONIA

BK171008 Hong Kong AFP in English 090. GMT 17 Dec 81

[Text] Noumea, 17 Dec (AFP) -- Henri [illegible]nuelli, French secretary of state for overseas territories, said today at the close of a 5-day visit that "a majority of men and women are convinced that there must be rapid changes here." He told a press conference: "I believe that the people I have spoken with during my visit have understood me, because everybody here admits the need for reforms and realises that the French Government will make them."

"The government cannot be accused of electoral demagogy. We are not in power to try and seduce this or that faction of the Caledonian electorate: We are in power to try and find solutions to problems." "I believe there is a fairly wide political consensus, no doubt stemming from different motives, for a certain number of reforms. I do not think there are any monolithic blocs either amongst the majority or the opposition in this territory." "In any case, a majority of men and women are convinced that there must be rapid changes here." Mr Emmanuelli is due home tomorrow.

POLICE SEARCH TRENTO AREA FOR DOZIER 'PRISON'

AU300858 Rome ANSA in English 0842 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Rome, 30 Dec (ANSA) -- Italian police and Carabinieri forces carried out a systematic search in the area around the northern city of Trento for the whereabouts of United States NATO command General James Lee Dozier and his Red Brigades terrorist kidnappers after a tip-off yesterday from an un-identified informer. The hiding place of the Red Brigades for the general kidnapped from his home in Verona on December 17 was indicated by the informer from the Veneto region to be somewhere near Trento, but by late Tuesday evening investigators were still unable to find any clues leading to the discovery of the urban guerrilla "prison." Searches were also carried out in other regions of Italy, while investigators analyzed the documents left by the Red Brigades on Sunday in a Milan waste bin, in an attempt to find further clues to the general's hiding-place.

Police yesterday also revealed that they had requisitioned cells of political prisoners in a maximum security jail in central Italy on December 27. Police were apparently looking for documents in possession of suspected terrorist prisoners. On the outcome of those searches, police sources say that certain important documents were found and sequestered from one prisoner, but details were not available on their contents.

Another copy of the communique found in Milan on Sunday was discovered yesterday morning in the Alfa Romeo automobile plant in Arese, a town near Milan. The communique, found by some workers, was given to their shop steward in the factory, who then handed it over to police.

PCI RESOLUTION SCORES MILITARY TAKEOVER IN POLAND

LD292150 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 29 Dec 81

[Text] The Directorate of the Italian Communist Party [PCI] this afternoon released the resolution which has been discussed in the past few days on -- as the resolution says -- the dramatic events in Poland. The final draft, comprising 17 pages, was approved this morning by the party Secretariat. It confirmed the already expressed condemnation of the military coup in Poland, the arrests and trials by military tribunals and the suspension of activities of political, trade union and social organizations.

The resolution of the PCI Directorate describes these measures as incompatible with democratic and socialist principles which cannot solve the Polish crisis. They can be justified, the PCI document observes, with the need to save the essence of a socialist-type regime, but using military force instead of political means in dealing with the trade union and popular protest represents a blow to the cause of socialism itself. Only the Poles, in complete independence and autonomy, the resolution of the PCI Directorate goes on, without any outside interference, can solve the problems of their own country. As far as the PCI is concerned, it is in the interest of democratic socialist and communist forces in West Europe and of the progressive and peace-loving forces in the world to favor and guarantee a peaceful and democratic solution of the Polish crisis.

The document notes that threats of extreme measures, retaliation and sanctions against this country or another, as well as internal manipulations, only serve to push back all of European history and to recreate a cold war climate. For the Italian Communists, democracy and socialism are inseparable. With the events in the East, the document says, we are now facing the process of involution and recurrent and dramatic crises, which call into question the monolithic concept of power. The lack of institutions which effectively represent society and the closed and hierarchic manner of conceiving relations inside the socialist camp show socialism as a model and not as a historic process that is developing on the world scene in different ways.

Affirming that the phase that began with the October revolution has exhausted its motive force, the document -- which deals with broad historic analysis of the Polish crisis -- reiterates that the world continues to go forward. It is now a question, the document concludes, of overcoming this phase and looking ahead.

Criticizes 'Soviet Model'

AU300911 Rome ANSA in English 0845 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 30 Dec (ANSA) -- The Italian Communist Party has warned that if current events in Poland interrupt present negotiations in Geneva between the two superpowers, and every other attempt at dialogue and agreement on the issue of disarmament, the consequences could be extremely serious. Western Europe's largest communist party also called for reflection on the ramifications of the present situation in Poland on the fate of socialist nations, in a document debated and approved by Communist Party leadership and released here yesterday.

In the document, entitled "The Dramatic Facts of Poland," the Communists reiterate their "total condemnation of the military coup in Warsaw," but also express their hope that the situation will not cause "reprisals and sanctions already threatened, which could risk a backward progression in European history." The seventeen-page typewritten declaration from Communist Party headquarters here, reportedly the source of ample discussion among the party's top ranks, also reflects comments made recently by party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer to the effect that events of the last year and a half in Poland, and their dramatic consequences with the introduction of martial law in the East European nation, should be a cause for reflection on the nature of societies of socialist origins. According to the wording of the document, Italian Communists maintain that for some time now, their position has become very critical in regard to East European nations' adoption of a single socialist model, "the Soviet one."

Referring to the possible outcome of the crisis situation in Poland, the Communist Party resolution states that it is "in the interest of democratic, socialist and communist elements in Western Europe, as well as in the interest of progressive forces and of world peace to attain a peaceful solution to the Polish crisis." At the same time, the party warned that "extremism, revindications, threatened sanctions against one or another country, or, worse still, calculated manipulation of (Poland's) internal affairs, only serve a regression in recent European history, and would only operate in the interests of harking back to a cold war climate."

In an apparent reaction to criticism from some Italian political quarters, the Communist document expresses the hope that the condemnation and criticism of the Polish situation will not obscure the fact the Polish people deserve freer and more democratic conditions. According to the document, the possibilities for this "also depend on the development of detente in Europe and in the world." The Communist Party document also contains an historical analysis of the development of socialist societies and particularly of the Soviet society in the last ten years.

While restating Berlinguer's recent claim that the phase of socialism begun with the October revolution in Russia "has exhausted its propelling energy," the document also points out a theme close to party policy: that is, the need to find "completely new ways" to "relaunch democracy and socialism in the entire world." The Communist Party resolution also pointed out that Eastern Europe is already facing "complex processes, and recurring and dramatic crises which throw the conception of monolithic power once again into discussion." Criticism of the "Soviet model" of socialism was blunted however, in the document, but the party did affirm that it has always maintained an "autonomous role" in debates, encounters, and open confrontations with communist parties in power, and above all with the Soviet Union." Because of this role, the Communists maintain in their document that they wish to sustain "normal relations with all the communist parties in the same way as with other revolutionary, socialist and progressive forces," but on the basis of "absolute freedom of thought and action, without ideological or political restraints."

Napolitano on Party Attitude

LD300448 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0700 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Interview with Giorgio Napolitano, member of the PCI Directorate, by Roberto Piraino, date and place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] What did Berlinguer mean when he said the phase that opened with the October revolution is now over?

[Answer] In the period that began with the October revolution, the countries, first of all the Soviet Union, which followed its lead sent forth strong impulses for the process of renewal of liberation, of emancipation in various parts of the world. Today those impulses seem to be spent. We must say that today in the Soviet Union and in the countries of the so-called real socialism, there is undoubtedly a heavy process of involution, and involution even with regard to [words indistinct].

[Question] Does it still make sense for the left to talk about the moral leadership of the Soviet Union?

[Answer] We have not talked, as far as I can remember, for decades about the moral leadership of the Soviet Union, and we certainly don't talk about it now.

[Question] You say involution, but isn't it rather an historical, a basic, incompatibility between so-called real socialism and democracy?

[Answer] We are convinced that resorting to a military coup, such as that out in Poland, is entirely incompatible with democratic principles and, in our view, also with socialist principles. On this we have no doubts. We say that it is not at all true that the only possible socialism is that which has been built in the countries of Eastern Europe. There is, therefore, no incompatibility between socialism and democracy; on the contrary, the countries with the greatest traditions of political democracy, first and foremost the countries of Western Europe, must seek an entirely different path, affirming the full compatibility and, indeed, the need for an essential welding of democracy and socialism.

[Question] And your relations with the Eastern communist parties?

[Answer] We have no special relationship with the communist parties of Eastern Europe, including the CPSU, as some still maintain. We have met, debated and clashed. We intend to have relations with all the parts of the left and with the workers and progressive movement on a European and world scale. Our independence, our autonomy, is full and total.

[Question] Some PCI leaders have referred to the rashness of Solidarity. But what was this rashness -- declaring that in a country which calls itself socialist the working class in actual fact has been cut off from power?

[Answer] We have mentioned on various occasions a certain behavior, certain attitudes of Solidarity, which seemed to us not to correspond to the necessity for understanding, for patient collaboration among the various components of Polish society. Nevertheless, these critical observations we made in the past detract nothing from our condemnation of the act of violence which has been perpetrated in Poland. In any case, we feel it was more than legitimate on the part of Solidarity to denounce the lack of political democracy that characterized Poland up to 1980 and the fact that workers could not express themselves through an independent organization. It is now a question of working, despite the extremely dramatic situation, towards the possibility of reopening a way to a dialogue, negotiations, and towards the recognition of fundamental political and trade freedoms in Poland.

COMMUNISTS CALL FOR SUPPORT FOR POLISH MEASURES

TA291432 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 1000 GMT 29 Dec 81

[Statement by the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee dated 27 December]

[Text] The government of the Polish People's Republic has taken the necessary measures against the antisocialist forces, and these measures are being supported by all the friends of the Polish people and by everyone favoring peace. The plans of the counterrevolutionary forces, which were preparing to alienate Poland from socialism and the community of socialist countries, have been foiled. The situation is now gradually returning to normal.

The U.S. imperialists and the NATO masters are trying to distort the essence of developments in Poland and are interfering grossly in the internal affairs of that country. Their goal is to deceive the world public at a time when blood-stained aggression by the United States is being undertaken in El Salvador, by Israel in the Golan and by Republic of South Africa in Angola and while efforts are being made to drag Turkey, a NATO member, into a military dictatorship. The NATO masters, who are protesting in favor of so-called liberty and rights in Poland, are blind and silent in the face of the gross and brutal trampling of liberties in Turkey since the September 1980 military coup. This defense of the counterrevolutionary so-called trade unionists, who were caught red-handed as they were preparing forcefully to take over the government in Poland, prefer to keep silent about the prosecution of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] in the military court in Istanbul under a state of war, though the military prosecutor in his indictment has been unable to prove the involvement of the DISK leaders in terror and armed incidents. Moreover, 2,000 other union members will also be brought to trial. It is primarily the U.S. imperialists who are supporting those who are throwing some 100 citizens into dungeons merely for supporting the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] or for being communists.

These two measures reveal the true facts about the increased imperialist anticommunist campaign surrounding Poland. The imperialists are screaming in panic in the face of the counterrevolutionaries' failure in Poland and not for freedom in that country. This phenomenon alone shows who is behind the enemies of socialism in Poland. The reactionary circles in our country are currently trying to conceal their antipeople policies behind the smokescreen over Poland. Their intention is to draw the attention of the people from the agreements signed with the United States which will, in the future, clear the path for the RDF. They also intend to conceal the steps taken to tear up the 1961 constitution and to distract the public from the continuing economic crisis.

The junta government is on one hand talking about noninterference in Poland's internal affairs and on the other it is approving the inclusion of the Polish issue on NATO's agenda and thus interfering in the internal affairs of that country. The government states that it is concerned about developments in Poland. Since the junta cannot argue when freedoms are being crushed, it is displaying its concern over the failure of the counterrevolutionaries. However, what really worries the overwhelming majority of the nation is the increased U.S. imperialist pressure -- hidden behind this smokescreen -- to use Turkey to serve imperialism's interest in the Middle East and the Mediterranean and of the junta's dangerous step in favor of U.S. imperialism through the recent joint defense agreement envisaging the expansion of U.S. bases in our country.

The interests of the Turkish working class and toiling people necessitate support for the Polish working class, which is struggling against the counterrevolutionaries. The TCP calls on all our people and all peace forces to support the measures taken in Poland.

GREECE'S CURRENT FOREIGN POLICY AIMS ANALYZED

NC181238 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 15 Dec 81 p 2

[Second installment of article by retired Ambassador Muharrem Nuri Birgi: "Turkish-Greek Relations Under Papandreou"; first installment was published in the 18 December DAILY REPORT]

[Excerpts] As to Papandreou's other ambition, a serious Greek told me the other day: "Papandreou will go to the extent of fighting Turkey." A British friend of mine, who had come from Athens long before Papandreou assumed power, told me: "Some military and political circles there are openly expressing the desire to go to war with Turkey." If all this is true, then Papandreou may be expected to implement this scenario: First, a peace offensive! This has already been carried out through an "olive branch" gesture. Then intensive propaganda against Turkey to the effect that "Turkey is going to attack Greece; Turkey is a fascist country."

Then resorting to provocations, either in the Aegean or in Cyprus, which are likely to compel Turkey to take measures. And finally, turning to the West and saying: "Didn't I tell you Turkey is going to attack?" Thinking this will entitle him to attack, he will resort to arms.

You might say, "This is a crazy scenario!" Yes, it is, but those who know Papandreou say, "He can do it." Singly, Greece cannot embark on either a military or political war with Turkey. After World War I, Venizelos attacked Anatolia because his allies had then told him: "Go ahead." But when his army was routed and his allies told him; "What can we do? You have failed. You are responsible for the consequences," the same Venizelos cooperated with Ataturk in creating Turkish-Greek friendship. He was a wise and realistic politician, he was a statesman of such a calibre that he could undertake the responsibility of a sharp turn, and opposite him was a man like Ataturk, who knew that the most constructive and powerful policy was that of extending a friendly hand to the enemy he had defeated.

Ataturk's Turkey continues to extend a friendly hand. What is more, living conditions and population density in today's Turkey are several times superior. With God's help, we are in a position to foil a similar attack.

We are of the opinion that turning Papandreou from this path is in the hands of Greece's friends and allies. The other day, Papandreou demanded that the NATO Defense Planning Committee should include in its official communique Greece's request for assurances against a probable attack from Turkey. The other ministers stated openly that such terms could not be included in the communique. Later, because of Papandreou's insistence, the NATO defense ministers' meeting for the first time in its history encountered the danger of not issuing a communique. This is a good warning to the Greek leader that no one would follow him in his departure from the path of logic and geopolitical realities.

The criterion of turning Turkey into a modern and effective military power cannot be determined according to the whims of Greece. The criterion is the danger which necessitated the establishment of NATO and which is still continuing vehemently, and the security measures Turkey's geographical position in the Middle East may dictate. If this is not explained clearly to Papandreou and if "unimportant" concessions are given to him for the purpose of pacifying him, this would amount to encouraging him to continue his ambitions and activities against Turkey.

From the point of view of making up our deficiencies, of ignoring the Greek lobby in the United States and of giving Papandreou some advice, the United States can play a vital role. Certain circles may say: "If he is hard pressed, Papandreou may turn to either the Soviet Union or the Third World."

If the Greek leader has to choose between "knocking out Turkey" and "joining the Soviet Union or the Third World," then preparations must be made for a Western community and a NATO without Greece.

The whole situation also has an aspect involving the European organizations; that is, the European Parliament and the Council of Europe. Papandreou is expecting these organizations to expel Turkey. Therefore, any and every political and economic move against Turkey will add enthusiasm to Papandreou's projects against Turkey.

To put it briefly: We are facing a Papandreou problem today. This is not merely a Turkish-Greek problem; it is a problem for NATO and the Western world as well. Therefore, we are all responsible for resolving it. Given joint cooperation, the present cheerless outlook may even result in a Turkish-Greek "modus vivendi" as happened at the end of our war of independence.

BRAZILIAN WEAPONS SHIPPED TO GREEKS ON CYPRUS

NC291046 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 23 Dec 81 pp 1, 14

[Tokay Gozutok report from Nicosia]

[Text] It has been ascertained that in addition to the Cascavel armored cars, used as an "attack weapon," imported from Brazil, the Greek Cypriot administration has begun to obtain guns and antitank and antiaircraft guns from several NATO countries as well. It has been reported that some of these weapons are being brought in at Paphos, Limassol and Larnaca ports.

Diplomatic circles in Cyprus say that these weapons are unloaded at night when the ports are closed to civilian traffic. These circles add that "as soon as he assumed office, Papandreou began to send reinforcements of troops and weapons to Cyprus." They also believe that to camouflage the military concentration he has undertaken in the Greek Cypriot sector and to hurl the intercommunal talks into an impasse and take the Cypriot dispute to an international conference, Papandreou argues that Turkey is continually sending reinforcements of troops and arms to Cyprus. He is thought to be implementing a "crisis" strategy. The diplomatic circles say, however, that this strategy has removed all goodwill in the Cyprus issue. They add that Greece and the Greek Cypriot administration are trying, with the support of the British Labor Party, to take the Cyprus dispute to an international conference and embark on a large-scale anti-Turkish propaganda campaign.

It has been learned that the number of Cascavel armored cars, which originate in the United States [as published], exceeds 50. It is said that these armored cars, which are equipped with a gun and a machinegun, are used in "hit-and-run" battles because they move very swiftly.

Commenting on this situation, TFSC President Denktas said Greek Prime Minister Papandreou is determined to pursue a policy which envisages enosis -- a policy he has inherited from his father. Denktas added: "It is easy to comprehend what Papandreou is trying to do. I believe this is the game he is trying to put into effect: The Cyprus issue is in a mortal state in the international arena; there is no activity about it the world appears to have identified itself with the biregional shape which has come about following a conflict between the two communities; it believes negotiations can continue for the creation of a bicommunal federation. This is not favored by Papandreou or Kiprianou. They want to enliven the Cyprus dispute and turn it into a hot issue in order to benefit from such a situation. They believe that if a minor crisis is created and the world pleads for the suspension of hostilities, they will be able to procure a favorable resolution during the confusion from the United Nations."

EVREN NEW YEAR MESSAGE SETS ELECTION DATES

[New Year message by head of state General Evren -- recorded]

[Excerpt] My dear citizens, you see that we are carrying out, step by step and within a programmatic framework, all the promises we made to the Turkish nation on radio and television on 12 September 1980 and in the subsequent speeches I made in various parts of the country. While carrying out this program we were never influenced by the allegations made by certain domestic circles -- which give priority only to their own personal interests -- or by certain foreign circles which were influenced by the negative propaganda carried out by those domestic circles and whose ideological views run parallel. Those allegations served only the interests of destructive and divisive circles. By abiding with the will of the majority of the nation, we progressed on the path we knew to be the right one with confident steps. Lately, within the framework of the program we had announced, we set up the Consultative Assembly. In this way we took the greatest step in passing on to a democratic and parliamentary system.

This assembly has started to work on the constitution -- the most important of its duties. If the Consultative Assembly can, by making use of the bitter experiences of the Turkish nation so far, prepare the constitution most befitting us, and submit it to the National Security Council by the end of the summer of 1982, then the constitution will be submitted to a referendum by the end of November 1982. After the constitution is accepted by the people, and if no important changes that might affect us occur in the world, we will be able to hold normal elections in the fall of 1983. If the constitution is not prepared by that date and since elections cannot be held in the winter months, the date of the elections will be postponed to the spring of 1984.

We did not limit the Consultative Assembly to dates because we want to ensure that the constitution is prepared in the best possible way. Otherwise, a constitution prepared in a hurry might lead us to instability and chaos once again and bring us face to face with new 12 Septembers. That is why we determined the dates of the elections as the earliest and latest. Every sensible citizen will realize that if we take into account the time needed to prepare the party law and the election law after the constitution is prepared, as well as the time needed for the organization of the newly set-up parties, then it is impossible to hold the elections at an earlier date.

As I have always said, we will return to the system of a republic, since it is the one most befitting the Turkish nation and since we were entrusted with it by our great leader Ataturk, who set it up in the first place. No one should have any doubts about that. As always in history, the Turkish nation has overcome the most difficult obstacles today. The zigzags and darkness of the path before us are beginning to disappear slowly and a bright and straight path is replacing it. As a nation, with a spirit of unity and solidarity, and sharing our sorrows and happiness, we will walk fast, and sometimes run, along this straight road toward a bright future, toward our goal.

As a nation, we overcame very difficult obstacles in 1981, the 100th anniversary of Ataturk's birth. We are embarking on 1982 with great speed and with great hopes. I am not ending the Ataturk centenary with a slowdown. Abiding by Ataturk's principles closely in 1982 as well, we will reach our goals as fast as possible, and with the help of the light of these principles -- which we uphold as our banner -- we will place our nation in the place it deserves in the contemporary world.

My dear citizens, now I would like to briefly refer to foreign developments. Although 1981 has gone by with positive developments from the viewpoint of Turkey, it not possible to say that there have been similar positive developments in many parts of the world, and especially in the Middle East and our region. The gradual complication of international problems and the conflicts and developments in the political as well as economic and social fields have led to the transfer of many problems -- reaching dimensions threatening world peace and security -- to the new year in a way which will affect the future of all nations. Our country, which since the day it was established has set as its major goal the achievement of peace at home and in the world -- which is Ataturk's basic principle -- and which has based and directed its foreign policy on this principle, is closely following developments, especially in Europe, the Middle East and Asia due to its geographic situation, and is concerned about the tension in East-West relations and the crisis of confidence. We will continue our relations with all countries irrespective of their regime, philosophy and doctrine, based on independence, respect for territorial integrity non-interference in domestic affairs and equality of rights, and implementation of the principle of friendly and peaceful coexistence.

The importance we attach to cooperation and solidarity among the allies within NATO, which we regard as the major guarantee of our security, will be maintained at the same level. We also maintain our hope that the alliance will show the same interest in and fastidiousness in relation to Turkey's needs and problems. We hope the fact will always be borne in mind that Turkey, which has emerged as a factor of security and stability in our region, a region that has entered a phase of serious instability in recent years, will make a positive contribution to the strengthening of the southeastern flank of the alliance as well as to the continuation of regional peace and security.

Meanwhile, we maintain the hope that a speedy, lasting and just solution will be reached on the Cyprus problem, a problem that closely concerns Turkey, through negotiations to be continued between the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities on the island which share many common values based on mutual conficence and respect. The Turkish Cypriot community has proved that it has a constructive approach to the problem and has submitted comprehensive territorial and constitutional proposals to the negotiations being carried on under the auspices of the UN secretary general. If the Greek Cypriot community reciprocates to the goodwill approach of the Turkish Cypriot community, a lasting solution desired by us all can be achieved. However, on this occasion I would like to note another point: whether a lasting solution is reached or the current situation is continued, the stability of the Turkish Cypriot community and its political, social, cultural and economic development, above all depends on the unity and solidarity of our Cypriot brethren.

I would like to believe that those who have political responsibility in Cyprus will act in accordance with the realization of their historic duty. With this belief in mind, I congratulate all my citizens at home and abroad on the new year, and I hope that the new year will bring us all and all world nations tranquillity, security and happiness. I extend my respect and love to you all.

TORY BACKBENCHERS URGE SANCTIONS AGAINST POLAND

[Excerpt] The government is likely to come under mounting pressure from Tory backbenchers to impose economic sanctions against Poland over the introduction of martial law. A substantial number of Conservatives would like Britain to go even further, and back President Reagan by announcing sanctions against the Soviet Union. But Labour's shadow foreign secretary Mr Denis Healey today condemned President Reagan's seven-point package of sanctions against Russia as "an error." "They will have very little effect on the situation because very few of them take immediate effect," he said. They were the least Mr Reagan could do to satisfy domestic pressures for action, he added. Mr Healey also rejected sanctions against the military regime in Poland. He urged Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington and other EEC governments to stick to their present policy, which has been considerably more cautious than the Americans. He said everyone should wait for the outcome of today's meeting between Poland's deputy prime minister, Mr Mieczyslaw Rakowski and the German Foreign Minister Mr Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

But Mr Ray Whitney, MP for Wycombe and chairman of the Tory foreign affairs committee, claimed there was widespread support on all sides of the Commons for sanctions against Poland. "I believe the West has to bring some pressure to bear, it should be made clear enough that some cessation of the repression is to take place," he said. "European countries should make a positive response, and it should follow closely along the lines of what America has proposed (against Poland)." He said there would be disappointment among Tory MP's if no action was taken. A major rift between America and Europe over the response to the Polish crisis is now developing. While Britain is taking a tougher view of the situation, the government is unlikely to take any action which is out of step with its European partners.

DAILY ON TURKISH CYPRIOT UNILATERAL INDEPENDENCE

NC300946 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 30 Dec 81 pp 1, 8

[Text] On 13 February the Turks plan to declare an "independent Turkish Cypriot state" -- something that so far has constituted the basic lever of extortion against the Greek side. There are reports that have been checked and strong indications to support this.

According to these reports the Turks: 1. Are preparing special celebrations for 13 February (anniversary of the so-called "Turkish Cypriot Federated State's constitution"); 2. For the first time they have invited dozens of foreign reporters (mainly from Britain, Germany, Italy and the United States) and other personalities for the celebrations; In addition to this there are reports which have been leaked from various diplomatic sources, both here and -- especially -- in concerned European capitals. Furthermore, there is also: 1. To a great extent the overstrengthening -- in men and materiel -- of the military forces in the occupied territories; 2. The developing pretext-mongering and, more generally, the propaganda which is cultivating the ground for the final unilateral act currently favored by Turkey.

The fact should be noted that there already is a serious crisis developing in Greek-Turkish relations at all levels, something that is being fed by Ankara and which will exacerbate them even more. Furthermore, there are equally clear reports according to which: The long presence and contacts in Cyprus of Guneri as Ankara's envoy concerned the planning of the final preparations. The government is evaluating these (and some other reports) and has contacted a number of Western governments to which it has already conveyed its reports. At the same time it is studying alternative actions in order to foil the new adventurism which is being planned.

CHANCELLOR KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON POLAND EVENTS

AU301140 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 29 Dec 81 pp 1, 4

[Thomas Chorherr report on interview with Chancellor Kreisky in Bad Gastein; date not given]

[Text] In an interview with DIE PRESSE, Chancellor Kreisky has endorsed a varied and cautious policy on the part of free Europe toward the Polish military regime. "What is important is not to merely take over U.S. signals," the head of government stated. In connection with President Reagan's announcement on U.S. aid shipments for Poland through Austria, Kreisky exercised great restraint: "We have enough flour, sugar and rice -- the Americans rather should take refugees from us." In addition, the head of government clings to the view that elections will take place in the spring of 1983. He will decide this April whether he will be the top candidate again or not.

In an extensive interview given at his vacation home, the Austrian head of government touched on all aspects of the present and future relations between Austria and Western Europe and Poland. The "Third World historical attempt to overcome a communist regime" must also be able, after the events have taken their due course, to stand a critical review and cannot only be described by depending on sympathies or antipathies, Kreisky stated. "But as long as the struggle of the Polish people against their oppressors continues, sympathy has priority -- and sympathy is on the side of the people who want more freedom."

Viewed in terms of realpolitik, the present Polish regime is a military dictatorship with communist markings, "and viewed in terms of realpolitik, the events in Poland have not taken place against the will of the Soviets." It must be admitted, however, that a military dictatorship is nothing new for Poland; one existed with conservative-fascist markings under Marshal Pilsudski.

"It cannot be estimated now what freedom the regime is leaving to the population," Kreisky says. One thing is certain, however: If this military dictatorship of Polish make and with national accents fails, the disaster will take its full course. "Then there will be intervention from outside. And if there is intervention from outside it will be so horrible that one does not even want to imagine what would happen," the chancellor thinks. He does not cherish any illusions about the situation in Poland but the "peace of the grave" does not yet prevail. Should the current rulers succeed in consolidating their position, further developments will depend on a number of problems. First and foremost is the problem of the future role of the communist party: What will it look like? Second, Kreisky points out, is the problem of whether it will be possible to restore economic order, and third, once that order has been restored, how the regime will regulate its relations with the Western world. "There exist a multitude of unsettled problems." Finally, fourth, it must not be overlooked that Poland is a great country and above all a country rich in raw materials.

Subsequently, Kreisky emphasized: "The West must rather make its policy on Poland contingent on developments in and around Poland itself. We will not be able simply to take over U.S. signals, but must have a policy of our own. Geopolitical viewpoints must also be taken into consideration in this context." But one thing will remain in any case: That is the historic fact that the communist party will no longer be able to regard itself as a workers party par excellence. "The communist parties have definitely ceased being carried by the workers. In this respect a world historic process, a process of unmasking, is in progress in Poland." It was also evident to what extent the communist party dictatorship was in contrast to the working class. Was Solidarity's conduct correct? Kreisky is reserved in this respect. It is too early yet to discuss whether the strategy of the independent trade unions in Poland was good or bad. But the consequences are clear: The communist parties finally have lost the battle for the European working class. The West European communists must now decide whether they want to dissociate themselves from the communist power center. Otherwise they would only be outposts of that center.

How does the head of government view the future policy of the Soviets on Poland? Does he deem intervention likely? Kreisky does not share Washington's view in this respect either. "I believe the Kremlin leadership knows very well what is at stake and that therefore it is cautious," the chancellor maintains. "There is too much at stake to leave it up to a few marshals whether there will be an intervention in Poland or not. The intervention in Afghanistan has not been that glorious and convincing after all." All in all it is still too early even now to define policy on Poland in very respect. "We must not extend hands to a regime which fights its own people. But once more: It depends on further developments in the country itself what policy can actually be pursued." It makes no difference from the viewpoint of a detained Pole who his oppressor is. "But it makes a great difference seen from a world policy viewpoint whether massive military intervention comes from the outside or whether an admittedly brutal but still, so to speak, national oppression comes from inside."

Kreisky views the U.S. statements on Poland with skepticism. "Some people in the West advocate a daring policy, but only as long as it does not concern them. When the admission of immigrants is involved, their caution knows no bounds," the Austrian chancellor said, criticizing the attitude of the great immigrant countries. And once more, addressed to Reagan: "We have enough flour and sugar. Refugees should be taken from us."

This is how Kreisky views the most recent exacerbation of Austrian-Czechoslovak relations in connection with the aid shipments to Poland: "There is no end of trouble with the Czechs. On one hand the Prague government wants normalization of relations with Vienna. On the other hand there is a power apparatus which prevents such a development. Obviously there must be two governments there: One that holds power internally and another one that is confronting us." Measures such as the refusal to admit Red Cross personnel poison the atmosphere.

Kreisky also sharply rapped the Israeli Government. The discord with the United States which emerged after the annexation of the Golan Heights will be smoothed out. "Israel's military role is too important to Washington." However, one fact remains, and that is that Israel, mindless of Syria's close relationship with the Soviet Union, has taken a step which is also aimed against Moscow. The embarrassment for the United States consists in the fact that not all the ties between Damascus and Washington have been cut yet. But Israel did not care about that either. "The current government believes it can afford such a provocative step." "At a moment when one part of the Arab world would like to make peace with Israel, this effort is falling on deaf ears in Israel itself. A unique historic chance is being passed up here, perhaps," the chancellor says. "It is an illusion, however, to believe that with the Golan Heights, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip Israel will have a safe future in the Arab world."

Broaching economic and domestic policy questions, the head of government termed it "unique" that there is at the same time a world policy crisis and a world economic crisis. "I am disappointed that the U.S. President has failed to bring about a turn in the state of the economy. Such a turn is nowhere visible." Austrian economic policy is now marked by the fact that measures for improving business activities could be adopted even before an economic upswing. It is the declared intention of the Federal Government to support the building industry with additional orders, Kreisky announced. This will be achieved primarily by moving up large building orders. The transport minister will also join in this effort. "We shall also use a certain cyclical economic policy leeway in cooperation with the Central Bank." Austria's credit abroad continues to be good and there are no plans for abandoning the hard currency policy, "particularly since exports are not developing too unfavorably, after all."

Finally, the almost mandatory question is posed: What does Kreisky think of the rumors concerning elections? "Absolutely nothing. If we were to vote in the fall of 1982 we would not be able to work, even in the spring. The next elections will be held in the spring of 1983. And I will decide in April or May whether I feel healthy enough to present myself again as the top candidate." The government will not be reshuffled until the next elections, the chancellor also noted.

CHARITIES FEEL POLAND AID DISTRIBUTED PROPERLY

AU301456 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 30 Dec 81 p 10

[Summary] After his return from Poland, Johann Pesti, financial director of the Red Cross, said the first rail shipment of aid from the Austrian National Committee had been handed over to the Polish Red Cross and stressed that Poland needs oil, canned meat, powdered milk and, above all, baby food, children's clothing and pharmaceuticals. CARITAS, the other major organization providing aid to Poland, will send three truck convoys to Poland on 4 and 5 January. The truck convoy that left yesterday was accompanied by a second one with 20 tons of food. "Both organizations are convinced that the aid shipments will not get into the 'wrong hands.'"

Delays to Shipments

[Excerpts] Austria's relief organizations are persistent in their aid to Poland. After the two Red Cross representatives who were to hand over the first aid shipment of the National Committee to its sister organization in Warsaw were turned back at the Czech border, they undauntedly made a detour via Berlin. They arrived Monday in Warsaw by train via the GDR -- without problem -- without problems. Contrary to the original plans, the aid will now be handed over in Katowice and be distributed there. The Red Cross in Vienna is already working on a second aid shipment. There has been reticence to comment on the CSSR chicaneries in order not to jeopardize further aid.

Today the next shipment of foods by CARITAS will leave Vienna for Katowice. The truck and trailer train will carry 20 tons of essential foodstuffs and food for children. The first recipient will be, as usual, the bishop of Katowice. As a matter of fact, CARITAS is not afraid of any obstruction by the CSSR. "We do not see any reason for this," says Engineer Karl Schinko. Our drivers have always received their visas readily and were allowed to pass without any problems." Since the start of its "aid for Poland drive" this February, CARITAS has dispatched 56 truck-trailer units to Poland with a total of 1,200 tons of foodstuffs valued at 14 million schillings.

All telephone and Telex lines to Poland remained dead on Monday, 16 days after the proclamation of martial law. "The Warsaw Telex office acknowledges Telex inquiries but callers are turned off with the explanation that the Polish subscriber is absent," says Engineer Herbert Stadlbauer of the Directorate General of Posts. The mail arriving from Poland in Vienna with a 3-4 day delay -- as Stadlbauer stated -- carries censorship stamps.

NETHERLANDS

PAPER EXAMINES LUBBERS' EUROMISSILE STANCE

PM251125 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 17 Dec 81 p 7

[Editorial: "Showing Their Colors"]

[Text] A few years ago Prime Minister van Agt delivered a speech on NATO nuclear arms modernization to a CDU gathering in Bonn. The speech was not well received either inside or outside Christian Democratic Appeal [CDA] circles. Yesterday CDA Chairman Lubbers delivered a clarification on the same issue in the West German capital which will probably meet the same fate. Negotiating with the Soviet Union over medium-range nuclear arms limitation will only succeed if NATO makes it clear that it will not refrain from deploying new nuclear arms if satisfactory results are not obtained from the negotiations, he said.

Lubbers stated this view at the end of a trip to Paris, Moscow and Bonn made by a Netherlands parliamentary delegation. There is every reason to doubt whether it was precisely this trip which contributed so much to this insight of Lubbers, since he has spoken of the so-called NATO dual decision in comparable terms before.

Perhaps the trip has given the CDA chairman a "peg" on which to hang a clearer account of his position, shortly after the great antinuclear demonstration in Amsterdam. At least this parliamentary excursion will have had this positive effect.

Indeed, as far as this recent demonstration is concerned, it can be said that Lubbers has confirmed, with retroactive effect as it were, that it was not such a bad thing that the CDA was not officialy represented.

It is a nice coincidence that Defense Minister van Mierlo (Democrats '66) had to defend to the second chamber permanent defense committee a passage from the NATO communique published last week which said that "adherence to the implementation of the two elements contained in the NATO dual decision has made an important contribution to bringing the Soviet Union to the negotiation table."

In Bonn Lubbers stressed the importance of the West German position for the Netherlands. If the Geneva arms limitation talks produce no results or results which are unsatisfactory before the end of 1983 the Federal Republic will begin deploying new nuclear arms, and then the Netherlands will have to show its colors on the issue of a decision to deploy or not, he said. In this respect alone, 1983 could be an extremely tense year for the Netherlands Government coalition, which is so divided on this issue.

We must bear in mind that Lubbers' plea for as close an understanding with Bonn as possible not only covered medium-range nuclear arms. He is bound to have delivered this plea also in connection with Netherlander wishes on other nuclear weapons, especially those with a shorter range. For efforts to limit the large number of such weapons that are to be found in West Europe West German support will always be indispensable in the counsels of the alliance. The closer the positions of the Netherlands and West Germany, the greater their powers of persuasion.

If this is what Lubbers was aiming at with his remarks in Bonn -- and this seems fairly certain -- he deserves respect for his desire to again give some attention to a possible understanding, especially from those who say that they expect some good to come from unilateral Netherlands actions and who might respond to the CDA chairman, and others may feel some encouragement from Lubbers' contribution to the national debate on the nuclear arms issue, which has still not distinguished itself through any great logic.

SPOKESMAN ISSUES STATEMENT ON SANCTIONS

[Text] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA) -- Government Spokesman Kurt Becker several times drew attention to the fact that the sanctions announced by President Reagan against the USSR are not an alliance decision. Becker said it is "completely out of the question" that the decision on U.S. sanctions can at a later date simply be reformulated into a decision of the NATO alliance. The Federal Government had only been informed by Washington "a few hours" before Reagan's announcement. The government spokesman said that at the present time there is no comparability with the situation in December 1980 when the NATO partners feared direct Soviet intervention in Poland and reached agreement on joint measures. During the consultations, which must now be held within the alliance, the talks between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Reagan on 5 January in Washington are of special importance. Becker also drew attention to the planned EEC foreign ministers' meeting in London on 31 December and to plans for a special meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Brussels during the second week of January 1982.

Becker also announced that Soviet state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev had replied on 29 December to the 26 December personal letter from Federal Chancellor Schmidt. In his reply, Brezhnev made remarks "in a very obliging tone" which in the Federal Government's view did not lead them to sharpen their assessment of the events in Poland.

According to Becker, Bonn was expecting more information from the talks started this morning between Deputy Polish Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. According to Becker, this first visit by a leading Polish politician to the West since the proclamation of a state of emergency is at the initiative of the Polish Government. Rakowski would also like to meet Deputy SPD Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski and FDP Bundestag group Chairman Wolfgang Mischnick.

According to Becker, the Federal Government expects the Polish leadership to uphold its promise to continue a policy of reform. An early signal of this, the "easing of martial law," is necessary in this respect. The Bonn government spokesman cited the release of prisoners as one such step. The Federal Government's policy continues to be guided by the goal that Poland should solve its problems itself without intervention from outside.

In explaining Bonn's intensive efforts to gain more clarity about events in Poland, which can only be assessed sketchily due to the block on communications, Becker stressed the Federal Government's close contact with the Vatican. He stressed that the Holy See's analysis of the situation corresponds with that of the Federal Republic. Becker issued a strong reminder of the Bundestag resolution on Poland on 18 December in which the government was called upon, among other things, to leave in abeyance state aid for Poland for as long "as the repressive measures of the current regime against the Polish people continue." The spokesman said that in this way the decision on Bonn's future aid has been placed under parliamentary control. Becker expressed regret that this resolution was not regarded as adequate abroad and particularly in the United States.

Becker rejected as "an unfounded claim" accusations that the Germans are indifferent to events in Poland. He recalled the many spontaneous aid actions by private individuals and organizations. During recent days, 2 million parcels worth hundreds of millions of marks have been sent to Poland. The Federal Government's policy on Poland is also guided by the realization that the distress of the population must be eased.

Schmidt Comments

LD302014 Hamburg DPA in German 1955 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] Hamburg, 30 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has described the sanctions imposed by Washington against Moscow and Warsaw because of the state of martial law in Poland as a "gesture, the expression of a deep concern, even anger."

In an ARD Television interview tonight, Schmidt, who is at present vacationing in Florida, said that he did not expect that the United States would break off the Geneva negotiations with the Soviet Union on the limitation of medium-range weapons if martial law is prolonged for some time in Poland. The chancellor said: "I do not expect it and I am against it." The chancellor pointed out that the impact of sanctions was limited. "We have experienced economic sanctions, other sanctions, in recent years on various occasions. Surely even their instigators do not think their effectiveness will change the world." But sanctions were politically significant because they made clear a certain attitude to those against whom they are directed.

CHANCELLOR DENIES MAJOR DIFFERENCES WITH U.S.

DW310939 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2000 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Hans-Joachim Friedrichs interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Florida on 30 December -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] How effective, politically and economically, do you think the sanctions imposed by the United States are?

[Answer] As far as I can see, the more important aspects of them are directed against the Soviet Union and not against Poland. The Soviet Union will not collapse economically as a result, and it will seek to resist with political muscle. On the other hand, these economic restrictions make the Soviet Union realize how serious Washington's anger is and how serious its demands are. The sanctions certainly emphasize most strongly to Moscow what Washington's policy is.

[Question] At the moment the United States seems to be particularly disappointed by the Federal Republic, even more so than by the European allies. The Germans are charged with lethargy -- inaction is the term they use. What can the Federal Government do to counteract this impression?

[Answer] The Federal Government does not believe that it must act to make an impression on certain editorial writers in foreign newspapers. This is going through the motions -- as this is called at home -- and means doing something to give the impression that one is doing something. I don't think much of that. In our assessment of the Polish developments, we essentially follow the judgment of the Roman Catholic Church which has a widespread network of information sources on the spot and which has a very wise leader.

We are proceeding according to our own impressions. On the very day we are talking here, Polish Deputy Premier Rakowski is in Bonn for a visit. I just learned from Mr Genscher what was said and discussed on the occasion. We do keep abreast of developments very well indeed in all respects.

There are not only diplomatic exchanges; what we are trying to do is hold the Jaruzelski regime, with which we have not severed diplomatic relations, to its promise to continue the course of Polish reform. At the same time we are trying to impress on everyone, and to make them remember, the commitment resulting from the Helsinki Final Act not to interfere in the internal affairs of other states.

[Question] Unlike the European allies -- most of them, at any rate -- the U.S. Government is not prepared to regard the Polish crisis as a purely internal Polish affair. Do you believe that this difference of opinion can be overcome?

[Answer] I think that the difference of opinion as you describe it is at least slightly exaggerated, if it exists at all. Naturally the crisis in Poland is a Polish affair, but it is also significant for the entire world. Surely all of us agree with that.

ECONOMIC MINISTER VIEWS U.S. SANCTIONS

[Text] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA) -- In the view of Federal Economics Minister Count Otto Lambsdorff, the European countries will not join in the U.S. boycott measures against the Soviet Union.

In an interview for KOLNER STADT-ANZEIGER today he said: "In the present situation this seems to me inappropriate; nor do I think it is being considered." Apart from possible delays, the minister does not believe that the European-Soviet natural gas pipeline deal has been jeopardized as a whole. The European governments would, of course, carefully coordinate with the United States what measures are justified and may be successful, Lambsdorff said. If it comes to action, Bonn has an interest in such action not only being declared jointly but also supported jointly.

SPD'S WISCHNEWSKI DISAGREES WITH REAGAN SANCTIONS

LD301748 Hamburg DPA in German 1715 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] Dortmund, 30 Dec (DPA) -- Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, an SPD vice chairman, believes that "there is no place here" for the U.S. economic sanctions against the Soviet Union imposed because of Poland. He told the WESTFAELISCHE RUNDSCHAU (Thursday edition) that what matters at the present stage is "to promote dialogue with Poland and thus achieve the early lifting of martial law and the release of the internees." In his view the agreement on the European-Soviet natural gas pipeline deal should be implemented. "If the United States will not supply certain things then the Europeans... will have to discuss how to replace them." Foreign trade cannot be turned on and off like a faucet or it will be ruined. "Our country depends on exports and foreign trade. It is vital for us," Wischnewski said. The text of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH POLAND'S RAKOWSKI FOR TALKS

[Text] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn today expounded to Polish Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski the expectations of the Federal Republic and its allies on the normalization of the situation in Poland. He expressed the expectation that these exhortations will be taken "very seriously." After their 4-hour talks, a Bonn Foreign Ministry spokesman gave the impression that the expectations expressed by Genscher had made an impression on Rakowski.

Genscher's demands include the earliest resumption of the dialogue with the Catholic Church and the trade unions, the release of internees and the lifting of martial law. The Foreign Ministry spokesman in his briefing repeatedly used the phrase "very serious" expectations to describe Genscher's position.

In connection with the Western expectation, Foreign Minister Genscher expressly referred to the conference of EC foreign ministers on Poland arranged for 4 January. Immediately after today's talk Genscher telephoned Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Florida. Genscher handed the Polish deputy premier a number of petitions to be passed on to the Polish leadership. Specifically, there is the demand by Eugen Loderer, the chairman of the Metal Workers Union, for the release of Polish trade unionists. Genscher emphasized Bonn's expectations that Poland would continue its policy concerning the departure of ethnic Germans.

Genscher told the Polish deputy premier of the German people's strong interest in the present situation in Poland and expressed their "dismay and concern" over the present situation in Poland. According to the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Rakowski expounded to Genscher the view of the Polish leadership on the present situation in the Polish People's Republic. He also handed over a letter from former Polish foreign minister Stefan Olszowski recalling his previous meetings with Genscher and adding his assessment of the situation.

Genscher explained the significance of the Bundestag resolution of 18 December and expressed the hope that the Polish leadership would assess it correctly. Regarding the three Western expectations he had mentioned, Genscher said that their fulfillment would be the test of how seriously the assurances by the Polish leaders -- of wanting to return to the policy of reform -- could be taken.

The Foreign Ministry spokesman said that Genscher's impression is that Rakowski took the exhortations "very seriously." The Federal Republic's Western allies are to be briefed on the talk as quickly as possible.

After a talk with Rakowski, Wolfgang Mischnik, the chairman of the FDP parliamentary group, said that he had sensed "a clear readiness and endeavour to return as soon as possible to normal conditions." Rakowski gave the assurance that the policy of reform would be maintained. Mischnik described his talk with Rakowski as "extremely informative." His talk has proven the wisdom of Bonn's policy of restraint. The Polish deputy premier then visited Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, a vice chairman of the SPD, and then talked with Alois Mertes, the foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group.

This morning the foreign policy spokesman of the CSU group in the Bundestag, Hans Huyn, criticized Rakowski's visit to the Federal Republic as a snub to the Western alliance. Speaking to the press today, Government Spokesman Kurt Becker described the visit as a swift response to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's 26 Dec letter to the Polish leadership. In this letter Schmidt had emphatically called on behalf of the Federal Government for an easing of martial law and the release of internees.

Economic Aid Talks

[Text] Bonn/Cologne, 31 Dec (DPA) -- Polish Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski began economic talks today in Cologne with the president of the Association of German Chambers of Industry and Commerce [DIHT], Otto Wolff von Amerongen. The meeting was not arranged until late on Wednesday evening. It was first assumed that Rakowski would fly immediately back to Warsaw after his 4-hour meeting with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The deputy premier made Genscher no promises about lifting martial law in Poland.

Genscher, in a Deutschlandfunk interview today, came out in favor of continuing Western aid to Poland and also called on the West to arrive at a common attitude. The minister said it is decisive that the Warsaw leadership is aware of the fact that no solution could be found by continuing martial law. Genscher said that a starting point for solving the problem is the hope he had expressed during his talks with Rakowski that the Polish leaders will, as soon as possible, resume a dialogue with the Catholic Church as well as the Solidarity trade union.

It is important that the Federal Government's attitude does not interfere with and disturb such a development. Genscher said that a quarrel about the causes of the present situation in Poland is superfluous. Any problem for the Western alliance arising out of the Polish tragedy has to be prevented.

Genscher Interviewed

["Excerpt" from Udo Philipp interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn on 30 December -- recorded]

[Text] [Genscher] The [Polish] deputy premier explained the developments of the past few weeks and also the goals of the Polish leadership. What we wanted to do was explain in no uncertain terms the position of the Federal Government, its partners in the European Community and of the Western alliance. In that respect I was supported by the joint resolution of the German Bundestag. After all, it is not routine for the three Bundestag factions to quite clearly adopt a stance on such an important issue and for the chairman of the foreign affairs committee to deliver a statement on behalf of the three Bundestag factions. I also had the backing of our partners gained during the past few days. I made it clear that we expect the dialogue to begin as soon as possible with the Catholic Church as well as with the leadership of the trade union Solidarity; I said that we expect the prisoners to be released and martial law to be lifted.

I think that what has been said here [during Polish Deputy Premier Rakowski's visit] will be noted and assessed, and now it is necessary to wait and see what the reaction of the Polish leadership will be.

[Question] Have you, or has the Federal Government, been confirmed in the view that the events in Poland are not directed by Moscow?

[Answer] The Polish leadership will make and surely has already made, its decisions within the framework of the conditions which exist in Europe and in the world.

[Question] Were any statements made, or hopes raised for us, that the situation in Poland will improve for the people?

[Answer] All I can do is express the expectation that they will take seriously what I have explained as our position and that of our partners.

[Question] How do you assess the sanctions, the measures, which U.S. President Reagan has imposed?

[Answer] Well, next week the chancellor will discuss with the U.S. leadership the situation in Europe, including developments in Poland. I hope that by then there will be some reaction to what we discussed here. As you know, we will also be having a meeting of the European Community foreign ministers Monday -- a meeting at which we will formulate the opinion of the European foreign ministers.

[Question] Will today's talks have any influence on these talks on Monday as well as on the talks Chancellor Schmidt will hold with Mr Reagan?

[Answer] Why, certainly!

[Question] In what way?

[Answer] The information we obtained here and, as we hope, the reaction to this talk from Warsaw, will be noted by all sides, I'm sure.

Further on Genscher

LD301958 Hamburg DPA in German 1927 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA) -- Genscher expects that the Polish Government will "take very seriously" the expectations he expressed in his conversation with Rakowski. Genscher said this in an interview with ARD and ZDF Television tonight. He was referring to his expectations that the dialogue with the Catholic Church and the Solidarity trade union leaders would be speedily resumed, that the detained persons would be released and martial law lifted.

Asked why, in his view, Rakowski had visited the Federal Republic as the first country after the imposition of martial law in Poland, Genscher said that the people in Poland well knew that, because of the vicissitudes of their common history, people in the Federal Republic deeply felt what was happening in Poland.

Rakowski today met Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, a vice chairman of the SPD, for a 2-hour exchange of views. The SPD parliamentary party said that Wischnewski had welcomed the Polish Government's readiness to discuss its country's problems frankly in the present difficult situation. He too expressed the expectation that martial law in Poland will be lifted and internees and arrested persons released. It was of crucial importance for the SPD that the dialogue between the state leadership, the Solidarity trade union and the church in Poland is resumed as soon as possible.

Alois Mertes, CDU/CSU foreign affairs spokesman, said that in his talk with Rakowski he had called for an early signal from Warsaw that the "present state" would end soon.

The internment of people was intolerable under international law. Mertes also called for the ending of martial law. The present regime should resume talks with the Solidarity union, which must be revived, and with the church. He referred to the resolution of the Bundestag on the situation in Poland. He said that the continuation of the policy of renewal was the underlying basis for economic aid. Asked about the Soviet role in the military action in Poland, Mertes told DPA that assessments had differed for obvious reasons. Overall, he described his talks, which lasted 90 minutes, as very sincere and very clear on both sides.

CHANCELLOR INTERVIEWED ON PROSPECTS FOR 1982

[Text] Hamburg, 30 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has described his most important wishes for the coming year as being the resolution of the world economic crisis and the achievement of progress at the Geneva talks between the Soviet Union and United States. In an interview for BILD-ZEITUNG (Thursday's edition), Schmidt said that he hoped the Western world would come out of the economic crisis without additional inflation. It is equally essential for the United States and Russians "to achieve tangible progress to help stabilize peace" at the Geneva talks on medium-range weapons.

The chancellor pointed out positive signs for the economy. Since last summer, the exchange rate of the Deutschemark has risen enormously and exports have increased greatly. "Our balance of payments deficit and balance of goods and services deficit has turned into a surplus during the past few weeks and months." Nevertheless, the depths of the world recession should not be underestimated. It has gripped not only the West but also the Soviet Union, East Europe and the developing countries. "We will continue to have considerable economic difficulties in 1982 throughout the world -- including in Germany," stressed Schmidt, who is currently on holiday in Florida.

"But in 1982 we will cope with this relatively better than the majority of other states." The federal citizens' standard of living would perhaps be a little lower in 1982. "But perhaps we might be able to roughly maintain it. It is decisive in this respect that investment activity gets under way again in 1982 and thus reduces the employment figures again," said the chancellor.

The text of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

PRESS COMMENTS ON U.S. SANCTIONS OVER POLAND

DW300959 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 30 Dec 81

[From the press review]

[Text] Here are some quotations from editorials which discuss the U.S. sanctions. The editorial of FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU states in part: Washington has embarked on the course of sanctions again. The intent is to punish the Polish military government as well as those forces which quarters in the U.S. capital city consider the true wire-pullers behind the martial law regime -- the Soviet leaders. Granted, so far there has been no intervention in Poland by Soviet troops, yet this is exactly what Washington regards as a strategy by Moscow that deserves condemnation. They say that Moscow is attaining its objectives without having to pay the political price for open intervention. So they are presenting the bill to Moscow just the same. As Washington says, this is only the first of a series of escalating punitive measures. The major items are not contained in it. That was FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU.

KIELER NACHRICHTEN observes: If the West is not careful, it will get tangled in its own hair over the serious crisis in Poland. In any event, clear indications of harsh dissonance among the allies and friends in the Western camp cannot be hushed up anymore. The United States is threatening the Soviets with more sanctions in the event of an invasion of Poland.

On several occasions the Europeans have also made it clear in all earnestness that there cannot be another Afghanistan without a complete derailing of the policy of peace and detente between East and West. The Europeans, however, disagree among themselves over their course of action and their attitude toward Moscow and the military regime in Warsaw.

Freiburg's BADISCHE ZEITUNG writes: Reagan's punitive action against the Soviets reflects the wrath of the U.S. public and its determination to put its foot down now at long last. The Europeans in general, and the Germans in particular, cannot so simply yield to this displeasure. They must keep in mind that putting one's foot down, while gratifying, may destroy some things that deserve to be preserved. The U.S.-European quarrel over this issue has been smoldering for several weeks, and now it is flaring up openly. The United States does not regard its action as a unilateral move but as an example for all the allies. More than ever they are irritated by Bonn's natural gas deal with Moscow. Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher will have a hard time defending their own area of action and succeeding with their moderate counterarguments. That was BADISCHE ZEITUNG.

The Oldenburg NORDWEST-ZEITUNG's editorial says in part: In this country it should remain an uncontested fact that sanctions are justified. This does not exclude the possibility that the measures Ronald Reagan announced are controversial because their effect is in doubt. Those West Europeans who have experience with boycotts and who have been harmed by embargoes have had to note more than once that so far sanctions have never shown the desired effect. Elsewhere in its editorial NORDWEST-ZEITUNG continues: The experiences gathered in connection with these measures allow us to forecast that intensified boycott pressure from the West will in no way induce the dictators in Warsaw to relax the shackles on the Polish people even 1 day sooner than would be permitted by the general situation in the country. In addition, new sanctions carry the danger that Poland will again be driven completely into the arms of the Soviet Union.

In its editorial entitled "Self-Deceit," the daily DIE WELT writes: The thesis that what is going on in Poland is an internal affair has nothing in common with reality -- it is self-induced. It is being used in Europe to justify one's own indolence. It would be used in Germany even if what is happening in Poland were to happen in the GDR. This thesis is connected with the determination to ignore reality. Thus it has more to do with a lie than with the dissemination of an untruth. It is not an error but a willful decision. This aggravates the crisis between the United States and some of its European allies. The crisis is made up of the incompatibility of the thinking and desires from which divergent modes of action arise. Anyone not willingly changing fact to fiction cannot doubt the fact of Soviet intervention. This intervention is not based on the presence of Russian tanks, but on the perfection of the integrated chain of command. That was the opinion of DIE WELT.

DIE ZEIT RECOMMENDS CAUTIOUS APPROACH IN CRISIS

[Theo Sommer article: "West-West Conflict Before the East-West Crisis"]

[Excerpt] It is not because of cowardly subservience to the Kremlin if Bonn so far has rejected rashness. The Polish solution still stands a chance; efforts for a new consensus have not yet failed. The Catholic Church, which is more familiar with the country than anybody else, also has not yet abandoned hope for a satisfactory outcome of the crisis. Thus there is no justification for the West to desert the people in Poland, nor is there the least cause to write detente off completely. The Soviets might still force us to do this. But until they do, we would not write Poland off as a loss. Until then we should also stop declaring the continued existence of detente impossible on our part despite the drama which is taking place in Warsaw.

At the beginning of 1982 the West has the choice of acting according to two hypotheses: as if detente were already dead, or as if it could be saved. Reagan's ideology-soaked intuition springs from the inclination to declare detente dead; the instinct of the chancellor, trained by historical experience, urges the attempt at salvation. Even before we know whether or not there will be an East-West crisis, we may well experience a powerful West-West crisis.

MAUROY ON ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR

NC301130 Paris AFP in English 1115 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] Paris, 30 Dec (AFP) -- The French Government will not adopt economic sanctions against the Soviet Union on the lines announced for the U.S. this week by President Ronald Reagan, sources close to Premier Pierre Mauroy said today. France would make sure French companies did not step in to collect orders abandoned by U.S. rivals, the sources added. This could be done by refusing to grant them export licences. There was no official French reaction to Mr Reagan's measures.

LE MONDE CITES PREMIER'S SPEECH ON POLAND

[Maurice Delarue report]

[Text] Mr Mauroy stressed (Wednesday, 23 December) to the National Assembly, France's adherence to all aspects of the Helsinki Final Act on Security and Cooperation in Europe and recalled the commitments to respect human rights and basic freedoms adopted in this document by Poland and the other European communist states.

The premier's speech was both cautious -- because of the lack of reliable information on the current situation in Poland -- and firm. The government will henceforth be resolved to use the Helsinki act and the Madrid conference on its implementation in an offensive way. The Madrid conference is at present suspended but is to resume 15 February. The latest debates concerned primarily the plan for conventional disarmament in Europe, which seems a little ingenuous today. The French Government intends that in future debates the signatory states (all of Europe, with the exception of Albania, plus the United States and Canada) should be constantly reminded not only of their commitment to respect human rights and basic freedoms, but also that this respect "is an essential factor for peace" necessary for "friendly relations and cooperation" between nations.

The premier also emphasized the Soviet Union's role and the noninterference commitment, which is also a fundamental principle of the CSCE. Should the Helsinki act be denounced or utilized? Mr Jobert supported denunciation, which was called for last Sunday by his Movement of Democrats, the minister of state for foreign trade said himself on Radio-France on Tuesday: "Today we have sufficient reason to declare that the spirit of Helsinki and the Helsinki act are opposed to our desire for the peoples' freedom and the independece of nations. If the Polish affair continues as tragically as I believe it will, we will be forced to say that we no longer wish to attend the Madrid conference and that we will not apply or recognize the Helsinki act, which, however, we have signed."

But his view did not prevail.

The head of government recalled that France -- all but alone -- used the Madrid platform last Friday, during the final session before the suspension, to call on Poland to respect human rights. France's delegate, Mr De Commines, then stated that the situation which has been created in Poland "is contrary to the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and calls into question the aim of our debate on its implementation and on developments which could be added to it." (LE MONDE 20-21 December).

The premier recalled that France -- again, all but alone -- supported the ILO's initiative on sending a mission to the Polish trade unionists. He will also recall that France has approached most of the governments with which it has relations on the subject of Poland.

On Friday Mr Froment-Meurice, France's ambassador to Moscow, who asked to be received by Soviet Foreign Minister Mr Gromyko, was in fact received by Mr Kovalev, the deputy minister. He told him:

"1. Noninterference is not indifference, particularly when human rights are violated;

"2. France deplores the brutal halting of the socialist and democratic renewal process which had begun in Poland;

"3. France demands the immediate release of all internees, trade unionists or not, Solidarity members or not, and the immediate resumption of the dialogue among Poles."

During the discussion, which was, according to the customary euphemism, "very frank," Mr Kovalev replied, as usual, that the USSR has always been in favor of "noninterference and nonintervention" and that France is also bound to these principles.

Mr Mauroy also took stock on aid to Poland. He recalled that France is keeping up food aid while doing its best to ensure that the population benefits. As for financial aid, the government seems to have no firm doctrine: what is already planned has not been broken off, but France is conferring with the other Western countries and will take action when appropriate, as events develop.

MITTERRAND HOLDS TALKS WITH ARAB LEAGUE'S KLIBI

[Text] Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights was at the center of Mr Mitterrand's talk with Mr Chedli Klibi, secretary general of the Arab League, Mr Klibi noted Friday evening, 18 December, on leaving the Elysee. Mr Klibi added that he thanked Mr Mitterrand "for France's very firm, vigorous condemnation" after the announcement of the Israeli Government's annexation of the Golan Heights.

"Israel must realize," the secretary general of the Arab League said, "that its friends, in Europe as well as the United States, will not go on indefinitely allowing it to present them with successive faits accomplis and strong-arm tactics of this nature."

Mr Klibi also stated that he is "convinced that France could play a dynamic role" in the Near East conflict and specified that "the president of the French Republic is considering this issue with much interest." "It is not impossible," he noted, "that France may define a more dynamic policy than before, with a view to promoting the quest for an all-embracing, equitable settlement."

POLL: MOST WANT COMMUNISTS TO STAY IN GOVERNMENT

PM301155 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Dec 81 p 28

[Text] LA VIE FRANCAISE of 28 December publishes an opinion poll carried out 19 through 23 December by IFRES among a sample of 1,044 people. Forty-two percent of people questioned think that "following events in Poland" the Communist ministers should leave the government, but 48 percent think the opposite, with 10 percent who have no opinion. Forty-one percent think that "the Socialists should take the initiative and break with the Communists," but 49 percent believe the opposite. If the Communist ministers were to leave the government, 61 percent would agree to "Francois Mitterrand calling on members of the opposition," 30 percent would not agree and 9 percent have no opinion.

MARCHAIS 20 DEC STATEMENT ON POLAND REPORTED

[Apparent text of 20 December statement by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais: "But Where Do They Want To Go?"]

[Text] But where do they want to go -- all those who are pushing Poland toward adventure or civil war?

Let us look at the facts.

Since last Sunday we have expressed our emotion at the state of emergency. Since then there have been arrests, internments, wounded and dead. How could the French Communists, who have paid so dearly for every freedom defended or gained, not experience the distress of the situation of the friendly Polish people?

But, as always, the event must be faced up to. The best possible outcome must be sought -- the one which corresponds to the interests of the workers, the people and the nation.

This is what we did. Taking account of the grave faults of the past and the difficulties and excesses of the present, we said: We must do everything to avoid the worst -- civil war and outside intervention; everything must be done so that the essential reforms are continued so as to resolve the economic, social and democratic problems on the basis of understanding among national forces.

Information received these last 2 days reveals possibilities of aiming for such an outcome on the basis of initiatives aimed at avoiding violence and seeking calm.

With the exception of Reagan, the heads of state and government have assumed attitudes aimed at rejecting adventure and facilitating such a development.

In these conditions it is even more difficult to understand the behavior of those in France who continue to fuel tensions, systematically rouse passions and hatreds and push for murderous confrontation in Poland and internationalization of the Polish problem.

In fact, Poland is only a pretext for them to combat the very idea of socialism, an opportunity to try to cast aspersions in France on the cohesion of the leftwing forces. And all that to try to bring down the new policy which the French people have chosen and which the leftwing government, including Communist ministers, have begun to put into practice.

This is the aim of the bitter campaign of the right and the trade unions. They cannot accept seeing their domination put in jeopardy, wage earners benefiting from new rights, nationalizations being extended and our economy being relaunched on a better basis so as to stop the recession and unemployment. Their resistance to the changes is desperate. What an opportunity for them, if they could deflect the workers from their essential struggle to bring down these maneuvers of capital!

The Communists are convinced: The workers will not be taken in. They want the Poles to resolve their own problems themselves and to ensure the progress of their socialist society by the development of their economy, social progress and the continual deepening of democracy. And they do not want to have their victory of 10 May taken away.

There are grave problems to resolve in France. These are employment, prices and democracy within and outside industry. They will not be deflected from these. They can count on the Communists to bring down the divisive machinations of the right, to help them pull their full weight in the wider union so as to ensure the success of the new policy which the country needs.

PCF'S POPERON EXPOUNDS PARTY'S POLISH STANCE

PM301611 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Dec 81 p 4

[Text] Claude Poperon, member of the PCF Politburo, set out the position of this party on Tuesday 23 December on Radio-Tele-Luxembourg. Poperon questioned the exploitation of events in Poland for domestic political ends and reproached Edmond Maire, secretary general of the CFDT, for trying to "settle scores by riding on the backs of the Polish workers."

He noted that the measures currently in force in Poland have nothing at all in common with the PCF's concept of socialism, but that his party's analysis of this and other points differs from that of the PS.

"For our party," he added, "we will endeavour to ensure that this may not have any effect on government solidarity."

In reply to the idea put forward by Mr Mermaz (PS), according to which "the PCF" must "be made to budget," Claude Poperon declared: "In the 16 months that we have been following the situation in Poland, we have not budged. Georges Marchais pointed to the need for economic, social and political reforms in Poland. This is still our desire. We will not budge on this question."

Finally Claude Poperon said that the rumor according to which the PCF leadership had allegedly been informed of what was going to happen in Poland 4 days in advance was "a lie."

PCF JOURNALISTS CONDEMN POLISH MILITARY COUP

PM301639 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Dec 81 p 4

[Text] Twenty-Five Communist journalists who work for L'HUMANITE or other PCF press organs, declare themselves "staggered at the recent events in Poland where the democratic aspirations of an entire people have just been stifled by a military coup." "We condemn," they add in a statement published 23 December, "the state of siege which, according to the information we receive, is taking the form of deadly clashes, tens of thousands of arrests and internments, the suppression of civil rights, the militarization of information, the establishment of censorship, the development of propaganda in which anti-Semitism is not absent and the trampling upon national sensibilities."

After stressing the right's exploitation of the "Polish tragedy," the signatories believe that "the PCF leadership must unambiguously denounce this coup which has dashed the hopes of a socialist renewal. Therefore it must demand the reestablishment and development of freedoms in Poland."

The signatores are: Muriel Aime, Guy Barbier, Jacqueline Beaulieu, Georges Bonopera, Henri de Camaret, Eric Darcout, Gerard Dubus, Bernard Fillet, Candida Foti, Jean-Marc Guegan, Annie Gouyet, Jean-Jacques Gibert, Jean-Claude Gilles Gauthiier, Bernard Gavoille, Gregoire, Sylvie Jouet, Marc Meimon, Pierre Menard, Martine Nouaille, Jean-Claude Yvonne Quiles, Maryse Taupin, Jean Tornikian, Alain Vidal, Nicole Vidal, Elisabeth Weissman. PCF PAPER HITS U.S. ENVOY'S COMMENTS ON MINISTERS

[Roger Lambotte report]

[Text] There are some "ministers who are not Frenchmen" in Pierre Mauroy's government.

M.E. Galbraith, the new U.S. ambassador in Paris, former CIA agent and banker, revealed this scandal in an interview he gave to LE MATIN.

"We are well aware," he said, "that there are people here, the Communists, who in our eyes are agents of a foreign power, controlled by the Russians." And he added, with a trace of hysteria in his voice: "I would really like to take a ride on the high-speed train, but not necessarily with Mr Fiterman." On El Salvador and the sympathy France has shown for the men and women who are fighting against the massacres carried out by the junta supported by Washington -- 30,000 deaths in one year -- he said: "The French are naive and take their desires for realities." That is clear. Straightforward. Precise. Salvadorans who refuse to knucle under to the tormentors of San Salvador are no longer Salvadorans. But the Vietnamese threw you out. That is why they are still Vietnamese. Go and visit Chateaubriant. You will receive confirmation there that you have invented nothing. The Nazis, way back, thought that they were justifying their assassination of Guy Moquet and his companions by shouting: "Communists, not Frenchmen."

LE MONDE VIEWS LEFT'S DIFFERENCES ON POLAND

PM301239 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Dec 81 pp 1, 4

[Andre Laurens report]

[Text] Alongside the official statements by the president and the government, which are to be supplemented on Wednesday, 23 December, after the cabinet meeting, by a statement by Mr Pierre Mauroy in the National Assembly, the political formations of the majority and the opposition, the trade unions and a horde of diverse organizations and groupings are continuing to fuel a debate on Poland which, in many respects, remains specifically French.

While people close to the premier believe, after the dinner on Tuesday when Mr Mauroy met with the four Communist ministers, that the government's cohesion is not in question -- and this is confirmed by representatives of the PCF and the party leadership -- the differences in analysis by Communists and Socialists on the Polish question are making themselves felt more and more severely, on both sides.

The PS has decided to set up a permanent staff to follow events in Poland in liaison with the Executive. There is clearly a division of labor between the Socialist leaders in power and those who run the party. The former do not question a governmental alliance with the PCF whose terms the party accepts, at least until the contrary is proved, while the latter are more free to maintain a long-standing rivalry with the Communists. The terrain is not unfavorable to them: Either the PCF does not budge and its obstinacy goes against it, or else it adopts the positions of the left in general and seems to be lagging behind.

The Socialist leaders lose no opportunity, and as soon as Mr Louis Mermaz, chairman of the National Assembly, has finished discussing the USSR's responsibility or the PCF's inertia, Mr Debarge, member of the PS National Secretariat, replies to Mr Marchais on the adventurism of those who defend the freedoms. In the face of these attacks the Communist leaders are holding their ground: They have seen it all before. In any case, according to Mr Claude Poperen [PCF Central Committee member], they will not budge on the Polish question. In any case, they are less concerned with the stances adopted by the PS than with those of other leftwing personalities.

It is Mr Edmond Maire, secretary general of the CFDT, whom they attack most sharply, accusing him of settling old scores. The PCF is being generous toward one of its fellow travelers, Mr Maffre-Bauge, who has withdrawn his solidarity from it on this occasion. But the indications of internal or marginal dispute are multiplying within the communist sphere of influence: among Communists elected to local office who are voting for texts condemning the suppression of freedoms in Poland in unison with Socialist representatives, among journalists, or among Communist opposition circles, who are finding grounds for common action. The opposition is not short of initiatives and increasingly severe stances. The UDF joins with Mr Chirac in calling for the Helsinki Final Act to be called into question and the Madrid CSCE session to be stopped. Deputies in that formation are seeking ways of boycotting Communist ministers, whose presence in the government they regard as increasingly intolerable.

DETAILS OF SPADOLINI LETTER TO REAGAN REVEALED

LD302136 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] The reply by the chairman of the Council of Ministers to Reagan on the Polish events was forwarded to the White House today. In the letter, Spadolini, who shares the preoccupation expressed by Reagan in his message on 24 December, informs the U.S. President on the policies adopted by the Italian Government and on the unanimous support by the political forces of the government majority. It recalls the government's condemnation of the brutal, repressive measures adopted in Poland and reaffirms the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of that country. It expresses the hope that a return will be made to the path of dialogue and understanding between the sides concerned. Spadolini also informed Reagan about the diplomatic steps taken by Italy with the Polish authorities and about action taken at the EEC level.

Further on Letter

[Text] Rome, 30 Dec (ANSA) -- A belief in the international roots of terrorism in Italy was clearly stated by Premier Giovanni Spadolini in a letter to U.S. President Ronald Reagan dated December 24, but only made public here today. In his message to Reagan, Spadolini voiced the conviction that the kidnapping of NATO General James Dozier in Verona on December 17 by the Italian Red Brigades urban guerrilla organization was a new stage in the RB's anti-NATO strategy with obvious aims of international destabilization.

Turning to the repression in Poland under the government of General Wojciech Jaruzelski, Spadolini reiterated the Italian position of condemnation for the brutal crackdown on civil liberties and of adherence to the principles of non-interference in the internal affairs of Poland. The Italian premier also voiced the hope that there would soon be a resumption in that country of a dialogue and of understanding among the various sides: the regime, the union and the Catholic Church. Spadolini informed Reagan that he was intent on working, "with maximum loyality and clarity", for an end to martial law in Poland, the liberation of all those arrested there and a resumption of negotiations among the Polish Government, the church and the independent union.

AUTHORITIES CONTINUE SEARCH FOR DOZIER KIDNAPPERS

[Excerpts] Verona, 31 Dec (ANSA) -- Massive police forces continue searches and dragnets in central-northern Italy for the fourteenth straight day today as they pursue their apparently vain quest for the Red Brigades' hideout where the urban guerrilla organization is holding kidnapped U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier.

Yesterday, the liaison committee for the investigations held its first session in this northern Italian town, site of a major NATO base, where Dozier was serving as second-in-command of the Atlantic pact's land forces in southern Europe. The session was attended by police chief Giovanni Rinaldo Coronas, Prefect Gaspare de Francisci, and high-ranking officials from Italy's paramilitary Carabinieri police, Finance Guards, and ordinary police corps. The meeting made a detailed review of what has been done to date and agreed on new lines of action and new approaches to the enquiries. Predictably, there was no information on what these decisions might entail. Leaving the meeting, all the participants without expection replied to reporters' questions with a laconic, "No comment."

Meanwhile, the Red Brigades were on the stage again with a further two copies of their communique number-two on the kidnap sent by post to a privately-owned radio station at Mestre near Venice. According to sources close to the enquiries, special attention is being dedicated to the photograph of the kidnapped brigadier-general, which the urban guerillas have made available to the press in recent days in three slightly different versions. According to the sources, all three versions come from the same negative. In the first, found in Milan with communique No 2, Dozier's left hand does not appear, as though it had been deliverately masked out. But the hand is visible in the photograph reproduced by duplicator on the cover of communique No 2, and in the photo printed on photographic paper and made available to a Roman daily.

Police sorces told reporters here late last night that forensic experts have established that the photograph supplied by the Red Brigades with communique No 2 was not a photomontage, as some speculation orginally suggested. After blowing up the photo, the experts said they managed to see quite clearly that the kidnapped brigadier-general was in fact holding the placard with the abductors' message and that the right hand was mancled with an iron chain on the wrist.

Communiques, Documents Analyzed

[Text] Rome, 30 Dec (ANSA) -- The Red Brigades urban guerilla group has "gone back to its origins," according to a careful reading by experts of the terrorist organization's latest communiques and documents dealing with their claimed December 17 kidnapping of United States NATO command General James Lee Dozier from his Verona home. The anti-terrorist experts who reviewed especially the 188 page "December 1981 Strategic Resolution" document found together with communique number two in Milan last Sunday, maintained that it was the third chapter of the document which above all served to tie concepts to the ideological and theoretical-political traditions of clandestine terrorist groups.

In that chapter, they say, it is clear that the "factory" once again returns to center stage in a strategy aimed not only at making it the central location for development of a phase of struggle against the state, but above all as the preferred social gathering place for fomenting this struggle. The two northern Italian regional "columns" of the Red Brigades group who released the document are perfectly in line, according to these experts, with the first generation of Red Brigades, as well as with the "historic nucleus" of brigade members who have been in prison, some almost for 10 years now.

It was pointed out in fact that the document cites whole pages of a recent publication compiling all the most noted Italian revolutionary texts of the past years. In passages of the document copied from this volume, the terrorist group emphasizes the statement, "It is in the factories that organisms of mass revolutionaries must be constructed." And the slogan which must guide the struggle in the factory, according to this passage, is "less work, more equal pay for all," the experts pointed out.

The apparent division between the two columns of Red Brigades guiding the Dozier kidnapping, and other brigades groups from central and southern Italy is illustrated by their different evaluations of the worker, or proletariat, according to the judgment of the experts. The northern Lombard and Veneto groups from the more industrialized area of Italy make no distinction in fact, it was noted, between "metropolitan proletariat" and "marginal proletariat." This latter term the experts say is a restatement of the classic Marxist term for lumpen proletariat. The southern columns, instead, have concentrated their hopes of a mass revolutioanry movement among the unemployed and unskilled workers, the original lumpen proletariat ranks.

In their resolution, the Red Brigades holding Dozier reveal the contrasts in their strategy with southern terrorist groups, according to the anti-terrorists experts, by maintaining that there is only one strategy possible for both the worker groups cited.

PRESS REPORTS ON SPADOLINI 29 DEC NEWS CONFERENCE

[Text] Rome, 30 Dec (ANSA) -- The Italian press today focused considerable attention on the press conference given Tuesday by Premier Giovanni Spadolini.

Rome's LA REPUBBLICA said that for over two hours a pack of newsmen sought to get the premier to pass judgment on certain of his coalition partners who, according to the paper, were working for the collapse of the government. The reference was to the Socialists (PSI) and the Social Democrats (PSDI) in the five-way coalition which also includes Spadolini's own Republicans (PRI), the Christian Democrats (DC) and the Liberals (PLI). The premier ably managed to keep off the hook, however, even showing a certain respect for party prerogatives, and skirting the more delicate questions, the paper said.

Spadolini lost control over for a moment when he referred to the demagogy of certain criticisms launched against him. That moment, however, indicated that behind his self-control lurked a great deal of irritation, LA REPUBBLICA said. Despite his cautious manner, Spadolini managed to make his message clear, the paper went on. He said that the parties have a right to think about other government formations but must not boycott the work of his government in its fight against inflation, terrorism, moral distortions and international crises. In Spadolini's view, if the parties want (?a row) they will be obliged to open one in Parliament and assume the responsibility of voting against the government, the paper concluded.

Milan's CORRIERE DELLA SERA also found that Spadolini had spoken out forthrightly to those within the majority forces backing him who are in reality digging the ground out from under his feet. The premier said he would only step down if he received a negative vote from the Parliament. To those who still wanted to play power games with no thought to the collective good, Spadolini warned that the nation's economy was still on the edge of an abyss despite a slight drop in inflation and a slight gain the Bank of Italy's reserves. Spadolini also warned all categories to go easy with their wage demands or else the extra money won might turn into mere waste paper, CORRIERE said.

The Italian Communist Party (PCI) paper L'UNITA said that throughout the press conference the premier had been especailly careful not to run into open controversy with PSDI Secretary Pietro Longo or PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi. To the extent that it was possible, he even sought to avoid mentioning their names, the paper said. The Christian Democratic party paper POPOLO said that the press conference was a timely summing-up of the present Italian political and economic situation. IL GIORNALE NUOVO said that Spadolini sought to underscore the independence of his government from the Communist Party. He also avoided polemics as much as possible, instead emphasizing the solidarity within the majority forces, the daily said.

POLITICAL FIGURES VIEW POLAND, SIBERIA PIPELINE

[Text] Rome, 29 Dec (ANSA) -- The Polish crisis continues leaving its mark on internal political debate in Italy with doubts being raised over Italian participation in the building of a natural gas pipeline from Siberia to Western Europe and assessments of the crisis accentuating disagreement on the left of the political spectrum.

Interviewed by a south Italian newspaper, Finance Minister Rino Formica, a Socialist Party member, claimed that, as long as the Italian Communist Party continues to be tied "to a Leninist view of society and the state, the Italian left cannot concretely offer itself as an alternative to the present system."

Linking this to the Polish crisis, he claimed that the "problem" of the Italian left is "precisely the gap between the Italian Communists' rate of evolution and society's rather quicker and more turbulent rate."

In an indirect reply, a member of the Italian Communist Party's Secretariat, Giorgio Napolitano, told RAI, the state-run radio-television network, that there was "undoubtedly a heavy involution in the Soviet Union and the countries of so-called real socialism."

The radio interview also picked up and developed the idea advanced by party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer that the impostion of martial law in Poland marks the end of an historical phase that started with the October revolution. According to Napolitano, the socialism of Eastern Europe is not the only one possible, and socialism is not incompatible with democracy. "In Western Europe", he asserted, "one must seek a completely different path," adding the need for a "fusion between democracy and socialism."

Italian participation in the Siberia-Western Europe gasline came under heavy attack from the Social Democrats, whose deputy caucus leader in the lower house, Costantino Belluscio, said his party was against continuing it. According to Belluscio, participation is against the government's foreign policy platform approved by the Rome parliament. The present administration led by Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini is a five-way coalition of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals, and Spadolini's own Republicans.

But the floor-leader of the radical left Proletarian Unity Party, Eliseo Milani, pointed out that breaking off talks with the Soviet Union on the project would be a "fact of unheard-of-gravity." "A fact of this kind would need parliamentary approval," he said, noting that neither the lower house nor the Senate had so far made any pronouncement. The leadership of the Liberal Party also urged that any decision on whether Italian participation should continue "must be taken at the government level."

POPE VOICES 'TREPIDATION' OVER POLAND SITUATION

[Text] Vatican City, 30 Dec (ANSA) -- The pope today voiced his "trepidation" for Poland at the end of his usual Wednesday general audience. Addressing over 10,000 persons in the vast audience hall, John Paul II said that the state of martial law in Poland continued despite calls for its revocation from around the world and even as concern grows worldwide for the fate of those deprived of their liberty.

The pope read a brief message in Polish. He then read the same message in Italian so that a greater number of people in the audience would understand. In it, he reiterated the words of Poland's primate Jozef Glemp on December 13 when he condemned the use of violence and force and the rupture of a dialogue put together so painstakingly. The pope voiced the hope that civil rights would soon be restored in that land and those in detention freed.

Appeals for Detainees

NC301535 Paris AFP in English 1530 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Text] Vatican City, 30 Dec (AFP) -- Pope John Paul II today made a new appeal for the release of detainees in Poland and, in a reference to Solidarity leader Lech Walesa, "those who are forcibly interned. " Addressing pilgrims at St Peter's, the pope said also that he had called on Polish leaders, in a message delivered by papal envoy Archbishop Luigi Poggi, to lift the state of siege which was "continuing despite interventions that it should be ended." He said that concern was growing worldwide over the events in Poland "and it is in these shadows that the new year is opening." Speaking in Polish, he said the Church had the "right" to speak for "all just men and would do so in any country and in any system."

TEXT OF PCP STATEMENT BACKING POLISH CRACKDOWN

[Apparent text of PCP information and propaganda section 14 December note: "The Events in Poland"]

[Text] 1 -- A difficult and complex situation in all spheres of economic, social and political life had been developing for a long time in Poland. Exploiting difficulties, shortcomings and mistakes made in the process of building socialism, the internal counterrevolutionary forces, enjoying imperialism's active support and using Solidarity as their principal (but not sole) political instrument, conducted with increasing intensity, gravity and aggressiveness a subversive and destabilizing escalation aiming at the destruction of socialism in Poland.

The sabotaging of the whole economic and social life; the paralyzing of the functioning of broad sectors of state activity; the disruption of the whole of production activity and of the channels of distribution; and the increasing social anarchy, with personal attacks, arson and other acts of sabotage against state property, constituted, among other factors, the manifestation and instrument of the activity of the antisocialist and counterrevolutionary forces, which were now openly placing on the agenda the destruction of the socialist system and the attainment of power. This political and social atmosphere was gravely intensifying the economic crisis, jeopardizing elementary and immediate needs of the Polish people and placing Polish society on the brink of a real national catastrophe.

Under these conditions, the emergency measures decided on and announced by the council of state of the People's Republic of Poland become understandable. These measures, adopted with respect for Poland's constitution and in defense on the legality which it enshrines, are aimed at curbing counterrevolution, surmounting the extremely grave economic and social crisis with which Poland is confronted and thus rediscovering the path of developing, strengthening and consolidating socialism.

2 -- Under the cover and on the pretext of the latest events in Poland, a large-scale anti-communist campaign is already beginning to develop in Portugal, which, over and above the usual slanders and deceptions, is aimed at immediate political objectives whose significance must be exposed and unmasked.

It is not surprising that the Portuguese reactionary forces should launch such a diversionary maneuver, in a shameless display of hypocrisy, at the very moment when it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to bear the consequences of the just and increasing popular condemnation of the antidemocratic and truly economically disastrous policy with which they have governed the country.

What is regrettable is that leaders of democratic parties, are eagerly and hastily joining in that campaign, harmonizing with the same anticommunist tone their criticism of the evolution of the Polish situation, even though that evolution is taking place within the framework of Poland's constitution and with full respect for a sovereign country's legality. And it is especially to be regretted that this haste in adopting stances on the Polish people's problems occurs when the same leaders are so hesitant and ambiguous about national problems and the Portuguese people's struggle against the "Democratic Alliance" government's disastrous policy. They proved this recently by standing completely aloof from (and even attempting to discourage) the great day of struggle constituted by the 12 December demonstrations, bringing onto the streets hundreds of thousands of Portuguese people in defense of the democratic system and the constitution and in support of the demand for the "Democratic Alliance" government's dismissal as a national imperative.

3 -- In drawing the Portuguese people's attention to the nature and aims of this campaign, the PCP is certain that the Portuguese people will not allow themselves to be deceived by the anticommunism contained in it.

It is the "Democratic Alliance" Balsemao government which the Portuguese people blame and call to account for the extremely grave economic situation with the intolerable rise in the cost of living, the increasing unemployment, the overall state budget of national destitution, the cuts in housing credit, the criminal increases in health service payments and the spread of corruption.

It is the "Democratic Alliance" Balsemao government which the Portuguese are blaming and calling to account for the violation of the laws and of freedoms, as happened recently in the Covilha strikes and in the Portuguese radio-television system and Cambournac strikes over the last few days.

It is in the "Democratic Alliance" Balsemao government and within the forces supporting it that the Portuguese people see the dangers to and the enemies of freedom, democracy and the democratic system.

Therefore let the "Democratic Alliance" Balsemao government not seek to transform itself from the defendant into the prosecutor in a hyprocritical anticommunist operation. Its "sentence" is being "passed" daily by hundreds of thousands of Portuguese people who are resisting and combating its antipeople and antinatio al policy. Sooner rather than later it will take shape in the dismissal of the "Democratic Alliance" Balsemao government and in the triumph of a democratic alternative in national political life.

PAPER URGES MORE ACTIVE STAND ON POLAND

PM301253 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 18 Dec 81 p 10

[Editorial: "Greater Solidarity With Poland"]

[Text] As on so many occasions in contemporary history, Poland has become the crossroads of the fears and hopes of the whole of Europe. The system of domination created in the Soviet Union in 1917 and later exported to its periphery experienced its first grave crisis in Poland several months before Hungary and 12 years before Czechoslovakia. In August 1980 the Solidarity movement took up again the torch of the struggle for Poland's national and political liberation and pitted millions of flesh and blood workers against the regime. General Jaruzelski's coup, which some people regard as the final card before invasion and others believe forms part of the Soviet global strategy, is aimed at any rate at performing with Polish uniforms the task which the Russian tanks performed in Budapest and Prague. Following its foreseeable failure, since the causes which brought Solidarity's protest into being will operate again with redoubled vigor after the first wave of repression, Poland is in danger of a direct Soviet intervention.

Solidarity with the Poles must not be confined to symbolic gestures but must be organized effectively and for a protracted period. While the entire world is focusing its attention on the events in Poland and a vigorous international movement is emerging -- sometimes behind the backs of or above the governments -- in support of a people who throughout their history have written the most courageous pages in defense of dignity, freedom and independence, the Spanish political parties and trade unions are treating us -- apart from the expected exceptions -- to their silence, their perplexities or mere verbal condemnations. The Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] and the General Workers Union [UGT] called the day before yesterday, in a gesture which does them credit, a demonstration in front of the Polish Embassy -- which is located in a Madrid suburb -- but did not succeed in mobilizing their members. In the meantime Felipe Gonzalez was continuing his tour of Central America without realizing that plans for the pacification of that region are indissociable from the highly topical events in Central Europe. It is as unacceptable to cover up for the Central American dictatorships' hideous crimes with the invasion of Afghanistan as it is to shut one's eyes to the Polish coup with the excuse of El Salvador or Guatemala. For its part the government has made a formal protest, but its prime minister greeted General Jaruzelski's charge d'affaires politely at an official reception , as if nothing were happening in Warsaw. We do not believe that diplomatic customs should prevail over political clarity when the shootings and imprisonments are beginning to cast Poland into mourning.

While the leaderships of the PCE and the Workers Commissions were discrediting Marcelino Camacho in deeds by calling off thedemonstration in front of the Polish Embassy, Santiago Carrillo was combining the forthrightness of his condemnation -- which is to be praised -- with an incomprehensible allusion to the "anticommunist campaign" organized by the PSOE and the UGT by expressing solidarity with the Poles. Eurocommunism, which has embarked on the task of denouncing the countries of the Soviet orbit, cannot forbid the Spanish socialists -- its theoretical comrades on the left -- to express the same denunciations. The Polish issue will undoubtedly be a test of fire for Eurocommunism which has not as yet been surmounted; any ambiguity or equivocation in this respect would give cause for being interpreted as an underlying alignment with General Jaruzelski. In short, the actions in support of the Polish people, who are being attacked by arms, are, in our opinion, too timid and ineffective. A real mobilization and tangible assistance in all fields are what is necessary: in short, greater solidarity with Poland.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATS FORM MINORITY GOVERNMENT

[Text] Copenhagen, 30 Dec (AFP) -- Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen announced the formation of a new minority Social Democratic government today, three weeks after losses in a December 8 general election forced a similar formation to resign. The new government, which has only three new ministers, was unanimously approved by the Social Democratic members of parliament. It is to be presented formally to Queen Margrethe II later today. Mr Jorgensen has said the new government, composed only of Social Democrats, would survive only if the political right -- which tacitly approved a minority government -- accepted his economic plans proposed during the election campaign. That program was aimed primarly at fighting unemployment. Some rightist parties have balked at it, preferring to concentrate on controlling inflation. The election left the Social Democrats with 59 seats in parliament, a loss of nine. But the Social Democrats had more than double the representation of the Conservatives, which have 26 members of parliament.

The composition of the government is as follows:

Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen
Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen
Defense Minister Poul Sogaard
Finance Minister Knud Heinesen (replacing Svend Jakobsen)
Economy Minister Ivar Norgaard
Justice Minister Ole Espersen
Interior Minister Henning Rasmussen
Industry Minister Erling Jensen
Labor Minister Svend Auken
Agriculture Minister Bjorn Westh
Social Affairs Minister Bent Hansen (replacing Ritt Bjerregaard)
Energy Minister Poul Nielson
Public Works Minister J.K. Hansen (replacing Knud Heinesen)
Housing Minister Erling Olsen
Education Minister Dorte Bennedsen
Minister for the Environment Erik Holst
Cultural Affairs Minister Lise Ostergaard
Fisheries Minister Karl Hjortnaes
Religion and Greenland Affairs Minister Tove Lindbo Larsen

POLL PUTS KOIVISTO FAR AHEAD IN PRESIDENCY RACE

[Excerpt] Koivisto 54 percent. Virolainen 12 percent. Holkeri 12 percent. Karjalainen (!) 4 percent. These are the principal popularity figures in the most recent election opinion poll carried out by Finska Gallup AB for HELSINGIN SANOMAT. The poll was carried out at the end of November and the beginning of December after all the presdiential candidates had been nominated officially by their parties. When asked who they hoped would be elected president in the January election those interviewed gave the following answers: Koivisto 54 percent, Virolainen 12 percent, Holkeri 12, Karjalainen (who is not even a candidate) 4 percent, Kivisto 2 percent, Sipila 2 percent, Jansson 1 percent, Westerholm 0 percent and Vennamo 0 percent. In its report yesterday HELSINGIN SANOMAT stated that Swedish People's Party candidate Jan-Magnus Jansson's support could in fact be lower in the poll than it actually is. The figures were also said to be most reliable for the candidates from the four largest political parties -- the Social Democratic Party, Center Party, National Coalition Party and the Finnish People's Democratic League (SKDL).

ICELAND

CENTRAL COMMITTEE ELECTED BY PEOPLE'S ALLIANCE

WA291420 Reykjavik ICELAND REVIEW in English Dec 81 p 18

[Text] Compared with the stormy national congress of the Independence Party (NEWS FROM ICELAND -- NFI, November), a Reykjavik assembly of the leftist People's Alliance last month was a placid affair. The PA gathering was not for election of the party's top leadership, but for naming 42 regulars and 14 deputies to the Central Committee, for a one-year term.

Interestingly, women won 18 of the 42 regular seats that were filled at the convention. That strong female representation (up from 13 members) was widely seen as a reflection of effective lobbying behind the scenes.

Automatically entitled to seats on the PA Central Committee are the party's 11 members of the Althing (parliament). So are the foursome making up the top PA leadership, a body elected at a distinct national convention every third year. Those serving in that capacity now are:

Savavar Gestsson (minister of social services), chairman; Kjartan Olafsson, deputy chairman; Gudrun Helgadottir, secretary; and Tryggvi Thor Adalsteinsson, treasurer. The PA commands two cabinet posts besides Gestsson's, held respectively by Hjorleifur Guttormsson (energy and industry) and Ragnar Arnalds (finance). Of these PA functionaries, just Olafsson and Adalsteinsson are non-legislators.

All things considered, the general resolution passed by the PA convention last month included little or nothing that surprised political analystis. Among other things, the document stressed full employment, gradual rollback of inflation consistent with protection of wage-earners' real incomes, native predominance in energy projects, equality for women and handicapped persons, and opposition to the U.S. military presence in Iceland.

The stationing here of the U.S.-manned Iceland Defence Force (chiefly at Keflavik Airport) and this country's membership in NATO have been anathemas to the People's Alliance all along. But within the present governing coalition, which is led by Gunnar Thoroddsen, former deputy chairman of the Independence Party, there has been a moratorium of sorts with regard to these twin polarizing issues.

The IP is strongly committed to what has been Iceland's basic security posture for more than three decades. While the IP is now overwhelmingly in the parliamentary opposition, a small splinter group deserted the party's Althing caucus with Thoroddsen in early 1980 to form a government with the Progressives and the People's Alliance (NFI, November).

GOVERNMENT WELCOMES U.S. SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR

[Text] The government today repeated its welcome of sanctions imposed on the Soviet Union by President Reagan because of the imposition of martial law in Poland. President Reagan on Tuesday spelled out a seven-point programme of economic sanctions against Moscow, including a ban on the export of high technology equipment to the Soviet Union. This was given a cool reception by the West Germans. The French said they did not intend to follow the U.S. line -- but would not undermine it.

A Foreign Office statement, originally issued on Tuesday and repeated today, said Britain had had advance notice of the sanctions in a message sent from Washington to Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington. The statement said the government was satisfied that the aim of the U.S. sanctions was to re-establish conditions for reconciliation in Poland. "That is precisely the main objective of all Western governments. As Lord Carrington has already made clear, the pressure we have been applying on the Soviet Union is that they must leave the Poles to settle their own affairs and must not intervene and make repression worse."

The statement added that the Soviet Union's role in the Polish crisis was one of the key issues being considered by the top EEC politicians at a meeting today. The Foreign Office was working towards an early follow-up meeting of foreign ministers, it said. The statement said the United States would also find an early meeting of NATO foreign ministers "useful." In this, the Foreign Office would willingly play a full part. The meeting would provide an opportunity for a wider group than the EEC 10 to consider what Western governments could do to achieve their common objective, the statement said.

Meanwhile, leading Tory backbencher Mr Teddy Taylor has called on Lord Carrington to urge the EEC to end immediately "massive" exports of subsidised food to the Soviet Union. Mr Taylor, vice-chairman of the Conservative Trade Committee, said: "I am perplexed and angered that the EEC have failed to take even token action despite the horrific reports of suppression and brutality. It is an insult to the people of Poland that massive supplies of cheap, subsidised food are still pouring into Russia and the Eastern bloc."

He said that although exports of subsidised butter had ended, subsidised steel was being exported to the Soviet Union. Cheap wheat, flour, sugar, milk products, beef and wine had also been on the list. Mr Taylor said he deplored "the failure of the government to back the United States and to show support for the Poles in their present agony. Every Russian family is being given more than a bottle of wine to celebrate the military takeover in Poland," he said.

POLISH 'POWER STRUGGLE' SAID UNDERWAY IN PARTY

[By Tom McMullan]

[Excerpts] A power struggle may now be taking place in Poland, according to reports from Warsaw today. However, there appears to be no early prospect of an end to martial law. Press reports reaching the West suggest that the Polish military council may have underestimated the extent of resistance to martial law. Several strands of opinion have emerged within the communist party. A liberal member of the Politburo, Mr Hieronim Kubiak, is said to have suggested the formation of a totally new party, including both Catholics and members of the free trade union Solidarity. However, if the Soviets are closely involved in events in Poland, as the Americans allege, this seems unlikely.

Other groups, however, appear to be led by the more formidable Mr Stefan Olszowski, regarded as a candidate for future leadership, and Mr Mieczyslaw Rakowski, who chaired the abortive negotiations with Solidarity before the military takeover.

Film Director Imprisoned

[Text] Ankara, 30 Dec (AFP) -- Film director Ali Habib Ozgenturk was imprisoned today by the Istanbul state of siege court after being held for a month without trial, it was reported. Mr Ozgenturk, whose film "Hazal" was a commercial success in Europe, was arrested here last month while he was editing his latest film, "The Horse." The reports said Mr Ozgenturk was arrested because he sold the DISK (Confederation of Progressive Workers Unions) trade union confederation a copy of a short film, "Yasak" (The Ban), that he made in the 1970's. The film was screened in DISK's "seminars." A total of 52 DISK leaders are on trial for their lives in Istanbul on charges of organizing strikes.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

GUARANTEES SOUGHT ON POLISH BEEF DONATION

NC281525 Paris AFP in English 1513 GMT 28 Dec 81

[Text] Brussels, 28 Dec (AFP) -- The European Economic Community (EEC) is to seek an undertaking from Warsaw that the beef it intends to send to Poland will be distributed directly to civilians, EEC sources said here today.

The permanent ambassadors of the 10 EEC countries agreed last week that they would go ahead with the donation of 8,000 tons of beef from France and Ireland.

But they decided at a special meeting today that a representative from Britain, which currently holds the EEC presidency, would ask Warsaw for the assurance before signing the donation agreement by December 31.

They added that the Polish ambassador to Brussels would have to give details on the ports of departure and arrival of the beef, where it will be stored and eventual recipients.

The sources said that Polish authorities had already furnished some of the information.

Last week the EEC also set aside 2.1 million dollars to buy energency food aid for Poland. Since the beginning of the year it has granted the Poles more than 100 million dollars for the purchase of cut-price food.
